Source of the Nile.—Recent geographical explorations and discoveries have resuscitated the old interest in the sources of the Nile. Few men have a better right to be listened to on this subject than Dr. Beke, the Abyssinian traveller, from whom a new work is announced, entitled "The Sources of the Nile, being a general survey of the Basin of that River and its Head Streams, with the History of Nilotic Discovery."

Another Arctic Expedition.—Mr. Parker Snow proposes to leave England at the close of the present year with a small vessel, on an expedition to the Arctic regions. Proceeding around Cape Horn, he will pass through Behring's Straits, and reach a point a little South of that attained by Capt. McClintock. His object will be to find further traces, and to obtain more precise information concerning the fate of the crews of Sir John Franklin's vessels, the Erebus and Terror. Mr. Snow bears the honorable reputation of having predicted, with considerable accuracy, the locality in which the traces of the missing navigator would be found.

Religious Liberty in Italy.—Perfect religious liberty for all Protestants has been proclaimed by the Legislative Assemblies of Parma, Modena, Tuscany, and the Legations—Naples, Venetia, and the Papal States being now the only remaining States of Italy in which the free organization of Protestant congregations is still forbidden.

A Chinese Convert.—In one of the trains which arrived at Paris the other day from Marseilles, was a young Chinese in full national costume—red trowsers, blue robe, and a long tail. He was accompanied by a priest, and having been converted to Christianity, has been brought to Paris to complete his religious education. The language in which he conversed with his companion was Latin.

AUGUST 22, 1860.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE—TIME OF MEETING TOO EARLY.—For several years we have desired to have our Conference session in December; but, except when Bishop Paine presided for us, we have not had it so but once in ten years—not since 1850. We propose to have our Conference meet this year on Thursday, December 13th, for the following reasons, viz.: 1. If yellow fever should visit Natchez, there will be more time for its abatement and removal than if we meet November 21st. 2. It will be of decided advantage to all our finances to have it at that time—to the preachers, missionary collections, etc. The force this is not easily seen nor felt in the River counties and lishes us it is in the interior. It is generally the 1st of N— ber before any cotton is sent to market from the interio— they cannot settle with the preachers till they sell cotton. Missionary subscription cannot be paid till the cotton is sold. So, if we meet in November, one half of the preache— will have received, this year, not more than one-half of— allowance! New small, too, will be the Missionary collec— We met in November last year, and that collection, I think, was about two thousand dollars less than the year before, when we met in December! If Bishop Early will change to Dec. 13th, he can be at the Louisiana Conference till its c—, and reach Natchez in a few hours after; and as he has— other Conference to attend after that date, I hope he will make the change. It will be $10,000 to our finances if he will do so.

A MEMBER.

VICKSBURG DEPOSITORY—TO THE PREACHERS.—There is a large and well selected stock of books, etc., at Vicksburg waiting to be called into active service. They would be instruments of good if you would duly send for them and introduce them into the families and congregations in your charge. Owing to some peculiar circumstances, (understood by some in the Conference) the Board of Managers resolved to sell for cash. That was last winter; but as we wish to get our present stock off we will sell, to the preachers who may order books, on a credit till the meeting of Conference in Natchez. Now, let those who have been slegging over this work for months past, awake, and to work! If you want a revival, don't neglect to distribute good books any more than praying and preaching.

H. H. MONTGOMERY, Pres. of Society.

REV. J. J. EARLY.—We learn through his Presiding Elder, Rev. W. B. Hines, and others, that Rev. J. J. Early, of the Mississippi Conference, has been notified to leave the country, in consequence of the discovery of notes of his, on slavery, preparatory to the publication of an abolition work. He is suspected, also, of tampering with the negroes, and, it is said, has so conducted himself as to be unfit for the society and service to which he had been assigned. The apostolic exhortation is wise: "Lay hands suddenly on no man." This case is a sad comment upon it.

THE OLD HOMESTEAD has merit as poetry, but is defective in rhyme, measure, etc.—"HOME SWEET HOME," has the same merits and the same faults.

THE STAMPEDE AT JACKSON.—We have received a letter from Dr. Gurley, the physician at whose negro quarters the cases of small-pox occurred which caused the students to leave Centenary College, and thus prevent the approaching Commencement. Our remarks last week render its publication unnecessary. It is due to Dr. Gurley, however, to say, that he disclaims any knowledge of how the small-pox was brought to his premises. He confirms our statement, that there is none about Jackson now.

AUBURN FEMALE COLLEGE.—Rev. W. P. Harrison, who is, or is to be, we believe, one of the Professors in the Auburn Male College, has accepted the Presidency of the Auburn Female College, at Auburn, Ala. He is well qualified for his post.

PRATTVILLE MALE AND FEMALE ACADEMY.—This is a new institution, on a new plan, (or rather an old plan revived) established by the citizens of Prattville, and to be under the management of Rev. E. H. Pitts, formerly of Mansfield Female College. He is an experienced and successful teacher.

WASHINGTON CITY CHURCH.—In addition to others heretofore mentioned, who have responded to the proposition of Hon W. H. Hammett, to give $100 to the Washington City Church, we have now to report the following: Rev. Samuel Watson, editor of the Memphis Christian Advocate; Geo. W. Carter, D.D., President of Soule University, Texas; Miss Nancy Rutherford, of North Carolina.

SETTLE IN [illegible] REV. J. J. LACY recently gave us an account of a church dedication, and added that the church in question was "the first ever dedicated exclusively to the worship of Almighty God in Franklin parish, La." Rev. (we suppose) H. Leoudas Green sends us a letter politely denying the statement, and mentions "Hurricane church," "McIntosh church," "Holly Grove," etc. All very well, but we must not have a newspaper controversy about so small a matter, as would be the case, should we publish the letter.

A GOOD FEMALE TEACHER.—In another column, "a lady who has had several years experience in conducting institutions for young ladies in the Southern States, desires a situation in a private family, or as French teacher in a school of high grade." From what we know of her, we recommend her. Her pen has often assisted to make this paper pleasant and instructive.

A GOOD MALE TEACHER.—"An unmarried gentleman, of European birth and education, and of several years experience as a teacher in the South, desires a situation in some literary institution." Hand his notice in another column. From our knowledge of him, we recommend him.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.—This promising institution is under the control of the Louisiana Conference. Rev. Dr. Tuwaitt has been its President for a number of years, and has been remarkably popular. He has now resigned, however, and the next session will open under the Presidency of Rev. Charles B. Stuart, of Virginia, who is to be at Mansfield early in September. We trust the institution will continue to grow and do good. It is in a fine region, where such an institution is indispensable.

NASHVILLE FEMALE ACADEMY.—Rev. G. M. Everhart, Principal, has secured the services of Mrs. Jane T. H. Cross.

WALNUT GROVE CAMP-MEETING, near Jackson's Ferry, Cargill circuit, La. Conference, embraces the 3d Sabbath in September.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

A HALE OLD MAN.—Judge Dewey, of Watertown, N. Y., aged 94, is not only the oldest living graduate of Yale College, but the best rifle shot in his neighborhood. The Times says he can walk easily and rapidly, preserves his mental faculties to a remarkable extent, and can see with great distinctness. He recently beat a large number of boys who were striving for the honor of "best shot," putting the ball into the heart of the target, which stood seventy-five rods distant from the foot-line.

CLOSE TOGETHER.—Major Culbertson, who has just come from the Rocky Mountains, says that the head waters of the Missouri and Columbia rivers are so near together, "that he at one time drank from the Missouri, on the east side of the Rocky Mountains, and a half hour afterwards from the Columbia, on the Pacific."

MINOT'S LEDGE LIGHT HOUSE.—It is announced that this Light House will be completed and lighted up in September next by one of the first order of Fresnel Lights. The last stone of the building was laid on the 20th of June, and when it is finished as designed, it will be, in the opinion of a writer for the National Intelligencer, one of the grandest achievements in the world, not even excepting the far-famed Eddystone, in the English Channel.

"NOVEL ENTERPRISE.—A novel enterprise has just been projected in Chautauqua county, New York. Dr. B. T. Phillips, of Pre'onia, has purchased the entire Cassadaga Lake, intending to dredge it, and thus obtain, for fertilizing purposes, the marl with which its bed is covered.

EARTHQUAKE IN KENTUCKY.—A severe shock of earthquake was felt in Henderson, Ky., at half past nine o'clock on the morning of the 7th inst., causing much consternation during the night or ten seconds—so the telegraph reports.

A METEOR.—A great Meteor was seen over a large extent of country on the night of the 2d inst. We have accounts of its appearance at various places in Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina. According to accounts the spectacle was magnificent.

A MAN FALLS TWO MILES IN A PARACHUTE.—Professor Steiner, the aeronaut has been astonishing the people of St. Lawrence county, N. Y., by his feats. He made an ascension, a few days ago, in company with another, and when at the height of two miles, Steiner took a parachute and descended to the earth. The spectators were thrilled at the sight, and stood breathless as the descending aeronaut was descending. He landed safely, however. This is long been a favorita feat with the English and French aeronats. A parachute is made chiefly of silk or canvass, in the fdm of an umbrella, so as to gather the air in its descent, and therefore fall steadily with its weight suspended underneath. The contains no gas, and the aeronaut has no control over it except that his weight keeps it steady and right side up in its descent.

A PUBLIC BENEFACTOR.—The Boston Transcript, in noticing the death of the Hon. Jonathan Phillips, who was for nearly sixty years prominent in works of religious benevolence and education in New England, says: "He was the largest contributor in Boston in aid of the Atlantic expedition which has left our shores. His recent donation of a chime of bells to (Rev. Dr. Gannett's,) is fresh in public remembrance. He contributed ten thousand dollars toward the erection of the Music Hall, and also gave ten thousand dollars to the Boston Public Library."

THE ECLIPSE.—The Coast Survey steamer Bibb, which on the 18th July, arrived at Sydney, Nova Scotia, on the solar eclipse, bound for New York. It is understood that the stations, on met with great success as to the weather and their observations.

CRANBERRY CROP.—It is stated that the cranberry crop in Massachusetts this year will exceed that of any previous year.

U. S. ARMY.—The number of officers in the regular army of the United States who have risen from the ranks is twenty-three. It is not generally known that there is a law providing for the bestowal of commissions on deserving soldiers.

THE NEW YORK JAPANESE EMBASSY SWINDLE.—The New York Board of Councilmen has refused, by a vote of seventeen to six, to concur with the Board of Aldermen in appropriating the $105,000 for defraying the expenses of receiving the Japanese.

FAST TRAVELING.—The Indianapolis Journal says that passengers have gone from New Orleans to that city, under the arrangement of the summer time tables, in less than two days and a half. That is pretty fast traveling.

UNION COLLEGE, N. Y.—Bishop Potter having declined the honor of re-election to the Presidency of the Alumni Association of the Union College, the Hon. Wm. H. Seward has been chosen to succeed him.

PLEASURE TRAVEL TO LAKE SUPERIOR.—The Detroit Advertiser says the pleasure travel to the delightful regions of Lake Superior has set in with a vigor never before witnessed. Notwithstanding there are so many steamers in the trade, nearly every one leaves full to overflowing with passengers.

THE LAKE TRADE.—The Northern papers report that the carrying trade on the Lakes is more active than it has been at any time since 1858, the services of all vessels that can carry grain being in demand.

VICKSBURG, SHREVEPORT AND TEXAS RAILROAD.—This road has been completed across the Bayou Macon, and on the 15th, (to-day) the cars will run to Delhi, where there will be a grand celebration and barbecue.

MORE METEORS COMING.—A scientific correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger says that the week beginning the 16th, and ending the 23d of July, was favorable to the production of electrical phenomena, and on the 19th and 20th, the aurora was beautiful, quite unusual for July: the meteor of the 20th was magnificent. Conditions will be again favorable during the week from the 15th to the 23d of August, and from the 12th to the 16th of September; and those who have leisure will, in all probability, be highly entertained should they look heavenward on the nights of those days, particularly 16th, 17th, and 18th of August, the 14th, 15th, and 16th of September.

STREET RAILROAD IN MILWAUKEE.—Milwaukee is joyful over the completion of her first street horse railroad, called the River and Lake Shore Railroad. The cars commenced running over it on the 5th inst.

TIMOTHY WM. GRAHAM, a well known citizen of Alabama, who had served the people of that State in many public capacities, and was highly esteemed, died at his residence, a few miles from Prattville, on the 7th inst., after a long and painful illness. He was nearly 80 years of age.

ANOTHER METEOR.—Another meteor was seen in the Middle States on the evening of the 6th inst. Its appearance was at about half-past seven, Philadelphia time, when the twilight had not deepened enough to give it a fair opportunity for the display of its luster. It is thought by observers that, had it been later in the evening, it would have rivaled in brilliancy the meteor of the 20th of July. It was seen in the west; its direction was northeasterly; its altitude (as observed near Philadelphia) estimated at from fifteen to forty degrees; and it had a tail, or train of fire, variously reckoned, by different observers, at four or five degrees, and "about eight feet." The next morning there was an aerolral display, which was seen as far South as Augusta, Ga.

RETURNED.—General Cass returned to Washington on the 10th inst., after an absence of four weeks in Detroit. The Constitution says the General is much improved in health. He has resumed his duties in the State Department.

FLORIDA AND ALABAMA RAILROAD.—This Railroad is already completed from Pensacola to the Alabama State line, and in operation.

The Georgia Western Railroad Company, extending from Atlanta, Ga., to Jacksonville, Alabama, a distance of ninety miles, has been organized.

Dr. John Hellinger, a well-known citizen of Charleston, died in that city on the 13th inst., in his 56th year.

It is stated that the offerings in the New York diocese of the Catholic Church for the Pope will amount to more than fifty thousand dollars.

Colonel James S. Speed, formerly Mayor of Louisville, died, on the 7th inst., at Chicago, where he had resided since 1855.

SALISBURY, MD., NEARLY DESTROYED BY FIRE.—The town of Salisbury, Somerset county, Md., was nearly consumed on the 8th inst. Over forty dwelling houses, stores, etc., were destroyed. The town is represented as almost in complete ruins. The Episcopal Church, one of the oldest in the State, was destroyed. A large amount of personal property, goods, etc., were saved, though the aggregate loss is very great. Most of the sufferers were insured. The origin of the fire is not known, but it is supposed to have been the work of an incendiary.

THE GREAT EASTERN'S PASSAGE HOME.—The Baltimore American, of the 11th, referring to the Great Eastern, then lying in Annapolis Roads, says: "It is learned from the principal engineers of the leviathan, that on the return trip to Europe it is designed to make a quick trip, if it can be effected by brisk working of the engines. Should all the circumstances prove favorable, they calculate on making the voyage in seven and a half days. They will work up to twenty-five pounds of steam on the square inch, which has not yet been attained for any considerable distance. The boilers, according to the Government test, are considered safe at fifty pounds."

THE LATE EARTHQUAKES IN KENTUCKY.—The Louisville Commercial, referring to the shock of an earthquake at Henderson, Kentucky, on the morning of the 7th inst., says: "The shock was distinctly felt here in vibrations, more especially in the upper stories of buildings. We saw water violently shaken, and felt a distinct trembling of the building in which we lodge. The shock lasted probably five seconds."

SMOKING.—We learn from the Vicksburg Sun, that at the residence of Mrs. Rowane, near Bovina, in Warren county, Miss., on the 13th inst., two youths, her sons, quarreled at the dinner table about a piece of peach pie. From words they got to blows, which ended in the younger one being stabbed by the elder. Death resulted immediately.

FROST.—We already have accounts of frost in the North.—There was a slight frost near Bangor, Maine, on the night of the 27th ult., and in Chautauqua county, New York, and the vicinity of Grand Rapids, Michigan, on the night of the 31st ult.

GEORGIA UNIVERSITY.—We learn from the Georgia papers that Judge Lumpkin has declined the position of Chancellor of the State University, proffered him by the Board of Trustees.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT JUDGE.—The Hon. Charles J. Jenkins has accepted the seat on the Bench of the Supreme Court of Georgia tendered him by Governor Brown.

GRAND EXHIBIT OF SHOOTING STARS.—The New Haven (Conn.) Palladium contains the following communication: "Observations of the here show that the annual meteoric display of August has not failed this year. Between the P. M. (9th) and 3 A. M. (10th) 565 different shooting stars were seen by a corps of observers stationed on the top of a high building in this city."

GRAND METEORIC DISPLAY.—The Norfolk (Va.) Argus, of the 11th, says: "On Thursday night between 10 and 12 o'clock, there was a meteoric display of great beauty and brilliancy.—The 'shooting stars' were seen in various directions, hurrying athwart the sky, like fiery serpents engaged in exciting pastime in the vast regions of space above."

PROSPERITY OF VICKSBURG.—According to the report of the City Assessor, the taxable value of the property in Vicksburg is $1,995,530, being an increase over last year of $212,850.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Great Britain.—The letter of the Emperor Napoleon to the French Minister in London, although an "important and peaceful letter" has not caused any stoppage of the preparations for England's defence against invasion. The House of Commons, on the 2d inst., voted two millions of pounds sterling, the amount at present asked for by the Government, for the fortification of the arsenals, dockyards, coast, etc. It also appears that the Government has decided that the whole iron plated steam floating batteries are to be put in thorough repairs, for immediate service! also that all the steam war ships in the home ports, are to be in readiness for any emergency.—These facts, coupled, with that other important fact, that Great Britain declines to take any active part in the expedition to Syria, indicate that the Government is in possession of information, not known to the public, which warrants them in making every possible preparation for whatever may occur.—Queen Victoria has gone to the Highlands of Scotland, and on the 7th inst., amid great enthusiasm, she reviewed 20,000 Rifle Volunteers. A bill has been introduced in the House of Commons providing for the amalgamation of the European and Native armies in India. The House has again passed a bill for abolishing the heavy duty on paper, so there is a prospect of another collision between the Lords and Commons, the Lords it will be recollected, having not long ago, to the great surprise of every body, defeated a similar measure after it had passed the Commons. We shall look for the action of the Lords on the bill with much interest, as it is something new for that body to assume the power of rejecting bills imposing or reducing taxation.

France.—The Emperor, at last accounts, was at the Chalons Camp. Great preparations were making for the Syrian Expedition and several transports with troops had sailed.

Austria and Prussia.—The official Prussian Gazette referring to the meeting of the Emperor of Austria and the Prince Regent of Prussia at Teplitz, says:

"The hopes which had been entertained in reference to the meeting of the two Sovereigns at Teplitz have not been disappointed. The approach to a better understanding between the two Cabinets has been promoted by this meeting in the manner to be desired. The frank and friendly meeting of the two Princes and their principal advisers, and the mutual exchange of their views, have brought the relative positions of the two States into a clearer light. A mutual understanding on the most important questions of European policy has also been found to exist. It is therefore, by no means possible to arrive at the condition of a sincere union. In this union Germany will find fresh guarantees for her security, and may hope that in future the importance of her interests will weigh heavier in the balance of power in Europe. Europe will, by the Teplitz meeting, obtain fresh guarantees for the maintenance of public peace and for the respect of the equilibrium.

Rome.—All the intelligence from the Papal States is that "the popular movement has been suppressed." This we are not inclined to believe to the full extent. The popular movement may, for good reasons, have been arrested for a time, but we doubt very much its having been suppressed.

Naples and Sicily.—The accounts from Naples and Sicily are as they have been, indefinite, and in some respects contradictory. From Naples we hear that all attempts to conclude an armistice with Garibaldi have failed; that the Minister of War has drawn troops from Abruzzi, for the purpose of concentrating an army around the city of Naples and that two Neapolitan Regiments in Calabria have mutinied with cries of "Viva Garibaldi." Fears of an insurrection throughout the kingdom of Naples everywhere prevailed: the Neapolitan troops, it appears, cannot be depended upon for fealty to the Bourbon and Garibaldi's standing in Calabria was anxiously looked for as the signal for a general rising. From Sicily we hear that large numbers of volunteers are continually arriving at Palermo to join Garibaldi and that his forces had invested Fort Scilla, opposite Messina.

Turkey.—It appears by the latest accounts that there have been serious outbreaks in Turkey between the Christian and Musulman population, and that fears are entertained of a general outbreak. Husshan Intrigue, the Turkish government intimates, has been an effective agency in inciting these disturbances.

Syria.—In both Houses of the British Parliament on the 3d inst., the affairs of Syria were debated. Ministers explained that a protocol had been drawn up at Paris, by the Ambassadors of the great powers, in which it was determined that on the requisition of the Porte a force of 12,000 troops should be sent to Syria, half of which would be furnished by France. It was provided that their stay should not exceed six months. Another protocol was also signed, calling upon the Porte to carry out its engagements with respect to the Christians, which it had entered into in 1856, but it was provided that no right of intervention should be granted on future occasions. The latest news from Syria announces the arrest of the Governor of Damascus, by orders of Fuad Pacha, the Turkish Envoy. The Governor of Beyrout had been arrested previously. It is believed that the new envoy is prepared to act vigorously and in concert with the European commissioners named thither. Accounts from St. Petersburg state that the Government of Russia will send four ships of the line and two frigates to Syria to protect the Christians.

China.—At last accounts from China, the insurgents were said to be within fourteen miles of Pekin. Hostile operations by the combined British and French forces had not commenced but the preparations were rapidly progressing.

THE NEAPOLITAN ARMY.—The army numbers by all 81,390 men, to which must be added the gendarmerie, 8000 strong, and a reserve of 3200 men. But this is only the peace footing. In time of war it is possible to increase the number of troops, by the mobilization of the reserve, to 150,000 or 180,000.

DISRAELI.—It is stated by an English paper that the health of the Right Hon. Benjamin Disraeli is not good, and that he has at his contemplation to visit this country so soon as his duties will permit.

A CRIMEAN HERO JOINING GARIBALDI.—The London correspondent of the New York Herald, in his letter of July 28th, writes: "Who do you think I saw on his way to Sicily to join Garibaldi? Who but the gallant Captain Wyston, so well known among your 'first circles' at New York—the young Crimean hero, who got shot off his horse at the charge of the Light Brigade, the famous 'six hundred,' at Balaklava—the brave young Englishman, who goes into the war for humanity's sake, and who, like Lafayette, will assist on paying all his own personal expenses. He went out some ten days ago, and if he fall it will be with his face to the foe."

THE ECLIPSE IN ALGIERS, AFRICA.—The late eclipse, having been nearly total at Algiers, caused great terror among the natives. On the top of their terraces they made a noise with pestles and mortars; or lighted in their rooms small wax candles. They called to mind with alarm that, according to tradition, Algiers is to be one day destroyed under similar circumstances by the sea rising.

THE SYRIAN MASSACRES.—As the detailed accounts begin to arrive from Syria, we find that the massacres have been much more extended and more cruel in their character, than had been supposed. From a London letter in the New York Commercial Advertiser, we extract the following: "These accounts are written mostly by the French Jesuits in that country, but we have no reason for doubting their authority. From the South of Saida, to the East of Beirut, over a surface of three days travel in length and two in breadth, a study of cruelty where the Christians were numerous, prosperous and happy, there remains to-day out a single village, not a single house standing. The homes were burned from the cellars, so as to destroy them completely; the crops of silk (one of the principal industries of the country) and of wheat, the cattle, the money and jewelry of the Christians are all lost. The number of killed in this district alone is thus summed up: Massacred by treason, 6940, of whom twenty-five were Christian emirs; killed in fighting, 662; priests and inoffensive indigenous ecclesiastics killed, about 100; inoffensive missionary Jesuits killed, five; villages and hamlets of Christians burned, 325. Of those who escaped from this section, the Sisters of Charity and the Jesuit Fathers at Beirut, Ghaza and Saida are nourishing 2000; the rest are camped along the coast, living upon charity. At Deir-el-Kamar 500 victims were collected in the seraglio of the Turkish Governor, hoping to find safety under his protection; they were all massacred under his eyes, by the assassins, and like so many sheep in a pen. The richest man among the killed, a young man of 32, after giving up all his property, was butchered by inches in presence of his young wife, in the same seraglio, the Governor looking on and encouraging the butchers in their savage cruelties. The wife is now at Beirut."

WHO BEGAN THE SYRIAN TROUBLES.—The Paris correspondent of the London Times says that the point as to who really began the outrages in the Lebanon is greatly contested, but it seems admitted that both Maronites and Druses had been long supplied with fire-arms.

SHAKSPEARE IN AUSTRALIA.—On the 23d of April last a public meeting was held at the Town-hall, Melbourne, for the purpose of determining the steps to be taken to commemorate suitably the three hundredth anniversary of the birthday of Shakespeare. It was resolved that a statue be erected in Melbourne, on some public site, and that a subscription be invited from all in the colony who spoke the English language, and that the co-operation of foreigners be cordially received.

THE SUNKEN FLEET AT SEBASTOPOL.—Mr. Gowan, the American engaged in raising the sunken fleet at Sebastopol, writes to a friend in London: "On July 9th I raised and brought alongside the wharf the 60 gun frigate Kouleichi, the large masts of which stood upright in the centre of the harbor. She is in good condition. Since you left I have raised twelve vessels, among them four wooden, and one iron war steamer, of 260 horse power each. The steamer Vladimir will be the next one, and after her will be the line of battle ships. I have paid great attention to the reparation of the cemeteries where your brave countrymen are buried, and have ornamented the cemeteries where they repose. I have also caused extensive repairs to be made to the graves of the French and Sardinians who were killed during the war, and in some cases I have covered with concrete the graves of your generals.

SPAIN A FIRST-RATE POWER.—The Paris correspondent of the London Morning Post writes, under date of July 23d: "I believe I may assure you the great Powers have agreed to consider Spain as a first-rate power, and she will in future be called upon to deliberate in all general European questions with the same weight as England, France, Russia, Austria, and Prussia. All negotiations, therefore, on this subject are closed."

The census bills for Great Britain and Ireland have passed both houses of Parliament.

Since our last issue we have received the following intelligence from Mexico, Central and South America, etc.:

MEXICO.—At the last accounts Miramon was still in full retreat, and hotly pursued by the Liberals. His party, it is said, despairs of success. The Spanish Commodore at vera Cruz had made a peremptory demand upon the Government for the release of the Spanish bark Maria Concepcion, which was captured as a part of the Marin expedition, but Juarez had peremptorily refused to give her up.

CENTRAL AMERICA.—At last accounts, Guatamala was politically quiet. The Cochineal crop this year is small, but the quality is good. From Costa Rica we hear that the Fourth of July was handsomely celebrated in San Jose by the Americans, the Government also honoring the day. From Honduras we have exciting news. It appears that Gen. William Walker, of whose expedition we have before had accounts, made his appearance before the town of Traxillo, Honduras, on the 5th inst., and took possession without serious opposition. The greatest excitement prevailed. The object of this attack upon Traxillo is unknown. We only know that the expedition sailed from the Island of Cozumel on the 20th ult., as supposed for Nicaragua direct. The yellow fever, it is said, has proved terribly fatal at Belize. From Panama we hear that the expectations of the German settlers in Chiriqui are not likely to be realized, and that they do not find so good an opening in the country as they anticipated.

SOUTH AMERICA.—From Peru we have a glowing account of the first celebration of the Anniversary of our Independence at Callao—also at Islay. From Brazil we learn that Prince Alfred, of England, on his way to the Cape of Good Hope, touched at Rio and was handsomely received by the Emperor.

POLITICAL.

The Georgia Breckinridge Convention met at Milledgeville, on the 8th inst., one hundred counties being represented by 295 delegates, and nominated an electoral ticket, including the Hon. C. J. McDonald, of Cobb, and the Hon. H. R. Jackson, of Chatham, as electors for the State at large.

The Vermont Breckinridge Convention met at White River Junction on the 7th inst., and nominated an Electoral and a State ticket. The Convention was large and enthusiastic. Robert Harvey, of Barnet, is the nominee for Governor.

The Maryland Democratic State Convention endorsed the nominations of Breckinridge, and withdrew from the electoral ticket the names of Henry May and M. N. Taylor, Douglasites.

The Maine Bell and Everett State Convention was held in Portland on the 7th instant. The Hon. Phineas Barnes of Portland was nominated for Governor and a committee was appointed to nominate Electors at large.

The Georgia Douglas Convention met in Milledgeville on the 15th instant, and nominated an Electoral ticket, including the Hon. A. H. Stephens and the Hon. Augustus R. Wright as Electors for the State at large. There were sixty counties represented and 108 delegates present.

MISSOURI POLITICS.—The St. Louis Bulletin publishes a card signed by Senators Polk and Green, declaring their suggestion of a State Convention, in which the friends of Judge Douglas should be represented, as well as the Democrats adhering to the principles of the party enunciated in the platform of the last Convention, has been rendered nugatory by the opposition of the friends of Douglas, and they therefore submit to those Democratic votes standing on the Missouri platform, who are resolved to maintain the principles enunciated at the Breckinridge National Convention, the necessity of perfecting the organization of the party anew, by conducting the Presidential canvass in the State energetically and successfully, and they respectfully propose the assembling of a State Convention. James M. Hughes, a member of the Democratic National Committee for Missouri, concurred in the policy proposed by Senators Green and Polk, has called a Convention, to be held at Jefferson City on the 20th of September, which Convention will revise the electoral ticket, and take such further action as the interests of the party may require."

The New York Douglas Convention met at Syracuse on the 15th inst., and nominated William Kelly, of Duchess, for Governor; William F. Allen, of Oswego, for Lieutenant-Governor; William W. Wright, of Ontario, for Canal Commissioner; and William C. Rhoads, for State Prison Inspector. The Convention then adjourned till next morning.

The Georgia Bell and Everett Convention met in Milledgeville on the 13th inst., and nominated an Electoral ticket, including Benjamin Hill and Judge Law as Electors for the State at large.

CITY NEWS.

About six o'clock on Tuesday morning, 14th inst., fire was discovered under the stairs of Mrs. Wilson's boarding house, on Poydras street, between Commerce and New Levee streets. The building, occupied in the upper part by Mrs. Wilson, was the property of the Poydras Asylum. The lower portion was divided into three tenements. The corner was occupied as a large confectionery, by Mr. Carrigan; the next tenement by a shoe store, and the third by Heim's clothing store. The building, and most of the contents, were destroyed. The fire then communicated to Smith's 1st house, a large three story building, owned by A. N. Lask, and destroyed that also, as well as the adjoining building. The loss by this fire is estimated at from $30,000 to $40,000. It is covered by insurance. There can be no doubt as to this being the act of an incendiary. Said to relate, an elderly English woman, who was employed as a seamstress, in Mrs. Wilson's, was burned to death while attempting to escape.

Messrs. Flint and Jones, the well known furniture dealers on Royal-street, whose store was saved from destruction at the great fire on the night of the 9th inst., principally through the exertions of Perseverance Fire Company, No. 13, have handsomely presented that Company with a check for $1000.

"The McKeever's Southwestern Express Company" has been organized in this city. Its business will be almost exclusively confined to Louisiana and Texas. The Company, it is understood, will be in full operation by the 15th of Sept.

On the evening of the 14th inst., just before dark, an unusually large meteor was seen shooting athwart the western portion of the heavens. If it had made its appearance after dark, it would have been a most brilliant exhibition.

There was a Bell and Everett mass meeting in Washington square, third District, on Wednesday evening, 15th inst., at which there was a very large attendance, and much enthusiasm displayed.

A Breckinridge and Lane ratification meeting was held in Canal-street, on Thursday evening, 16th inst. The attendance was very large, the proceedings quite animated, and in every respect the demonstration was an imposing one.

The Delta says the returns of the census, so far as received, justify the expectation that the population of the city of New Orleans will be shown to be near 200,000. In the winter, at the height of the business season, the population will be more than a quarter of a million.

Mayor Monroe has very properly issued a notice to the Police, that while he does not desire to interfere with their political preferences, yet he positively forbids their taking an active and prominent part in any political demonstration.

The city is still unusually healthy for the season. Only 130 deaths last week and none of yellow fever. The weather, since the storm on the 11th, has been more pleasant. We have cool mornings and evenings, but in the middle of the day is very warm. Cotton is coming in freely; some of our summer tourists are already returning, and on every hand we see preparations for the influx of our large floating population, and for a large business in the coming season.

A serious disaster occurred on the Carrollton Railroad on Sunday evening, 11th inst. Shortly before 8 o'clock, the down train from Carrollton stopped at Jackson street to put off passengers, as customary, and was standing still when the Jefferson and Lake Express train came up behind at full speed, and ran into the hindmost car, jamming that against the next one preceding, and crushing both. The passengers of the forward train were getting out at the time, and the effects of the collision may be imagined. A large number of persons (thirty or forty it is said) were thrown, and more or less bruised and scratched. A little boy about six years old, who is believed to be of a German family, was killed; another child had its skull fractured and was taken away in a dying condition; another child received a large gash in the throat. A little boy named Denis Frank, the son of Mr. John Frank, residing on Marias street, between St. Louis and Toulouse, had his ankle dislocated, and was otherwise so badly injured that he died during the night. Mr. A. Choppin, brother of Mr. S. Choppin, received a compound fracture of the left leg, a little above the ancle, and to save his life it was found necessary to amputate his leg below the knee joint. The operation has been performed, and at last accounts Mr. C. was doing well. The express train was at full speed and had a light blazing in front when it ran into the passenger train. It was the duty of the engineer to stop at Jackson street, or at least to slack speed when another train was seen ahead, which could hardly escape notice, although it is said that the conductor of the passenger train neglected to have a lamp swung at the hind end of the train, as is required by the rules of the road when a train is at a halt. The affair will be fully investigated. John Sullivan, the Engineer in charge of the Lake Express train, made his escape, but the Police are in active search for him.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, August 20, 1860.

Operations in our general market are still of a moderate character, though in some articles a fair amount of business has been done, considering the advanced period of the season. In Cotton we have noticed rather more movement with a firmer market under the influence of more favorable advices from Europe and accounts of injury to the crop from the long and excessive drouth in many sections of the interior. In Tobacco the transactions have been on a limited scale, and in Sugar the supply is too light to allow scope for any considerable operations. In Western Produce there have been some few variations which will be found detailed below. In Coffee we notice a further and considerable advance.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that there prevails considerable irregularity, but the market has generally shown more steadiness than we have had occasion to notice for some weeks past, and closed at about the range of our quotations.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 2,115,133 bales, against 1,654,191 bales to same date last year, and the increase of the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 781,875 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is an increase of 703,640 bales to Great Britain, and of 147,153 to France, while to other foreign ports there is a decrease of 49,176 bales.

ALLINE ELWIN: A TALE OF ALABAMA.

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Chapter XVII.

"O, why should the hearts of the noblest be shaken,
While calmly reposing 'neath love's sunny beam?
If they slumber so sweetly, why should they awaken
To muse on the past and to weep o'er a dream?"

There was situated near the home of Emma West an old mill, the pond of which was fed from springs which proceeded from under the side of a long, high hill, which was very steep, and covered with tall trees and thick underwood. The path leading to this spot was almost entirely shaded by the wood which we have spoken of before, and sloped gradually to the water's edge. The dam had been thrown up nearly a half mile below where the path ended. The mill, which was situated below, was to be gained by skiffs and canoes, which were always ready for service or pleasure on the side nearest the village; or by a winding and almost perpendicular path, which led up the hill and thence on along the sloping side; but this was not only inconvenient but disagreeable, and was seldom used. It was a beautiful place, and very inviting to parties of pleasure during the summer months. To this scene of romantic beauty Frank had planned a fishing excursion; and on a bright evening in August he, with Edward Leslie and Percy, together with Alline, Ellen, Alice and others, set out to spend a few hours in amusement and recreation. Joy and happiness beamed from their bright faces. Life was full of hope and light to them; triumph and complete success awaited them in the future to which they looked; and in which they anticipated naught but noon-day's unclouded splendor.

Alline's pale brow, though saddened by the blight of early sorrow, wore this evening, as she tripped on by the side of Frank Carlton, an expression of subdued joyousness and of trusting faith, which gave a holy depth of earnest feeling to her sweet though shadowed face. And Alice, though among them, was not of them, for she seemed absorbed more in her own meditations, and gently but with heroic firmness and determination, to be seeking to view this life calmly, dwelling upon its ills and pleasures—seeking, it is true, to appreciate the good which lay in her pathway, and to be thankful for the radiance which had shed its beams of brightness upon her young life, but equally endeavoring to discipline her heart to bear with firm, uncompromising patience the disappointments and sorrows which had already begun to cast their fitful shadows around her.

"Alice," began Percy, after having walked on in silence for some time, "I have fancied of late that you look paler and even thinner than usual. Is it so, or am I mistaken? I have been strangely anxious for some time. O, Alice! you know not, can never realize how dear you are to me."

"Unless," she answered, interrupting him, "I measure your depth of affection by my own for you. Then, think you, Maitland, that I cannot appreciate yours?"

"But do you ever do this, Alice? Then, indeed, I am beloved. Bless you, my Alice! may I ever prove worthy of you, darling! But you have not yet told me—are you not thinner than you were some time ago?"

"Perhaps I am, Percy. But, then, you know I had a severe attack after Ellen's party for not heeding your kind words, and since then I have not felt altogether so well, Percy." She added, after a few moments' pause, "could you not, think you, become reconciled to living without me, if you knew it to be the will of God? Could you not drain the bitter draught even to its dregs, knowing that a Father's hand had prepared the cup?"

"What, Alice, do you mean?" he asked, after a moment's hesitation, gazing with a troubled expression into her face. "Surely, you are not seriously unwell? What is it, Alice? I am perplexed."

She returned his look calmly, and firmly answered, though her heart was troubled, for many a moment of anxious suspense had she realized before she had gained courage and strength to speak to Percy of the fearful ravages which disease had made upon her delicate frame, before she felt the necessity of blighting his sanguine hope of future happiness. As for her own hopes and dreams, they had long been banished from her mind. But she saw how tenaciously, and with what an earnest, heartfelt trust, he clung to the vision of bliss which had yielded him so much joy for years; and she shrank with fear and grief from the painful task of undeceiving him, for full well she knew that her life was fast drawing to a close, and she had determined for God to live and for God to die. Vainly had she striven to stem the tide of her boundless, unfathomable love for him, who had given her in return all the measure of his devotion; but she had conquered her desire and yearning after a life of joy to be spent with him on earth, and thus she answered him:

"Not here in this world shall we ever be more to each other than we are now. But, O! in heaven, Percy, we shall be for ever joined around the throne of God, where no taint of sin and no earthly alloy shall ever mar or blight for a moment nor long eternity of love! Yes, this is what I mean, Maitland, that our Heavenly Father sees it best to part us for a while, that He may reunite us in a land of never-fading flowers, where noontide forever reigns and pleasure never cloys!"

The tones of her soft, sweet voice ceased, and a few moments of silence remained unbroken, save by the deep sighs which came from the bosom of Percy. She raised her calm, mournful eyes to that face from which she should have received encouragement and strength to bear the care and affliction which had fallen upon her young life, but his heart was all too heavy to comfort and sustain here, though he had but indistinctly caught the import of her words. She raised her eyes, and caught his pale, bewildered gaze of grief fixed upon her, and she half regretted that she had broken his spell of happiness.

"O, Percy, look not thus!" she exclaimed, "but remember you suffer not alone; as I have shared your joy, so I now bear my portion of your pain and grief. Look not so amazed. I have hoped for some time past that you would gradually realize my situation, and by the aid of our Divine Creator become reconciled to his will."

"O, Alice, this is all an illusion! Tell me, assure me that it is, for I have too deeply loved thee to give thee up without utter despair. What will over breathe of gladness to my heart again? There will be no scene of joy, no tone of music, when you are gone. Naught but a blank, or endless night, in which no light, no beauty of sky or vision of earth's brightness, can ever penetrate!"

"Percy, Percy! speak not thus, for if you thus yield yourself up to vain regrets and despairing thoughts, I will have lived for you in vain. I would not have you forget me from your heart, but let it be a light, a joy, that shall yield you pleasure, not sadness or sorrow. The time spent together here has been blissful and sweet, and let this remembrance bring you peace, and teach you to bear my loss without despair."

They had now arrived at the pond, and the gaiety of those around them, together with the hurry of preparing the boats to take them to the mill, served to divert the minds of Alice and Percy from their sadness; and the beauty of the scene beguiled them from much of their hopelessness and grief.

THE DRUSES OF LEBANON.

There is perhaps no people in the world of whom, though living on the borders of civilization, and visited as they are by travelers from all parts, and forming one of the many sects which inhabit a land most interesting to all who read Holy Writ, so very little known as these Druses, who are now shocking us with their murderous exploits. And yet they constitute the most courageous and warlike body in Syria; perhaps the most united tribe of warriors in the world. Moreover, everything about them is highly calculated to excite curiosity and inquiry. The mystery which has so long veiled the secrets of their creed, no one has yet penetrated, although many have pretended to have done so; and such of their religious books as have found their way into Europe, have by no means cast that light which it was hoped they would upon their dogmas.

One must be born a Druse, or not belong to them at all—nascitur, non fit—they admit no converts amongst them. They inhabit the southern portion of Lebanon and the western part of Anti-Lebanon. Throughout the mountain there are forty large villages belonging exclusively to their tribe, and upwards of two hundred in which the population is made up of Maronite Christians, Druses, and followers of the Greek Church. The Druse men capable of bearing arms in Lebanon are about fifteen thousand in number. Physically they are one of the finest races of men in the world, and each individual amongst them has an independent look and bearing about him which I have witnessed in no other Asiatics, save perhaps the Rajpoots of India. They have no priesthood, properly so called; but the whole tribe is divided into Akkals, or initiated, and uninitiated. The Akkals do not inherit the dignity; they must be proved, tried, and then initiated into the mysteries of their order, and they form the only approach to anything like a priesthood which the Druses possess. There are female as well as male Akkals, and both are distinguished from the Djahils, or uninitiated—the rest of the Druse world. In fact, by their simplicity in attire, the absence of any gold or silver ornament on their persons, by—which in the East is the greatest singularity possible—their never smoking; their abstinence from any thing like superfinity in dress, the brevity and simplicity of their conversation, and their not joining more than is absolutely necessary in amusement, either public or private. In short, the Akkals are a sort of domestic hermits, although they may, and do, own private property, and practice all the various callings in life like any other men. The fact of belonging to the initiated class does not give them emoluments of any kind, nor any decided rank among their fellow Druses, except in matters of religion; although, as a general rule, most respected men of their nation are Akkals.

The Djahils, or uninitiated, on the other hand, appear to have little or no idea of belonging to any creed whatever; and the younger portions of the men are generally what the Americans would call a "rowdy" set. The Druse places of worship, called bowlees, are situated outside the villages, in the most solitary spots which can be found. They are plain rooms, without any ornament of any kind, and on ordinary occasions can be inspected by any one that likes to do so. If a visitor asks to see one of the Druse holy books, he is invariably shown a copy of the Modern Khoran; but it is well known that they have other books, which they allow no one to see. Some of these have found their way to Europe, and are to be met with in the Imperial Library of Paris, the Bodleian of Oxford, and the British Museum; but these, it is pretty well ascertained, contain nothing which the Druses wish to keep secret; and what is mysterious about their creed has no doubt been handed down by tradition, rather than by any written document.

The bowlees, or temples, of the Druses are open for their religious meeting every Thursday evening, about an hour after sunset. At the commencement of the night's business, Akkals and Djahils both assemble together, when the news of the day and the prices of crops are discussed. At this period a chapter or two of the Moslem Khuran is read, and no objection is made even to strangers being present. This, however, is not a general rule by any means, and it is only Europeans, whom the Druses particularly wish to honor, that they would admit even thus far to the outside, as it were, of their worship. When the evening is a little further advanced, all Djahils are obliged to withdraw; and the howlee becomes like a Freemason's Lodge, closely tiled, or shut, with an armed guard near the door to prevent all intrusion. At these meetings no one save the initiated are ever present, and they often stretch far into the night, so much so, that I have sometimes seen the Akkals going home from their howlees long after midnight. Sometimes, when very important matters have to be discussed, a second selection takes place in the howlees, and the younger Akkals being obliged to withdraw, the elders—the creme de la creme, or those initiated into the highest mystery of the sect—remain alone to deliberate and determine upon the future proceedings of their fellow-religionists, or to discuss much more advanced doctrines of their creed as are only known to the select few. Singular to say, no form of worship, nothing which at all comes near our ideas of prayer, is known to be practised by the Druses. In the large towns of Syria they will often go to the Moslem mosques, and profess to call themselves followers of the prophet. But they hardly impose, nay, they don't seem to wish to impose on anyone by this temporary adherence to the dominant religion; for, in order to avoid the Sultan's conscription, they have been known to make the sign of the cross, profess themselves Christians, and even ask for, nay, sometimes receive the rite of baptism; and they acknowledge, that, according to their creed, it is lawful to profess for a time whatever may be the creed of the most powerful body amongst whom they live. Moreover, they hold concealment and secresy the greatest virtues which a man can practise, and scruple not to assert that a crime only becomes such on being found out. Their bearing, courtesy, and all that we should call good breeding, more particularly amongst the Akkals, would bear comparison with the most refined gentlemen of Europe; and their powers of observation and discrimination of character, are such as could only be expected amongst men of education and travel. This is the more wonderful, as except for an occasional short sojourn in the towns of Syria—St. Jean D'Acre, Tyre, Sidon, Beyrout, Latakia, or Damascus—no Druse ever leaves his native mountains; and beyond reading and writing their native tongue—the Arabic language, and even this until late years has been very partial indeed amongst them—they are destitute of any mental culture whatever.

The Druses marry but one wife; and their women, more particularly those of the higher classes, are kept very secluded indeed. However, although by no means common, divorce is very easy indeed amongst them. A man has but to say to his wife that she is free to return to her father's house, and the divorce is as valid (nor can it be recalled if pronounced), as if in England it had been pronounced by the full Court of Divorce. Nor is it needful that any reason farther than that such is the husband's will should be given for the act, and both parties are at liberty to marry again. The married women wear the ianton, or horn, upon their heads, over which a veil is cast, the latter being drawn close round the face, and leaving only one eye exposed whenever a man of another creed or nation comes near; but those who have lived much in Lebanon, more particularly European ladies, have immense opportunities of seeing the faces of all classes among them. Although by no means void of good looks when young, the women are not nearly so fine a race as the men, and the older females of the peasant classes are perhaps the most hideous old hags it is possible to conceive.

Amongst this strange people I spent nearly six months of the last summer and autumn, having for the health of my family taken up my residence at a village on Mount Lebanoo, in the very centre of the Druse country. At an hour's ride from the village where we lived was the village of Ilisoor, inhabited by some sheiks, or chief, of the Talhook family, and amongst others by the sheik Talhook, who is certainly one of the most remarkable men I have met with in any country.

Sheik Bechir is an Akkal of the Druses, and perhaps there is not a stricter one throughout Lebanon. Throughout the mountain he has the reputation of dealing with magic; and certainly some of the cases of sickness he has cured, as well as the unaccountable tricks he has performed, go far to confirm the general opinion of his fellow-countrymen. An English gentleman long resident in Lebanon, and in whose word the most implicit reliance can be placed, has told me that he has seen at the sheik's bidding, a stick proceed unaided by anything from one end of the room to another. Also, on two earthenware jars being placed in opposite corners of the room, one being filled with water and the other empty, the empty jar moved across the room, the full jar rise and approach its companion, and empty its contents into it, the latter returning to its place in the way that it came. Of late years the sheik has given up these kind of performances, as he declares the long fasts of fifteen and twenty days which he says were necessary to prepare him and give him power over the spirits by which he worked, used to injure his health. So much is certain—on the testimony of some of the most respectable people on the mountain—that when he had to practice these magic arts continually, his health was very bad indeed, and that since he has given them up he has greatly improved.

Partly because of the ride from where I lived to Bisoor, but chiefly because I have a sort of decided inclination to cultivate singular acquaintances, I used often to go over last summer to see Sheik Bechir, and he frequently used to return my visit. At first he positively declined performing any of the tricks of which I had heard so much, declaring that, except to effect cures, he made it a rule to have nothing more to do with the unseen world. However, after we had become more intimate, he one day consented to show me one of the tricks by which he used to astonish the mountaineers and others. He took a common water jar, and after mumbling certain incantations into the mouth of the vessel, placed it in the hands of two persons, selected from the bystanders at hazard, sitting opposite to each other. For a time the jar did not move, the sheik going on all the time reciting very quickly what seemed to me verses from the Koran, and beating time, as it were, with his right hand upon the palm of his left.—Still the vessel remained as it was placed, the sheik getting so vehement in his repetitions, and seemingly so very anxious for the result, that although a cold day and a strong breeze blowing into the divan where we sat, the perspiration flowed freely down his face and ran off his beard. At last the jar began to round, first slowly, and then quicker, until it moved at quite a rapid pace, and made three or four evolutions. The sheik pointed to it as in triumph, and then stopped his recitations, when the jar stopped turning. After perhaps half a minute's silence, he began to recite again, and, wonderful to say, the jar began to turn again. At last he stopped, took the jar out of the hands of those who were holding it, and held it for an instant to my ear, when I could plainly hear a singing noise, as if of boiling water, inside. He then poured the water carefully out of it, muttered something more into his mouth, and gave it to the attendants to be refilled with water and placed where it had stood before, for any one wanting a drink to use. I should have premised that the jar was a common one, which, as is the custom in Syria, stood with others of the same kind near the door for any one to drink out of. When the performance was over, the sheik sank back, as if greatly exhausted, on the divan, and declared that it was the last time he would go through so much fatigue, or perform any more of his magic undertakings, except for the purpose of curing sick people, on any account whatever.

That the feat of making the water-jar turn was a very wonderful one there can be no doubt; nor could I account for it by any natural or ordinary means whatever. But how it was accomplished, or whether any supernatural means whatever were used, I leave others to infer, not having myself formed an opinion on the subject, and intending simply to relate what I was myself an eye-witness of. What I was more curious to learn was, what the sheik himself thought on the subject of spirits being placed at man's disposal, and how he had, or believed he had, acquired the power which he was said to possess.

A few days afterwards he rode over to see me, and we had a long conversation on the subject, which interested me the more, as the sheik was evidently sincere in all he said regarding his belief in the power of spirits, and the means he had used to acquire that power. I should, however, mention that, for his country and position, Sheik Bechir is a wealthy man, having landed property and houses in the mountain to the extent of about six or seven hundred pounds sterling per annum—equal, in consequence, to a country gentleman in England with three thousand a-year; and that he has never been known to work a cure or perform any magic for anything like remuneration, either direct or otherwise.

That he firmly believes in his intercourse with the spiritual world is certain. He asserts that no one can have any magic power unless properly taught; and says that his teacher was an old Mosiem from Morocco—to whom, by the bye, he introduced me, and offered, if I liked to devote five years to the science, to get to teach me! who had, many, many years ago, learnt the art in Egypt. The knowledge of magic, he asserts, cannot only never be taught for money, but even if the pupil gives his teacher anything beyond food and shelter, that teaching will be of no effect. He declares that the science has come down to our days from the time of the Pharaohs, but that there are not now fifty people in the world who have any true knowledge on the subject. The sheik declares himself to be but a very poor proficient in the art, as he never could go through the necessary fasts without injury to his health. And yet, from the accounts of his relatives he must have gone through some severe ordeals. His aunt told me, that on one occasion, some years ago he shut himself up in a room, without either food or water, for two whole days and nights, and on letting himself out he was so weak he could hardly stand. At another time he was locked up in his apartment for a single night, and that on coming out in the morning he was bruised all over the head and body as if with large sticks, having been, as he declared, beaten for several hours by evil spirits. Before undertaking any important cure, he shuts himself up in a darkened room for ten, fifteen, and sometimes thirty days, eating during this time but of plain bread, in quantities barely sufficient to support nature. His greatest triumphs have been in cures of epilepsy and confirmed madness, in which I know of many instances where his success has been most wonderful. He resorts to no severe measures with those brought to him, nor does he use any medicine, simply repeating over them certain incantations, and making passes with his hands, as if mesmerising them.

For severe fevers he has a talisman thread, of which he sends the patient—no matter how far off—enough to tie round his wrists, when the sickness is said to pass away at once. A relation of his own told me that his (the relative's) wife had been afflicted for three years with a swelling, or tumour, of which the European doctors in Beyrout could make nothing, when at last she agreed to consult Sheik Bechir. The latter shut himself up in his room for thirty days, fasting all the time upon very small quantities of bread and water. He then took the case in hand, and after making several passes over the woman's body, she was in five minutes perfectly cured. Although a Druse, the sheik maintains that no words never written by holy mendicants, in that country, he was greatly interested, and said that the greatest magician now living was a certain native of Benares, who had once wandered by Afghanistan, Bukhara, Russia, and Constantinople, to Syria, through Lebanon.

But what surprised me more than anything else about the sheik was the singularly correct description he gave of countries, towns, and even portions of towns, which he could never have seen, having never been out of Syria, and even of some regarding which he could not have read much. That he has picked up here and there a great deal of history, geography, and other general knowledge is certain. Still he can only read Arabic, in which tongue works of information are very limited, and the number of Europeans with whom he has had any intercourse whatever might be counted upon his ten fingers. Moreover, he has never been further from his native mountain than Damascus or Beyrout, and that for only short periods, and at long intervals. He asked me to name any towns in which I had resided, and which I wished him to describe to me. I mentioned amongst others, London, Edinburgh, Calcutta, Bombay, Cahool, Candahar, and Constantinople, each of which he literally painted in words to the very life, noticing the various kinds of vehicles, the dress of the different people, the variety of the buildings, and the peculiarities of the streets with a fidelity which would have been a talent in any one who had visited them, but in a man who had never seen them was truly marvellous. This faculty the sheik does not attribute to anything like magic, but says it is caused by his gathering all sorts of information wherever he can—from books or men—and never forgetting what he has either read or written.

Had Sheik Bechir had the advantage of an European education in his youth, or even if works written in English, French, or German, were not sealed books to him, I am inclined to think that he would be one of the most remarkable men the world has ever seen.

Besides himself, the sheik's family consists of his wife and two grown-up sons. The latter are both Djahils, or noniitiated, one of them having tried to acquire the standing of an Akkal, or initiated, but broke down during his probation, as he found the privations more severe than he could bear. Their mother, however, is an Akkal of the very strictest kind, and is looked on throughout the neighbourhood as a woman of great sanctity. Although on good terms with her husband, she lives apart from him in the same house, for it is the universal custom amongst the Akkals that whenever the wife has had two sons a divorce a thoro takes place. The advent of daughters, does not count in this singular domestic arrangement, and if one of the sons should die, the divorce is annulled until another son is born, when it is resumed again. The reason of this custom is, that as property is equally divided amongst sons, it is thought expedient to prevent the subdivision of land becoming too minute.

On one occasion when I visited Bisoor with a party amongst whom were two or three English ladies, the latter were invited into the harem, or women's apartment, to visit the sheik's wife and some female relatives there assembled. Being by this time on terms of intimacy with the chief and his family, I was asked to join the ladies' party in the harem—a mark of friendship rarely shown to one of our sex who is not a relative. Although the Druse ladies were all veiled, we could, from time to time, see enough of their faces to distinguish their features, and even amongst the younger portion of the party there was not one tolerably good-looking. They appeared, in fact, of quite another race than their husbands, brothers, fathers, and sons. Some of them wore numerous valuable jewels; but the sheik's wife, although clean and neat, was clothed in garments of the most ordinary texture, and wore no ornament of any kind. Coffee, sweetmeats, and fruits, were handed round, and we remained about half an hour in the apartment, until summoned to the breakfast, or midday meal, which had been prepared in one of the outer rooms, and to which both ladies and gentlemen of our party sat down, but at which the Druse ladies did not make their appearance.

The meat was cooked, served, and eaten altogether after the fashion of the country. First a sort of tripod, something like an inverted music-stand, was brought and put down in the middle of the room. Upon this was placed a very large copper, circular tray, nearly four feet in circumference. On this tray the various dishes were set, whilst the whole party squatted round it on the floor. It was curious to observe the contrast formed between fresh-looking English ladies, laughing merry English children, shooting-jacket clad English gentlemen, and gravebearded, white-turbaned, Druse sheiks. A long napkin, which went over the knees of us all—and which the children compared to getting under the sheet—was spread; a score or so of unlearned breadcakes was placed at the hands of the guests, and then, taking up his spoon with a "Bismillah" (in the name of God), our host gave the sign to begin. In the centre was a large pillaff, made of rice boiled in butter, seasoned with pimento, and mixed with mincemeat. This was the pice de resistance, of which everybody eat and cut it with all things. Round this dish—or mountain—of rice, were placed plates of various meat and vegetable stews, all very good, very tasty, and inviting. Our manner of proceeding was in this wise. Each individual would dip his spoon into the rice—keeping carefully to his own corner of the vast heap—and on his way back to his mouth moisten it with the gravy of the dish before him, of which there was one or more for each. Thus the most urgent hunger was satisfied, and we soon began merely to trifle with the unlucky dish of kibbe, and other matters equally solid. Some of the party present had never before been present at a regular Arab entertainment, for in the towns of Syria the fashion amongst all the more respectable natives is to ape the European mode of setting the table and serving the dinner. To the children of our party the whole affair was a high holiday of amusement, their laughter and mistakes amusing the sheiks not a little. During the entire repast nothing stronger than water was drunk, for in Druse houses a single glass of wine or spirits would be thought defiling to the owner. In fact, the Akkals never touch fermented liquor of any kind, and although the Djahils drink sometimes, they never do so in excess, and only in secret, or when persons of other creeds are not present.

When the dinner was over, each person washed his or her hands, one attendant pouring water from a copper jug whilst the other held a large copper basin with a false bottom, so that the dirty water fell through and was not seen, much after the old-fashioned chilumchee, in which we used to wash of yore—it may be so yet—on the "Bengal side" of India. Those amongst us who wore beards were careful to wash them very clean with soap and water. Rose-water was then brought in and sprinkled over every one, after which the usual black, unstrained coffee was served, and each man—excepting, of course, the Akkals who never smoke—was left to his pipe, his thoughts, and the conversation of his neighbours, the ladies of the party returning for the present to the women's apartment.

Orientals seldom talk much immediately after their meals and in this they show their wisdom, for next to piano playing or singing directly after dinner, there is nothing so bad for digestion as talking or listening to the conversation of others. This it is that makes all travellers in the East approve of the open airy rooms, where pipes, narghilees, or cigars are freely allowed, the roomy, easy divans, where a man can sit or recline at his ease, without shocking the ideas of propriety around him, and the universal fixed oriental—and let me add common-sense—idea that clothes and furniture were made for man, not man for his clothes and furniture.

Gradually, however, conversation arose and the universal topic it turned upon was the Chinese war and forthcoming expedition to that country. The Druses are great believers in the powers of England as a military nation; but they one and all said that neither we nor any other nation in the world could ever conquer China. This is owing to the fact of China being to the Druses a sort of spiritual promised land. They look forward to the future advent of the Messiah who is to come from China; and whenever a Druse dies in Syria, they believe that his soul is immediately born again in China, in which country they believe are nimbeless Druses, who one day or other will issue forth, conquer the whole world, re-establish the true faith throughout the world, and punish all unbelievers. This singular belief is the more extraordinary, as the Druses have neither tradition nor record of their ever having been any intercourse between themselves and the Chinese, as indeed we all know very well there never could have been. Their faith in the similarity of their own creed and that of many in the Celestial Empire has always struck persons who heard it as one of the most absurd ideas ever conceived in the minds of uneducated men. It may, however, some day be proved to be otherwise. An American Protestant missionary in Syria told me a short time ago that he had been recently reading a manuscript history of the Druse religion, which a native Syrian Protestant clergyman, who has passed his life amongst the Druses, has lately written, and he believe is about to publish; and it at once struck him what a close affinity there was between many points in their faith and in that of the Buddhists of Burmah, as described by the Rev. Mr. Judson, the well known American Baptist missionary, whose name is so well known in India, and who passed so very many years in Pegu and Ava. It is therefore, quite possible that we may yet discover that in some points of belief and in practice there is more resemblance than we now believe to exist between the Druses and other far Eastern Asiatic sects. But a still more extraordinary belief exists amongst the Druses of the mountain, namely, that there are many Akkals of their creed in the hills of Scotland, who, on account of the dominant religion, are obliged to profess Christianity outwardly, but who, amongst themselves, are as pure Druses of the initiated class as any that exist in Lebanon. After learning that I was a Scotchman, Druses have often questioned me as to whether I was aware that members of their creed existed in that country. This tradition seems to have been handed down to the present generation from the days of the Crusaders, and to have got noised up with the fact that the Templars existed formerly in certain parts of Europe; for certain ceremonies which the Syrian Druses say are practised by their Scottish brethren bear a close resemblance to those of the old Knights-Templar. But it is more likely still—and this is very probably one of the reasons of their supposed affinity with the Chinese—that amongst the Druses, as amongst other semi-civilised nations, certain affiliations and signs of free-masonry have crept in; and they have formed the idea, that wherever traces of the same society exist, the people hold the same religious creed.

After about an hour's repose and smoking, we were rejoined by the ladies of our party, and all prepared to return the visit of Sit Farkl, a celebrated old Druse lady residing in the village, who had on our arrival called upon the Europeans of her own sex who had that morning arrived at Bisoor. The Sit—"Sit," in Arabic, means lady, or mistress of a household—Farkl is, like our host, of the Talhook family, and is an instance, by no means uncommon in Lebanon, of the influence which a talented female may obtain, even amongst a population where women are kept in seclusion and treated as inferiors. This lady is a widow of some seventy-five years old, and is possessed of what in the mountains is looked upon as a large landed property, for it gives her an income of five or six hundred pounds sterling a year. Few measures of any importance are decided upon by the Druses without consulting her, and in their religious mysteries she is one of the very highest amongst the initiated. We found her waiting for us in a sort of large kiosk, or summer-house, built on the roof of her own dwelling, the high windows of which afforded a most extensive view of one of the most magnificent valleys in Lebanon. Here were assembled to meet us nearly all the women of the various sheik families in and about the village, some being veiled, whilst a few of the elder ones had their faces almost uncovered, but even the veils allowed the countenances they were supposed to hide to be seen pretty freely. Amongst the younger ladies there were three or four who might be termed good-looking, and one or two decidedly pretty. But like all other women in Syria, they marry and become mothers so early in life, that at two or three-and-twenty they look past middle age, and at thirty are already old. Like all orientals, the Druse women deem it a great misfortune to have female children and not boys; but a woman who has been married two or three years and had no children at all, is looked on as something both unfortunate and unclean. "A house without children," says the Arab proverb, "is like a hall without a chapter, and a woman who does not bear is like a tree that gives no fruit, only more useless, for the tree may be burned for firewood."

At the Sit Farkl's we had to go through the usual string of Arab compliments, to which was added the inevitable sprinkling of rose-water, the sherbet, the narghilees, the coffee, and last, a selection of fruit, jelly, and sweetmeats. The wonder of the Druse women at the fairness of the ladies and children, their astonishment and questions regarding European dress and customs, and their almost childish delight at what to them were wonderful novelties, all amused us not a little. The Sit herself is a person without any education save a fair knowledge of her own language, the Arabic, but in her conversation and remarks shows considerable common sense and great observation. She expressed the greatest delight at seeing us, and begged us to consider the house our own, to stay the night, to honor her by remaining a week, and so forth. We were, however, not able to prolong our visit, for the sun was drawing fast towards the west, we had an hour's ride before we could reach home, and the roads of Lebanon, difficult enough at all times, are exceedingly dangerous, if not quite impassible after dusk. After many compliments and farewells from the Sit and her friends, we therefore returned to the Sheik Bechir's house, and there, having put the children on their donkeys and mules, helped the ladies on their horses, and mounting ourselves, we started on our return home, highly pleased with our day spent in a Druse village, and still more so with our hosts, the sheik and his relatives.

Our road home ran along the side of a mountain, and keeping us parallel with a magnificent deep valley, at the bottom of which ran the river Julia, whilst the numerous villages scattered here and there on the hills, the cattle returning home from pasture, and the many peasants we met on their way home from their fields, gave the whole scene an air of peace and plenty, not often met with in the Turkish empire, and perhaps in no part of it except Mount Lebanon. The wonderful transparency of the atmosphere in this land causes some singular optical illusions. Everything appears much nearer to the beholder than it really is; and it is only after the experience of some months that one becomes sufficiently accustomed to this to estimate objects at their true distance. I was much struck with this, when on our way home from Bisboor to the mountain village in which all our party was residing for the summer, we rounded a hill on the west, and came in view of the Mediterranean, with the plains lying at the foot of Lebanon, the immense olive-grove that skirts the sea, the town and roadstead of Beyrout, with its numerous ships, it appeared almost as if a few bounds down the mountain would place us on the shores of the deep blue sea, whereas we know well that it takes a good horse nearly four hours to get over the intervening ground. It was curious to look down at the steamers now at anchor, and think that by embarking on board of one of them, we could reach Marseilles in six and London in eight days, and be in a very different climate and very different scenes from those which we had that day left and witnessed amongst the Druses of Mount Lebanon.—Once a Week.

REMARKABLE CONVERSIONS.

The first I shall relate is that of an Indian. This extraordinary conversion—far such I have ever regarded it—took place, I think, in the autumn of 1843 or 1844. It was at a camp-meeting held in a pleasant grove in one of the rich prairies in what is now Kansas Territory. Our meeting had progressed with increasing interest for three or four days. Many souls had been made happy in the love of God, as from time to time we gathered around the altar in prayer. But there was a straggling camp of Indians of the "Kaw," or Kansas tribe, who seemed rather accidentally to have pitched their tent near our encampment. These Indians were very ignorant of revealed religion, and also ignorant of the languages of all the other tribes who were there represented, and participating in the exercises of the meeting. Nevertheless they continued to stand and sit around the outskirts of the congregation as spectators from day to day; their curiosity seeming to increase as the meeting grew warmer, and the general interest seemed to deepen; until, as before stated, on the evening of the third or fourth day, while many penitents crowded the altars and God's people, of some half dozen different tribes, and speaking as many different tongues, were singing, praying and exhorting each in his "own tongue wherein he was born," I observed our "Kaw" friends standing in a group, as near as they could approach the spacious altar, now strewn with supplicating mourners or rejoicing believers. One of their number, a tall, manly looking person, was evidently much concerned and greatly agitated in mind and body. It was not long, however, after he attracted my attention until his almost gigantic form fell prostrate to the ground, as we have seen the sturdy oak succumb to the impending storm. A considerable number of persons, red and white, now gathered around where this man lay stretched upon his back, all satisfied that there was no collusion in the case, and for hours did we all anxiously watch and wait to see the result. For some time he seemed not to heed anything that was going on around him, but appeared to be wholly taken up with what immediately concerned himself; meanwhile the large briny tears with which his face was literally bathed, witnessed the pungency of his conviction and the sincerity of his repentance. He occasionally spoke, and they were either words of bitter self-reproach for having sinned against God, or cries and entreaties for Divine mercy. There was but one person present whom he could understand, or who could understand him, except his comrades. This was the widow of a most worthy deceased missionary, who, with her husband, had spent several years among that people acquiring their language, and preparing to labor for their instruction and salvation. But just as we thought this devoted man of God was ready to begin successfully to preach to the poor benighted Kaw Indians, God took him from earth to heaven. But, as I said, the widow of this man of God was present and could speak some words of encouragement to the stricken sinner; and in turn could tell the rest of us what he said. And after he had lain as above described for some hours, he suddenly arose and sat up, wiping the tears and sweat from his face, as he said, "how strange I feel—I never felt so before. What is this? I love every body,"—a sentiment wholly at variance with all his former habits, sentiments and notions of what was right. So visible and sudden was the change in this man, that no one present doubted the genuineness of his conversion; and so peculiar were the circumstances of the case, that all were constrained to admit that this was none other than the work of God's own blessed Spirit.

Miss M. A. E. was a student in one of our Methodist schools. When she was about eighteen years old, a revival of religion occurred in that institution, while she was still there. And although she had pious parents, she opposed some of her school-mates who became serious, and were seeking religion. Not only did she oppose others, but solemnly vowed that she would not become religious. And I was informed that on the evening of her conversion, before starting to church, she derided and sneered at religion, saying that she was going to show her weakness as some of her associates had done; but that night at 10, God had stricken her down, and nearly and soundly converted her. She was a young lady of rather more than ordinary intellect, and of very marked and strong traits of character; and all who knew her had the utmost confidence in her sincerity; and some seven or eight years of a most exemplary life since her conversion, proves the work to have been a genuine work of the Spirit of God. This I have always regarded as a very clear and marked case, showing unmistakeably that sometimes, even in opposition to all their plans of life, sinners are brought to a state of conviction by Divine power, and thereby led through the way of repentance and faith to Christ. And the fact is, without the interposition of Divine power no sinner can properly repent and believe unto salvation.

I preached one night in 1843 at Pickinsville, Ala., during a protracted meeting, and at the close of the sermon I invited penitents to the altar; there was a man in the congregation who had been a gambler for some years; he had a family, and resided in the place; he was not known to be under any religious concern; but when the invitation was given, to the astonishment of his acquaintances, he arose and walked towards the altar; just before he reached it he fell prostrate on the floor, and began to cry aloud for mercy; his associates, and the congregation generally, rose to their feet and gazed upon him with intense interest. He never rose till God spoke peace to his soul, and his prayers were turned to praises. He joined the Methodist Church, and lived and died a changed man.

In 1845 I held a protracted meeting at Warsaw, Ala., at which about thirty persons joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, among whom were the wife and daughter of Colonel B., who was keeping the tavern in that place. The Col. was a very wicked man, and was much incensed when informed of the fact; I was told he threatened to disinherit them. He took to his bed and fancied he was going to die, and appeared to be angry with every one. I visited him frequently during the meeting, and urged the importance of religion. I have no doubt his illness was more of the soul than of the body, for he arose from the bed a changed man, and joined the Church, himself, the next time I came there to preach. He is still in the Church, but his wife and daughter have gone to their reward.

SOMETHING ABOUT WRITERS.

THE ESSAYIST.

There are various classes of writers. Among these, may be mentioned historians, poets, novelists, dramatists, scientific writers, and essayists. Let us, for a short time, consider the essayist. It belongs to this writer to develop and classify, in modes of his own, the concealed relations of different themes of inquiry. He enters the fields of visible and invisible truth, and explores them further. We owe our highest pleasures of reading to literary explorers. The scientific writer is usually more or less confined to certain portions of a single region of truth. With his method of determinative analysis, he cannot be versatile and entertaining, like the essayist. The brilliance of the essay is unsuited to science. The essay aims to amuse, while it instructs the reader; but the text book has, as its only professed object, the conveyance of instruction. Each is a vehicle of knowledge gained by observation and thought; but, in the essay, truth is classified with more embelishment than it can be in the text-book. Furthermore, the results of observation and thought, which are presented by the essayist, may fitly partake, to a great extent, of his own personality, and be expressed in modes peculiar to himself. Freshness and originality are looked for in the essay, and, in this kind of writing, dryness and formality are intolerable. But the text-book must needs be the vehicle of truth, stated, in the main, with formal perspicuity. There is, therefore, but little scope, in scientific writing, for the expression of personality. The I, in this case, dares not infuse much of itself into the It. The essayist seeks to be suggestive; the scientific writer seeks to be definite. The essayist applies, in novel modes, the principles of this text book; the scientific writer ascertains and classifies these principles.

It may be well carefully to observe that the essayist explores various fields of truth, passing outward from those limits reached by the man of science. Your mental philosophy contains but a small part of what you are permitted to know, concerning the nature and the operations of the human mind. The classifier of scientific knowledge stops on a circumference of limited diameter, and closes his eyes to immeasurable territories stretching every way beyond him. The student soon finds himself in view of realms of truth which it is impossible completely to explore. In ited realms, there are but a few places where he can perceive any relief from one interminable vista of relations that have never been generalized. And these reliefs are the clearings which have been made by that class of writers who preoccupy, on the territories of the unknown, fruitful fields of systemized truth. Every great essayist has made for us, in some wilderness of relations, extending far beyond the outer limits of scientific ground, beautiful gardens of classified knowledge, in which our minds have been refreshed and strengthened. Many of us do not adequately know how much we depend, for all that most agreeably amuses us, and for all that best incites us in intellectual pursuits, on literary explorers. In order more clearly to see the extent to which we are thus dependent on the essayist, it may be well to glance at the leading characteristics of a few of those masters of the pen, who may be regarded as representing different styles of composition.

There is one style which induces a serene mood of inspiration. It elevates the tone of thought. Though it excites the mind, it does not produce weariness. The reaction of the effect, like the effect itself, is entirely agreeable. I think the most eminent representative of this style is Washington Irving. He is what we may call an eclectic writer. Mr. Newman, the rhetorician, ascribes both simplicity and elegance to his style. He carefully chooses his thoughts and words, and sets before us only the sweetest and most exhilarating. He does not thrill you—he pleases you. In his writings, ease is combined with dignity. They have the charm of perfect gentility, the genial refinement of an intelligent traveler, who wins friends to him wherever he goes. You, undoubtedly, remember the effect which Irving's clear and chaste delineations produced on your mind, in the first instance in which you perused a book from his pen. Did you not, with an improved heart, lay aside that attractive volume? Did not this old world look more pleasant to you afterward? Irving makes his readers less sordid. By moderately raising their thoughts above the whirl and the din of earthly scrambling, he causes them to become more meditative, more amiable, more manly.

Writers like Irving could not easily be spared. There are hours in the life of every student and of every educated person, in which the mind needs literary food that is gently inspiring. The essayist productions of the pen will not answer. There is, for awhile, no mental relish for science, for philosophy, or for history. But the fatigue of total inactivity cannot well be endured. The mind needs that employment and that exhilaration which nothing can better promote than the writings of accomplished literary explorers, whose pens, like that of our lamented Irving, overflow with recreative and elevating thoughts.

But not always do we need to be refreshed and inspired in the manner which I have just described. If neither weary nor indolent, nor intellectual powers have a relish for strong food; and they should be provided with such aliment, so that they may be invigorated for intense action. The mind soon begins to become either despondent or listless unless it has work to do. Few men of genius have not been obliged to struggle, in many an instance, to recover the courageous zeal lost by them in too long an interval of relaxation. The inevitable effect of prolonged and luxurious leisure is a loss of manliness. Spinoza, it is said, was once offered a piece of gold, which he declined, fearing it might too much relax his spirit of endeavor. Demosthenes shaves one side of his head, and secludes himself in a cave on the sea-shore. Henceforward, he no more forgets his duty to himself, and is ready, by-and-by, to shake the throne of Philip with words from his disciplined mouth. There come hours to us all, in which we will not, unless urged from without, rouse ourselves to undertake anything that is difficult. Hence the need of writings, the object of which is the production of excitement and courage. Moore, in his life of Byron, relates that he once found the poet reading the history of Agathon, one of Wieland's romances. "I am," he says, "inclined to think it was his practice, when engaged in the composition of any work, to excite his vein in the perusal of others on the same subject or plan, from which the slightest hint caught by his imagination, as he read, was sufficient to kindle there such a train of thought as but for that spark had never been awakened."

The class of writers who compose in the style adapted to produce the effect which has been mentioned, may be divided into two orders. The style of the first order has its chief representative in Thomas Carlyle. In his works, we find what, when analyzed out, is a broad torrent, what was pressing in it for vent. His words and sentences are not merely pleasing—they are urging and driving. He little cares to be eclectic in expression. He does not spend time to find the most euphonious words. He apparently fears to delay for the purpose of conveying his thoughts in elegant and musical language, lest the inspiration of the moment should be too much damped. He writes elliptically. In some instances, he is exceedingly verbose; and, in some instances, he fails to say enough. His sentences consist too frequently of words that are terrible to utter. I fancy, that should you and I attempt to play toss-and-catch with some of his great epithets and compound nouns, it would very soon prove to be a rough sort of sport.

Carlyle can write better; but he will not. In the sequel of his book on Heroes and Hero-Worship he calls his own words, "rude words." Thus, he furnishes a hint in respect to that resoluteness with which he dashes along with his pen. Stronger hints, of a similar kind, are given in his famous essay, entitled "Characteristics." Therein, he puts forth a theory, denominated by him, "Unconsciousness of all healthy vital action in Man." He assumes that "the healthy understanding is not the logical, argumentative, but the intuitive;" for "the end of understanding," says he, "is not to prove and find reasons, but to know and believe." Thus, he denies that the logician can be a man of genius. The debater, he would say, is too cool and unintuitive for healthy vital action. "The debater," he does say, "is to be ranked as the lowest of true thinkers."

Applying his theory to oratory and rhetoric, he says that "the orator persuades and carries all with him; he knows not how; but the rhetorician can prove that he ought to have persuaded and carried all with him. The one is in a state of healthy unconsciousness, as if he had no system; the other, in virtue of regimen and dietetic punctuality, feels at best that his system is in high order." Applying the same singular theory to the moral actions of man, he quotes, as the vehicle of his conception of intuitiveness, the Scriptire passage, "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth."

Whether this theory of Unconsciousness is or is not true, it is no part of my present task to determine. Let it suffice to say, that in his apparent practice of the theory, as if it were true, Carlyle has wielded a mighty influence since he made his advent with the pen. By his earnest, though anomalous words, how many dependent and fastidious souls has he roused from their state of sycophantic effeminacy, and made them heroic and true!

The style of the other order of the school of writers under consideration, has its most striking representative in Ralph Waldo Emerson. In the writings of the author, is illustrated the effect of a consciousness of healthy vital action. And you will observe in them argument against Carlyle's theory, so far as it is applied by him to rhetoric. Emerson does not, like Carlyle, continually infract on the wholesome rules of composition. His writings abound with sentiments and aphorisms. They have beauty as well as force. Emerson's style is, however, entirely his own. You do not find its salient peculiarities in the works of any other powerful author. It is labored. Epigrammatic brevity is one of its marks. It exhibits few evidences of extraordinary facility in composition. It is the compact, studied style of proverbs. It is Solomonish. Emerson has no crude sentences. On each of his books he seems to have toiled as Michael Angelo did on a statue. He not only stamps his writings with originality of thought, but he also gives them vigor by his suggestive omissions. He makes you think, by leaving you to supply what he does not say. "What spaces," exclaims a writer, between Emerson's sentences! Each seems to float like a solitary summer-cloud in a whole sky of silence!" He writes as if certain he will be quoted from in future ages. Many a sentence of his is as short as a streak of lightning. But he seems never to compose a sentence with electric haste. May I not use a new figure, and say that his chapters are trees, and that he prunes every paragraph and sentence to the quick?

Judging from their works, Carlyle is a fast, Emerson a slow writer. In the former, the first mark at which the critics aim, is the crude vehicle of the thought; in the latter, it is the thought itself. The one writes too anomalously; the other thinks too anomalously. Both rouse and thrill you; but the greater fault of the one is the crudity of his style, while the greater fault of the other is his transcendentalism. I cannot, however, agree with those who discountenance Emerson's transcendentalism, to such an extent as not to see and acknowledge the value of his genius and originality. Right handsomely does he compensate for his unacceptable opinions, in his acceptable strength and the weird beauty of his composition. I think it is well that we have his writings. Do they not tend to make us more earnest of mind? more apt to inquire after the grounds and the causes of things? more desirous to know what are the foundations of our beliefs and theories? more strong to cope with the difficult problems connected with man's being and situation? more interested in everything that is true and beautiful? and less inclined to seek the absurd accomplishments and to follow the foolish fashions of the humanity of the surface world?

THE BLISS OF THE WRITER.

That the successful writer is rewarded with a superior order of pleasures, it is unnecessary to prove. But the effect of these pleasures on himself may not unprofitably be considered. This effect includes a complete forgetfulness of sorrow and pain, a perfect relief from the weariness resulting from toil, a thorough exemption from feverish and impatient longings, a peaceful view of life, and an encouragement to new and greater mental efforts. "Contemplate your subject long," says Buffon; "it will gradually unfold, till a sort of electric spark convulses, for a moment, the brain, and spreads down to the very heart a glow of irritation. Then come the luxuries of genius, the true hours of production and composition." I have read of Marini, an Italian poet, who was so absorbed, while revising his "Adonis," that one of his limbs was, for some time, in contact with fire, before he felt the heat. Of Ariosto, another Italian poet, it is recorded that, while a young man, his father once severely reproved him. But he was entirely innocent, in respect to the offense for which the reproof was given, although, strange as it may seem, he made not the least effort to exculpate himself to his father. His brother, Gabriel, who happened to know his innocence, afterward asked him why he did not explain the case, and escape the parental ire. Ariosto beautifully answered, "Because I was so busily thinking how to make the best use of what my father said, in my new comedy, in which I have just such a scene of an old man scolding a boy, that in the ideal, I forgot the real incident."

Sir Walter Scott well knew the bliss of the writer.—He seems to have been almost insensible to weariness of any kind, while engaged on his tasks. The sweet reactions of successful effort kept him in high health. He used to say, that, "when sick, the best way is, if possible, to triumph over disease by setting it at defiance, somewhat on the same principle as one avoids being stung by boldly grasping a nettle." In the quiet of his study, Scott experienced transports of which it is probable that the kings and the conquerors, the millionaires and the libertines, of his day, never dreamed. And, though we cannot entirely agree with him in his opinion, yet we will believe he was expressing a conviction which the ineffable bliss of many years had wrought in his mind, when he wrote the words, "People may say this or that of the pleasure of fame or of profit, as a motive of writing, I think the only pleasure is in the actual exertion and research; and I would no more write on any other terms, than I would hunt merely to dine on hare-soup."

Readers do not often enough consider the sweetness of the excitement which must have been experienced by their favorite authors, while these were toiling at their tasks, in the solitude of thought and composition. The exercise of writing is far better than opium, as a remedy for discontent or for crabbedness. The activity of the writer removes from his mind the causes of melancholy and of petulance, somewhat as the stream of water cleanses itself by running. Does the mathematician ask what the poems of Homer prove? They prove, I answer, that their composer found exquisite pleasure in writing them. Happy was the blind bard of Scio, while producing his Iliad and his Odyssey—producing them from the stories of "that intellectual treasury, which poverty could not drain or scorn impair." Do not forget, when you peruse Plato and Aristotle, Descartes and Spinoza, Shakspeare and blind Milton, what days of bliss were spent by these writers, in places of seclusion! Do not forget what happiness there was for Cervantes and John Bunyan, in prison; and for Dante and Machiavelli, in banishment!

And there is an interesting truth, in respect to the felicitous experience of the writer. The effect of writing is disciplinary and enriching. The author, of all men, is he who bears in his mind the most valuable intelligence. Writing is a process of mental education and adornment. When a great book is written, you may at once say, that its author is, now, far better prepared to write a greater book than he was before to write that one. Who can tell how much mental and moral gold Butler stored in his mind, while he was forming the everlasting structure of his Analogy? Who can tell how busy on his Lives and Parallels of Illustrious Greeks and Romans? And, as all vivid assurances of successful mental effort are attended by a sweet inspiration, it follows that the effective writer experiences unnumbered thrills of joy, to which the reader can have no key in his published pages, but which it belongs to his imagination to supply.

POWER AND FAME.

Of all the methods of influencing men's minds and hearts, there is, perhaps, none by which a person may secure more power and higher fame, than that of writing. Suitable and adequate investigation, in respect to this proposition, will, I think, convince the reader that it is not too strongly stated. "Consider, if you please, the writer, in comparison with eminent wielders of influence of other orders." Of these, there may be named the tactician, the artist, and the orator.

In respect to the tactician, it is not difficult to see, that his power is held within humiliating limits. His great days are days of battle only. If he is no more than a tactician, he must needs depend on war and carnage for fame. He must be able to ride well in a saddle, and must know just when and just where to give orders to men to kill men. Does he aspire chiefly to military glory? Then, in order to hasten the time when his name shall bear the title of Great, he must make some person like Alexander of Macedon his exemplar. His heroism must not be moral heroism; for moral heroes seek God's glory, rather than their own. He must be devoted to an unscrupulous ambition for martial distinction—an ambition requiring him to count human life and the tenderest domestic ties, as secondary to the advancement of personal interests—an ambition of that kind which Seneca describes as "a gulf and a bottomless abyss, where everything is lost that is thrown in, and where, though you were to heap province on province and kingdom on kingdom, you would never be able to fill up the mighty void." The laurels of the military conqueror usually smell of powder and blood. His renown is not so much the renown of power, as it is that of prowess.—Tecumseh and Black-Hawk, though they had never been educated in French or English, were as lion-hearted as were Napoleon and Wellington.

Again; in respect to the artist, you will observe, that, to this empire, also, there are limits which make him far less powerful than the writer. It belongs to him to influence only the finer susceptibilities of the mind. His mission is to wean men from the sordid pleasures of appetite and of lust, by imbodying beautiful ideals in art. But, in his appropriate field of action, he is able to attract and refine the minds of only a few; for there are but few, indeed, over whom the models of music, of painting, of sculpture, and of architecture, hold a delightful sway. Angelo and Raphael did not carve and paint for the many. They worked only for men of taste; otherwise, they would, in all their years of thought and production, have in vain sought hospitality at the doors of human minds. Mozart and Beethoven left no music for after-generations so powerful as that left by Dante or by Milton. What, to the rare, is Sir Christopher Wren and his monumental St. Paul's, to Shakspeare and his monumental plays? Art is noble; but it is not a potent civilizer. It elevates men; but it does not reform them.

Finally; in respect to the orator, it may be said, that only on certain occasions of public concern is he strong and mighty. He is the people's instructor and guide in great emergencies. His contact with men is necessarily close; and while exerting himself, his power is immense. But, considering the permanence of the effect which the orator produces, it must be admitted, that he is far inferior to the writer as a wielder of influence. His power is less lasting, while it is more forcible, than the writer's. The orator rouses and enchains men by the charms of eloquence. He convinces them by logic, set on fire with passion. He persuades and moves them to action by extemporary utterances, the nice adaptation and the pathetic beauty of which completely overpower the strongest prejudice and disarm the most contemptuous resistance. But oratory, how admirable soever it may be, cannot insure the highest historic fame. It is a means of influencing the few. Its wonder-working power cannot be reported; but its impressions are like those made by the storm on the waters of the ocean.—When its mighty "mouthfuls of spoken wind" no longer move the audience, the wild billows of feeling which they have excited, must needs sink back to rest, and be followed by a great calm. Long ago, the name of Demosthenes might have gone to oblivion, had he not toiled, in silence, on his speeches before he delivered them, till, as Pythias said, "all his arguments smelt of his lamp."—Who knows how many thrilling orators have lived and died, leaving no record behind them to indicate to posterity how they charmed men in their own day? Little would we know concerning wise Ulysses and his oriphric powers, had not the Iliad and the Odyssey of Homer given him historic renown. And little would we know concerning the greatness of Pericles, as an orator, had not Thucydides committed to writing, in a few brief but beautiful sketches, some of the utterances of that gifted speaker.

Socrates might have been a powerful reformer for every age after his own, had he written as many wise words as he gave to the air in his long contest with the incorrigible sophists. The self-denying, courageous and philosopher, with all his wisdom, expressed a great error, when he said to Phædrus, in those words attributed to him by his pupil, Plato:

"Writing, indeed, Phædrus, has this inconvenience, and truly resembles painting. For its productions stand out as if they were alive; but if you ask them any question, they observe a solemn silence. And so it is with written discourses; you would think that they spoke as though they possessed some wisdom; but if you ask them about anything they say, from a desire to understand it, they give you only one and the self same answer. And when it is once written, every discourse is tossed about everywhere, equally among those who understand it, and among those whom it in no wise concerns, and it knows not to whom it ought to speak and to whom not. And when it is ill-treated and unjustly reviled, it also needs its father to help it; for, of itself, it can neither defend nor help itself."

Socrates, when he spoke these unreasonable words, overlooked the fact that great paintings and great writings serve to perpetuate, from age to age, the power of their authors. He, also, overlooked the truth, that it is the duty of every man who is far in advance of his own generation, in knowledge and wisdom—a duty which he owes to himself, as well as to those who are to live after him—to produce some noble work which shall carry forward the life of his rich mind, so that it may fertilize the ages to come. Socrates was, evidently, too fond of street speaking. His one-idealism had disturbed the balance of his mind. He seems to have concluded, that his peculiar mode of showing men their ignorance, was the only excellent method of successfully influencing them for good. In discarding the absurd writings of the sophists, he hardly let himself see the value of those true writings which are essential to extensive personal power and to enduring personal fame. How much more useful a man would he have made himself, both to the Athenians and to the men of all succeeding times, if he had retired from the street, and spent his days in producing models of composition, which might constitute him a teacher and inspirer of men, when his mortal tongue should be silent in the grave! The influence exerted by Socrates on the race, seems meager, in comparison with that exerted by Plato, by Aristotle, or by Xenophon—Indeed, may we not reasonably inquire, by what means, had not this trio of ancient writers once lived, we could have known anything reliable concerning that master-talker, with his floating nose and uncouth garb, but with habits of temperance, and with an extraordinary "beauty in the inner man?"

Who can tell how many powerful geniuses have spoken for only one generation of men, because no recording pen immortalized their thoughts and their sayings? A beautiful provision, and one for which the race can never be too full of gratitude, was that made by the Founder of the Christian religion, for perpetuating the influence of his own words, his own doctrines, and his own example. Imparting something of the afflatus which he himself possessed, to a few poor and unlearned Galilean fishermen, he transformed them into apostolic penmen. The piercing eye of the Master foresaw those ages of moral darkness that were to come, in which the indescribable eloquence that had made the self-righteous Jews tremble, and had begun to renovate the hearts of the idolatrous Gentiles, would not ring in the ears of sinful men, and in which there would be needed, for the continuance of genuine Christianity, the sacred Gospel, with its artless but thrilling narratives, and its simple but reformatory teachings!

THE MASSACRES IN SYRIA.

Papers relating to the disturbances in Syria have just been presented to Parliament. They inform us that the narratives which have roused Europe to something like another Crusade are no exaggerations of fear or credulity, but have in many [illegible] the slaughter at Dier-el-Kahmar, and the general imbecility or treachery of the Turks stand out more strongly in the despatches of official persons than in the newspaper reports. The European nations have every reason to be satisfied with the manner in which their Consuls have behaved. In the month of May, before the outbreak of these disturbances, the attention of the various Governments, and notably of the Porte, was called to the threatening state of affairs in the Lebanon, and when the war commenced the Consuls were invariably found united and acting with vigor in the cause of humanity. National jealousies and divergencies of policy seem to have been forgotten, and Englishman and Russian, Frenchman and Austrian, joined in remonstrances to the delinquent commanders and in endeavors to give a shelter to the fugitives.

In May the Lebanon was already in commotion.—Assassinations were daily taking place. A party of Christians were set upon by Druses between Deirel-Kammair and Djezzin; nine of the former were said to have been killed. The Druses began to sing their war-songs, and the Maronite Bishop Tubia told his people that they must not give up Christian delinquents, as Druse offenders were not brought to justice, and that, in the event of an attack on the Christians, he would himself head them. This state of feeling was evidently about to produce grave consequences, and Khorsheed Pasha sent a small force of irregulars into the district. However, the Pasha from the beginning took a view by no means partial to the Christians, for he sent a subordinate to inform Consul-General Moore that he attributed the present disorders to the machinations of a committee of Christians organized and sitting at Beyrout, some of them Rayahs, and others Ottoman subjects under foreign protection. This is, perhaps, the most impudent accusation that was ever made, even by an Oriental. It is hard to believe that so preposterous a suspicion can ever have been really entertained by the Pasha, and we are therefore justified in assuming that from the first he was determined to put the Christians in the wrong, and to find an excuse for delivering them into the hands of their enemies. In the meantime the Christians of the mixed districts as Mount Lebanon had addressed the Pasha complaining of the constant assassinations, and bringing to his notice particularly the murder of several ecclesiastics. The memorial states that the Christians have been obliged in many cases to leave their homes and crops, and take refuge in the larger villages, and that not even thus had they escaped the bands of Druses, who often overtook the fugitives on the road, ill-used them, and carried off their property. The Pasha is reminded that the Druses had never been punished for any of their former outrages, more particularly for the horrible acts which Stiek Youssuf Abd-el-Melek ventured to commit last year in burning and sacking the dwellings of and killing innocent Christians without being called to account by your Excellency." We quote these earlier papers to show that in the month of May the Turkish authorities were already informed of the danger, and had received warnings and supplications from the Consuls, and from the native Christians.

However, nothing was done by the Pasha, and in a few days things became more serious. The Druses extended their plunderings even to the plain near Beyrout. In this early stage of the disturbances the Emir Beschir El Kassim, a man who took part in the events of 1810, and was now eighty-five years of age and quite blind, met his death. While being led away from his house by his servants he was attacked. His servants fled and left him. The marauders cut his throat, and hacked the body with their swords. Such events as this determined the Consuls to a more strenuous interference. On the 1st of June the British, French, and Austrian Consuls at Beyrout started for Korsheed Pasha's camp, which was situated about an hour's distance from the town.—They offered to co-operate with the Turkish authorities in preserving life and property in the district. The Pasha declared that he was doing all he could to check the war; he laid the whole blame on Bishop Tubia and the Beyrout committee; he said all he required was that the Consuls should induce the Bishop and the committee to stop their interference, and that he would answer for the Druses. From the declarations of the Pasha, who wished to arrest the Bishop and the members of the committee, the Consuls thought there might be something in the charge, and Mr. Moore had an interview with them, but they protested their innocence, and complained of the calumnies of the Pasha, declaring, however, that they would do their utmost to keep the Christians quiet. This promise they seem to have fulfilled.—How the Pasha redeemed his own will be seen by what we now have to relate.

On the day after the interview between the Consuls and the Pasha, Dier-el-Kammar, the chief Maronite town, was captured by the Druses, under Beschir Bey, Naked. The Pasha took no steps to restrain the assailants. The Turkish garrison remained spectators of the attack, and even took a direct part against the Christians. At the same time an American missionary writes from Sidon that a body of three hundred men, exclusive of women and children, which had been driven out of Djezzin and the neighboring villages, had been butchered within sight of the town by Druses and Moslems, the Sidon townspeople going out to aid in the work. The Consuls had begged the Bimbashi to provide for the admission of refugees, but he would do nothing. By the 6th of June the towns of Rasheya and Hasbeya, in the Anti-Lebanon, were destroyed. "In the former place the greater part of the male Christian population was murdered. "The male children of six or eight years of age and upwards were sought out and killed, but the younger were spared," says Consul Brant, of Damascus. At Hasbeya a Druse in the Turkish service was a principal actor. He was sent by the Mushir to protect the families of the Emirs and Christians; he brought away some seventy persons, and slaughtered them on the road. "I have repeatedly entreated the Pasha," says Mr. Brant, "to send out an escort to bring in the people of Rasheya and Hasbeya; but he did nothing, although he promised he would; he waited until the catastrophe was consummated, and then pleaded its being too late." As to the safety of the city of Damascus, the conduct of the Pasha at that place is described by our Consul as giving "countenance to the belief of some that his Excellency desires the destruction of the Christians, and cares not for the safety of the town, determining, if it should be occupied by the Druses, to shut himself up in the castle and ruin the city with the cannon." Whether this idea has any other foundation than the fears of the people I cannot say; but certain it is that a general distrust of his Excellency prevails." "Should any calamity occur, it will be mainly attributable to the misconduct of his Excellency." We know too well the tragedy that has taken place since these words were written. Damascus has been attacked, and hundreds of Christians have perished. The details we have yet to learn; but it is plain that the forebodings of the European representatives were well founded. The last intelligence from Constantinople also is to the effect that Aleppo, Orfa, and other places have been the scenes of similar outrages, the Turkish soldiers taking part in the massacres. Everything confirms the charges made against the authorities, and shows the necessity of European interference.—London Times.

VICTOR EMMANUEL'S DOMINIONS.

It is not merely additional territory and population that Sardinia has acquired. The sceptre of Victor Emmanuel is now swayed over some of the noblest cities of Italy, and the most interesting in the world. When Lombardy was ceded to Sardinia we took occasion to speak of the importance and splendor of Milan; but by the acquisition of Tuscany, the Sardinian crown gains Florence, as Rogers says in his "Italy," "of all the fair cities on earth, the fairest"—one containing greater treasures of art than any city in Europe, excepting Rome, and one rendered sacred to the student and artist by the memories of the great men who once trod its streets—Michael Angelo, Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Da Vinci, Cellini, Amerigo Vespucci, Giotto, Brunnellesehi and others prominent in the history and art of Italy. A city so well known as Florence needs no description from us here. Its monarchs had in the Pitti Palace a royal residence nobler even than the Tuileries, Schonbrunn, or Windsor Castle, and Victor Emmanuel's capital and palace at Turin offer no such regal grandeur as this new provincial city that lies in the vale of Arno, and is guarded by the Appenines, with Fiesole and Bellosguardo standing like mountain sentinels outside its massive walls.

Then, but a few miles distant, is Sienna, a city of near twenty thousand inhabitants, with streets rich in mediæval architecture, considered a miracle of splendor. There is Lucca, with a population of about twenty-five thousand, in a rich agricultural district, with a modern aqueduct rivalling in extent and elegance those of Roman antiquity, and connected by railways with Florence. There is Pisa, with twenty-one thousand souls, its university, and its inevitable leaning tower. There is Livorno—outrageously Anglicized into the unsophisticated "Leghorn"—a flourishing seaport, with a population of seventy-five thousand, and more commerce than any town in Italy, excepting, perhaps, Naples and Genoa. Turning toward the east we find Parma, with about forty-one thousand, and Modena, with about twenty-eight thousand inhabitants; both quietly prosperous towns. Beyond these is Bologna, which, with its seventy-five thousand inhabitants, was formerly the second city of the Papal States. Its university is world-renowned, and though the city may not boast the architectural grandeur of other Italian towns, its buildings, as well as its people, have an independent character of their own. A little further is Ferrara, with thirty thousand inhabitants, a grand palace, and somewhat gloomy reminiscences of the house of Este and our operatic friend Lucrezia Borgia. Still further, and near the coast, stands

"That place of old renown, Once in the Adrian sea, Ravenna," with half oriental relics of Honorius and Theodoric, of Gothic kings and Byzantine monarchs. There, too, is the tomb of Dante,

"Buried, like Scipio, by the upbraiding shore."

Following the seacoast we soon come upon Rimini, once the seat of a learned and refined court, and yet containing a cathedral in which are buried the illustrious dead of that period—a short Pantheon, which gave to England the idea of Westminster Abbey. Here the march of annexation and Sardinian aggrandizement appears stayed—for how long it is difficult to conjecture. But should it reach no further, the King of Sardinia has already increased his power and possessions to an extent which ought to satisfy the most ambitious monarch.

CHURCH OF THE VAUDOIS AT TURIN.

On leaving the railway station, says Mr. Arthur, in his forthcoming work, "Italy in Transition," you almost immediately cross a noble street, planted on either side with trees, the Strada del Re. Here, in a conspicuous place, is a beautiful building, bearing the inscription: "Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls." What can this mean? It is a church; and yet, in Italy, churches are not wont to have inscriptions from the word of God in the vulgar tongue. You may go through all the cities, from Como to Syracuse, and perhaps you will not find, on the house of God, one word of the Bible that the people can read, either inside or out.

What, then, is this? It is an appeal to antiquity, but an appeal to the Bible, and a challenge to read it. You ask the first passer-by, "What is this building?" and the answer is: "It is the church of the Vaudois."—What recollections does this answer call up! By those strange flashes which show the mind, in a moment, the shades of past things, you see the Alpine valleys hidden there among those hills—the obscure and menaced flocks gathering at their peril, and hearing the word of God; you see the advancing soldiers of the house of Savoy; then fire and blood, tortures and exiles, and the same scene over and over again; at each fresh encounter the hands of Rome growing redder, the name of Vaudois more venerable, until reformed nations arise to call them heirs of the old faith—until, later, the thunders of the revolutionary time silence the bolts of the Vatican—until, at last, the chains they had borne for ages are off, and they are permitted, as citizens, to stand erect upon the soil of Italy. And here that old church, true from the beginning, true through the darkest ages, true against all the kings, true against the people of her own language, true against the powers Rome could bring to bear upon her by letters or by arms, is at last permitted to come out from her mountain hiding-place, holding the faith she had received from her remotest fathers; and, setting her foot in this one free capital of Italy, she turns her face to the land that hunted her so long, and lifts up her hands in prayer that God would wipe away the blood with which it is stained, and send it days of Christian light and rest.

It was on a beautiful Sunday morning, with such thoughts filling my mind, that I approached that fair temple. A group was standing at the door; there were soldiers—soldiers of the house of Savoy, going in uniform to the Vaudois temple, not to commit havoc, but to worship God under the protection of law. I never looked at a foreign soldier with such interest before. A medal hung upon the breast of one or two, looking like a half crown-piece; but, ugly as it was, it had a greater charm for me, just then, than the more tasteful ones of the Continental states—the countenance of Queen Victoria was stamped upon it. It was her Crimean memento to the heroes of the Italian army who had there stood by our side. By the two signs of the Piedmontese uniform and the English Medal, it seemed as if the bonds of Hanover and Savoy joined hands on this church threshold to uphold the consecrated principles of freedom to worship God.

The peculiarity of the Vaudois is, that they can not properly be called Protestants, because, never having acknowledged the authority of Rome, or fallen into her errors, they never had to protest against them otherwise than by the perpetual struggle of centuries. They are an aboriginal Christian Church, holding the forms and the doctrines handed down from the most distant Christian times.

LOUIS PHILIPPE AND PRINCE JEROME.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says: —"Every one has remarked that in the biographical sketches furnished on authority for the provincial papers, or indeed in any of them which have appeared in the Parisian press, there is no allusion to Prince Jerome's request to fix his residence in Paris, in 1847, having been granted by the government of Louis Philippe. It was even said that orders were given to avoid all mention of the fact, and it is no doubt believed that his arrival in Paris was subsequent to the elevation of his nephew to the Presidency of the Republic. Now this is unfair both to Prince Jerome and to the King of the French. The Prince was not only permitted to reside in Paris with his son Prince Napoleon, but he sought and obtained an interview with Louis Philippe, who was then at St. Cloud. The folding doors of the saloon were thrown open to receive him, though according to etiquette, the compliment was only paid to a crowned head: and the Prince expressed himself touched by the attention of the King who received him most graciously. The Prince, moreover, obtained from the government of Louis Philippe the grant of a pension of 150,000f., subject to the approval of the Chamber of Deputies; and this approval would assuredly have been granted but for the overthrow of the government by the revolution of February. I believe he solicited the vote of certain deputies when the bill should be brought before the Chamber. There was also something said of the Prince's desire to be named peer of France and Governor of the Invalides, and had Louis Phil

PAY TO THE END OF THE YEAR.

We have made out, and sent out, all our accounts, to the end of the present year. Many have responded and paid up, but many have failed to do so. The object we have in writing these lines is, to call upon all who have not paid up to the end of the year, to do so immediately, by remittance to the office, or by payment to our agents. The year is more than half gone, and yet we have much to collect of our accounts, and to clear off books, between this and January next. This work we must accomplish. Come friends, you have received your accounts through the paper or through the preacher; the amount is not large in each case; pay up to the end of the year and let us all begin even again.

THE CONSPIRACY IN TEXAS.

We have heretofore said but little by way of comment upon the reported evidences of an abolition conspiracy in Texas, because we had hoped that the whole affair would turn out to be greatly exaggerated. Texas is a country of such large extent, and the difficulty of rapidly transmitting news from far distant interior points is so great that exaggerated rumors of any thing having the semblance of the tragical, are very apt to get into circulation, without being satisfactorily corrected for a considerable length of time. We had hoped to find that these things were exaggerated, for the sake of the good name of our common country, for the honor of human nature, and for the reputation of our Northern brethren, political and religious, whose abolition doctrines have been the direct cause of both the John Brown and the Texas conspiracies, together with all similar disturbances. But we are compelled to confess that our hopes have turned out to be entirely groundless. Unquestionable evidence has been discovered of a systematically organized conspiracy, under the direction of white men, extending its ramifications into all the slave-holding parts of the State, the object of which was, a simultaneous and general insurrection of the blacks, accompanied by fire, rape, and assassination. The same evidences are found in all parts of the State: strychnine in the hands of the negroes, for the purpose of poisoning food, wells and springs; guns, pistols, and other arms, in individual hands, and collected in secret arsenals, for perfecting the work began by fire and sword. The men, the old women and the children, were all to be killed, and the young women to be devoted to a far more horrible fate.

And this is the fruit of abolitionism—of anti-slaveryism—of the teaching of the anti-slavery press and pulpit and rostrum! Can any man candidly and conscientiously deny it? We do not include in this condemnation our good Northern brethren, who oppose the anti-slavery crusade. They are men good and true, and merit our highest esteem and honor. And this is the forlorn hope of the Black Republican army, which is now seeking the control of the government! These conspirators are the advance guard of that Black Republican party to which Dr. Alex Stevens professes to belong, and which the majority of Northern Methodists, it is said, will support in the coming presidential election! This is the development of the sentiment which is earnestly supported by Henry Ward Beecher, Dr. Cheever, the Independent, and many others of the Congregationalists, and other Calvinistic churches. This is the fruit of the doctrine taught by the entire Northern Methodist press—edited by such men as Drs. Thomson, Kingsley, Haven and Elliott—the latter in slaveholding territory! This is what is meant and desired by that "freedom of speech"—God save the mark!—and of the press, the absence of which in the South is vehemently complained of by the Independent, the Christian Advocate and Journal, and similar papers. It is for prudent and well-conducted efforts to prevent such things that Bishop Janes fills the ears of the country with his complaints against that accomplished gentleman and patriot, Judge Roberts, and his associates. This is the fruit of the gospel Northern Methodist preachers wished to preach in Texas. Alas for the honored name of "Methodist Preacher!" It is for not joining in the course and counsel which lead to such results that the Southern Methodist Church is denounced and vilified, in Europe and America, by Methodists. These things are the fruits of the doctrines and labors of the abolition tories of the North, and their British allies, leagued, as in the days of the Revolution, against the peace and perpetuity of the government of this country. The blood of the Revolution, of San Domingo, of Kansas, of Harper's Ferry, and of this Texas infamy, rests upon the heads of these modern tories and incendiaries. It is vain in attempting to avoid the logical results of the Black Republicans and abolitionists [illegible] of their more candid leaders, in their sympathy with such [illegible] bility for them is obvious enough. It would, at this moment, [illegible] know precisely the number of Northern [illegible] favor, in sympathy and at the ballot-box, the destruction of the South by insurrection. The election of a Helperite Speaker of the last Congress is proof of this view. Many of our Northern fellow-citizens have held and taught abolition doctrines, without ever dreaming that such doctrines would lead to such results. But now there is no excuse. Before the John Brown and Texas conspiracies, we can understand that a man may have been a Black Republican or an abolitionist simply because he was a dupe; but now, how a man can teach abolition doctrines, or support the Black Republican party, and not be a villain, our casuistry does not enable us to determine. Such a man is, logically, an incendiary and a murderer, whatever he may be in purpose. Many a poor negro, with a good master and home, with gentle women who felt interested in his welfare, and that of his family, and without the possibility of being placed in a better position in any part of the world, will have been tempted to the gallows by the serpent of abolitionism; but the curse of God, and man, for his destruction, will fall upon the tempter who ruined him.

Southern slavery, as a rule, is the mildest and most benevolent system of labor in the world, and the slaves, without abolition temptation, are the most contented and happy laborers. But granting it the character attributed to it by the abolitionists, it is even then, in comparison with abolitionism, most saintly and holy. There is not an evil, to character and home, to society or country, attributed to slavery, by an ignorant or lying press, that abolitionism does not produce an hundred fold. It is the life of modern politics, the falsehood of modern philosophy, the apostacy of modern Christianity, and the curse of modern civilization. The prophetic Anti-Christ of Scripture was always thought to be the Church of Rome, until abolitionism developed itself, and then the interpretation began to be doubted. If ever men deserved the doom which Benedict Arnold escaped, William H. Seward, Horace Greely, Charles Sumner, Wendell Phillips, and their abettors, political and clerical, are the men. And yet, Southern men, and patriotic Northern men, too, who are determined to resist the demon of abolitionism in every form, and to make no compromise with the insidious monster, and who simply contend for the Constitution of their country, and the Union based upon it, are denounced, sometimes by Southern men, as fire-eaters, extremists, ultras and disunionists! Shame on the ignoble souls who thus attempt to weaken the public conscience in reference to the monstrous iniquity of abolitionism! This indirect support of the abolitionists has done more to embolden them in their aggressions than anything else. Even now, Lincoln's organ at Chicago, John Wentworth's paper, boldly advocates the overthrow of slavery in the States as the doctrine of the Republican party, and shames the Republican leaders who are too timid to avow it. It quotes Lincoln's language, embodying the same sentiment.

But, so far as we can see, nothing but defeat, and the election of an abolitionist, will ever teach Southern men, and constitutional men generally, the lessons of patriotism and political wisdom. United, Black Republicanism could be easily defeated. The people are willing to unite, but the demagogues and office-seekers, who curse the country, will not let them. And thus we are divided into three parties, when we ought to be one; just as the Jews were divided into irreconcilable factions when Jerusalem and the temple were tottering to their fall.—Our country has fallen upon evil times, and nothing but the providence of God can save us, for vain is the help of man. While christian men should use all the political means in their power, the present should be a time of general humiliation and prayer.

THE DESTINY OF THE IRISH.

The Irish seem determined never to lose a place in the world, or to be forgotten by it. They are a long established evidence of the truth that if respectability be difficult of attainment, notoriety is to be had for the seeking. They are an illustration, also, of the truth that a nation may abound in individuals of fine character and brilliant talents, and yet never attain position in the world either socially or politically. Tenacious of vitality and character as a race; full of individual, tribal, numerical and characteristic force; the Celts, for thousands of years, have disturbed and modified all institutions, politics, and civilization, without having any of their own, or constituting an independent element in those of other nations. As tenacious and permanent as a race as the Israelites, they are the very antipodes of Israelites in character and influence. The Irish have been a social and political yeast, everywhere producing fermentation and disturbance, without progress; the Jews have been a social and political inertia, everywhere tending to conservatism, equally modifying both progress and reaction. The most impatient of rule of any nation on earth, the Irish have always been the friends of despotism; the most law-abiding people in the world, the Jews have always been the friends of liberty. Irish legions are now supporting the Pope, nominally, and demoralizing his army, really; the Jews are nominally submissive to both Austria and Rome, and really helping to overthrow both of them.—The Irish, at the present time, are disturbing elements in the midst of Protestantism and republicanism; the Jews are the dangerous foes of Romanism and absolutism, whenever they are oppressed.

Everything relating to the Irish is of interest to the people of this country, for the reason that this country seems destined to be the ultimate home of the whole Irish nation. In a few years there will be no Irish nation in the Island of Ireland. They will all have emigrated to the United States. And that will be the end of their history. Swallowed up in the great composite population of this country, made up of representatives of all the nations of the earth, the Irish nation will in a few years disappear from the face of the earth forever. Isolated in their own island, they could never be changed; never elevated into a great nation themselves, [illegible] harmonious part of the great English nation. Providence is sending them out where their characteristics and force of race will necessarily become a part of a great national character and force, and where they will be saved themselves, and be useful to the world, by the loss of their name and nationality. And this will be another step in "the decline and fall" of Romanism. In a few generations they will have lost their superstition as well as their name, and will have become Protestants as well as Americans, except in large cities. The London Times consoles itself for the loss of the Irish by contemplating the trouble they will give to this country. If God do not give this country over to destruction on account of its own sins; if he shall still guide and protect it, as the political light and asylum of the world; the Irish will not only not hurt us, but be our most zealous propagandists among the down-trodden peoples of the shores from whence they came. It is well for us to remember, however, that Ireland is coming over to the United States. In many respects we need them. Railroads and the Irish appropriately came in together. We cannot spare the blacks from cotton—England would suffer if we did; she therefore sends the Irish. Let us do all we can for the welfare of both classes of our laborers.

DR. LIPSCOMB.

We regret to learn that our old friend is going farther away from us. Having been elected President of the University of Georgia, at Athens, we learn that he has accepted the position. Dr. Lipscomb belongs to the country at large, but Alabama should not have consented to part with him. She could suffer no greater loss in any one man. But Georgia needed him, and was wise enough to secure his services. Few men of his age have done as much for the Christian culture and social tone of Alabama as Dr. Lipscomb. He is a model College President and College Preacher. Many men there are who are equal to him in the mere scholastic knowledge pertaining to such positions; but for elevating and enlarging, in the minds of students, the ideal and value of education; for that inspiration and unction of instruction which makes every truth a gospel, and every lesson a means of grace; for taking heed unto the student-flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made him overseer; for showing forth in his own manner and spirit that model of cultivated christian life which should be the object of all students; for obliterating the lines between secular and religious, avoiding worldliness in the one, and cant and pharisaism in the other, and making all life a beautiful psalm of service to God; in short, for the religion, the beauty of holiness, the "life and power," of education, we have never been associated with his equal. But the institution to which he goes should remember that he has "this treasure in an earthen vessel," and that vessel a very frail one. He should be the president but not a professor, for his body will not bear it. Again we express our regret at his going East; we had plans in embryo for his coming West. But they are all melted frost-work now. We wish him God-speed wherever he goes, and we give the Georgia University joy.

BISHOP EARLY AND NORTH CAROLINA.

Our brethren of North Carolina, who have always been the warmest friends of Bishop Early—and he has certainly been theirs—seem quite displeased with him of late, because he appointed a presiding elder pro tem. to the Wilmington district during the absence of the incumbent, Dr. Deems, who is on a visit to Europe. Having presided at the last session of the North Carolina Conference, Bishop Early certainly has charge, during the year, of the work there, and of the men whom he appointed to do it. And if he saw any necessity for supplying Dr. Deems' lack of service during his absence, he not only had the right, but it was his duty to do it. We shall have no use for Bishops after awhile, if we adopt the course pursued by some of our brethren. Who ever thought, a few years since, of agitation and outbreak because of the exercise of the functions of the appointing power? Our esteemed brother editor, Dr. Heflin, of the North Carolina Christian Advocate, however, takes a different view of the matter. We agree with him heartily, in one sentiment, however, and so does the whole Church,—that it is wrong to make Dr. Deems' name "the watch-word of discord in the Church of God."—Surely nothing would displease Dr. Deems more, especially in his absence.

AUTHORS AND BOOKS.

New York, Aug. 20th.

THE North British Review has again changed hands. This time it comes into the possession of Messrs. T. & T. Clarke, the publishers of the "Foreign Religious Library," as valuable a series of historical works as have ever been translated into English, including among its volumes, "Gieseler's Church History," the "Reformers before the Reformation," and other like books.—Under these new auspices, the ever excellent North British is likely to flourish; the August No. is at any rate an excellent one. Its contents are: 1. Romance of the New Planet—2. Dr. John Brown's Life and Works—3. Scottish Nationality; Social and Intellectual—4. Colonial Constitutions and defences—5. Recent Poetry—6. Thiers' Last Volume on the Empire—7. Imaginative Literature—8. Russia and Serfdom—9. Recent Rationalism in the Church of England—10. Severe Winters.

The paper on "Imaginative Literature" treats of and compares Hawthorne and the author of Adam Bede. The Reviewer says: "The imagination, in different men, works under different laws. The more powerful intellects keep it in subjection, but it takes the feebler captive. In the one case it vatalizes and exalts; in the other it discolors and exaggerates. The author of 'Adam Bede' represents the first class; Nathaniel Hawthorne the second." After this comparative estimate, he launches into a glowing eulogy of the genius of that writer who persists in styling herself "George Eliot." He judges the "Mill on the Floss" to be a greater work and a nobler than its predecessor, "Adam Bede," and says finally of Mr. Hawthorne's last work, The Romance of Monte Beni, that "a character may accidentally or incidentally illustrate a law; but the writer who models the character upon the law, produces a moral or Intellectual monster. If there are no actual monsters in 'Transformation,' there is at least very little flesh and blood in it—very little except the brilliant fancy, the fine analysis, and the perfect taste of an admirable critic; no life, but only a great deal of very delightful talk about life."

The first article, "The Romance of the New Planet," is one of unusual interest and value. It shows how far our greatest astronomers have succeeded in penetrating the mystery of the universe, and how their calculations assume the shape of the most wonderful prophecies; the mathematician, indeed, sitting in his study, and pointing out, by the indisputable force of numbers, to his co-laborer at the telescope, the very part of the heavens where, if he looks, he will surely see a new star.

On the 2d January, 1860, M. Leverrier, known as one of the discoverers of the planet Neptune, communicated to the Academy of Sciences a remarkable paper on the Theory of Mercury. In styling the 21 transits of that body over the Sun between 1697 and 1848, he found that the observations could not be represented by the received elements of the planet, but that they could be all represented, nearly to a second, by augmenting by 38 seconds the secular motion of the perihelion of Mercury. In order to justify such an increase, we must increase the mass attributed to Venus one tenth at least of its value; which, from sixty years' meridian observations, has been found to be the four hundred thousandth part of that of the Sun. If we admit this increased mass of Venus, we [illegible] either that the secular variation of the obliquity of the Ecliptic, [illegible] observations, is affected with errors by no means probable; or that the obliquity is changed by other causes wholly unknown to us. If, on the other hand, we regard the variation of the obliquity of the Ecliptic, and the causes which produce it, as well established, we must believe that the excess of motion in the perihelion of Mercury is due to some unknown action.

"I do not intend," says M. Leverrier, "to decide absolutely between these two hypotheses. I wish only to draw the attention of astronomers to a grave difficulty, and to make it the subject of a serious discussion." We must therefore, as he suggests, find a cause which shall impress upon the perihelion of Mercury these 38 seconds of secular motion, without producing any other sensible effect upon the planetary system.

M. Leverrier then shows that a planet between Mercury and the Sun, the size of Mercury, situated at half his mean distance from the Sun, if moving in a circular orbit slightly inclined to that of Mercury, would produce the 38 seconds of secular motion in his perihelion. But when he considers that such a planet would have certainly a very great brightness, he cannot think that it would be invisible at greatest elongation, or during total eclipses of the Sun.

"All these difficulties," he adds, "disappear, if we admit, in place of a single planet, small bodies circulating between Mercury and the Sun;" and he thinks their existence not at all improbable, seeing that we have already a ring of 58 such bodies between Mars and Jupiter.—As these bodies must frequently pass over the Sun's disc, he advises astronomers to search for them with care.

This paper immediately set all the astronomers agog. Plans were arranged by which those occupying the most favorable situations should observe in a regular manner, and with such care that nothing might escape discovery.

Meantime comes on the stage one Dr. Lescarbault, a village physician, obscure, poor, but passionately fond of astronomy. By dint of many years saving, he had managed to furnish a little observatory in the cupola of his house, where he passed every leisure minute, gazing at the mysterious worlds which revolve about ours.

When he was watching the transit of Mercury over the Sun, on the 8th May 1845, the idea occurred to him, that if there was any other planet between the Sun and Earth than Venus and Mercury, it ought to be seen in its passages across the disc of that luminary; and that, by frequently observing the margin of the Sun's disc, we ought to see the appearance of a black spot entering upon the Sun, and traversing his disc, in a line of a greater or less length.

At this time it was impossible for him to institute this plan of observation, as it was not till 1853 that he was able to commence it. Between 1853 and 1858, he seldom directed his telescope to the sun; but in 1858, when he had a terrace at his command, he constructed a rude instrument, by which he could measure, within a degree nearly, the angle of position; and the tested its accuracy by measuring the position of spots on the moon, and comparing his observations with a map of that satellite published by John Dominique Cassini.

This instrument was a telescope, with an object-glass about four inches in aperture, and four feet six inches in focal length, made in 1838 by M. Cauche, and having a magnifying power of 150 times. The finder of the telescope magnified six times. In the focus of both telescopes were placed three parallel horizontal ones, the distance between the two outermost being from 32 to 34 minutes. A circle of card-board, 5½ inches in diameter, and divided in its circumference to half degrees, was placed on the eye-piece of the finder, and concentric with it. The telescope had a vertical and horizontal motion, and was supported by a wooden pillar with three feet, the point of which rested on a frame also with three feet, and having screws, in order to level the instrument.

With his telescope thus mounted, and by the aid of other pieces of rude apparatus, which it is unnecessary to describe, he was able to measure the distance of any well-defined spot on the sun's disc from its margin.

Whenever our observer expected that the duties of his profession would allow him a little leisure for observation after midday, he regulated his watch by the Sun's passing meridian, by means of a small transit instrument; and having adjusted the rest of his apparatus, he directed his telescope to the Sun, and during a period varying from half an hour to three hours, he surveyed the whole contour of the Sun's disc, keeping his eye at the eye-glass.

At length, after many times repeated surveys, on the 26th of March, 1859, he saw a black point enter the sun's disc. Its circumference was well defined; its angular diameter, as seen from the earth, was very small, and he estimated it at less than one-fourth that of Mercury, which he had also measured. He made an accurate record of his observations, and there the matter rested. Dr. Lescarbault was obscure; he was a member of no Society; he was timid, as unknown men mostly are, in exact proportion to their real worth; and so, having made this very important discovery, he kept it to himself, determining to assure himself by future observations, and then, perhaps, lay claim to the honor of a discovery. While he was waiting, M. Leverrier read his paper; when it was printed, a copy came to the hands of the village Doctor. Then he felt that he might speak; and he modestly announced to M. Leverrier and his compeers of the Paris Academy, that that which had been foretold by mathematical calculations, had been seen by him. After giving the results of his observations, he expresses his conviction that, on a future day, a black spot, perfectly round and very small, will be seen passing over the Sun in a line situated in a plane comprised between 5 1-3 deg. and 7 1-3 deg., and that this orbit will cut the plane of the Earth's orbit towards 183 deg. in passing from the south to the north. "This point," he continues, "will very probably be the planet whose path I observed on the 26th March, 1858, and it will be possible to calculate all the elements of its orbit. I am persuaded also that its distance from the Sun is less than that of Mercury, and that this body is the planet, or one of the planets, whose existence in the vicinity of the Sun M. Leverrier had made known a few months ago, by that wonderful power of calculation which enabled him to recognise the conditions of the existence of Neptune, and fix its place at the confines of our planetary system, and trace its path across the depths of space."

At first this astounding confirmation of his views was regarded with distrust by M. Leverrier himself, and by others. But when he went down to visit the village astronomer, and saw his humble but correct instruments; when he had cross-examined him, and saw the man's simple honesty, he was forced to believe. His account of the interview is so interesting that, though long, I copy it here as given in a recent French scientific journal:

For a long time M. Leverrier refused to attach any credit to the reports which reached him on the subject. He could not believe that the discovery of a new planet could have been kept secret for nine months, and that a humble village doctor could have been the person to discover it. As the Director of the Imperial Observatory however, it was his duty to inquire into the truth of the report; and having a personal interest in the question as the predictor of a planet near the Sun, he resolved to enter upon the investigation. Le-carbault's letter to himself, of the 22nd of December, confirmed him in this resolution; and though he had a secret conviction that the story might be true, yet the predominant feeling in his mind was to unmask an attempt to impose upon him, as the person more likely than any other astronomer to listen to the allegation that his prophecy had been fulfilled.

He accordingly set out from Paris by railway, on Friday the 30th December, accompanied by M. Vallee as a witness of the stern inquisition which he was about to institute. Orgeres was unfortunately twelve miles distant from the nearest station, and our travellers were obliged to perform the journey on foot. On their arrival at the house of M. Lescarbault, M. Leverrier knocked loudly at the door; and when the Doctor himself had opened it, his visitor declined to give his name and his title.

"One should have seen M. Lescarbault," says Abbe Moigno, "so small, so simple, so modest, and so timid, in order to understand the height of pride which was seized when Leverrier, from his great height, with what cold, blunt intonation which he can command, thus addressed him: 'It is then you, sir, who pretend to have observed the intra-mercurial planet, and who have committed the grave offence of keeping your observation secret for nine months. I warn you that I have come here with the intention of doing justice to your pretentions, and of demonstrating either that you have been dishonest or deceived. Tell me, then, unequivocally what you have seen.'

The lamb, as the Abbe calls the Doctor, trembled at this rude summons from the lion, and, unable to speak, he stammered out the following reply: 'On the 26th March, about four o'clock, I directed my telescope to the Sun, as I had been in the habit of doing, when, to my surprise, I observed, at a small distance from its margin, a black spot well defined and perfectly round, and advancing with a very sensible motion upon the disc of the Sun. Unfortunately, however, a customer arrived. I came down from the observatory, and in this painful situation I replied as I best could to the inquiries which were made, and returned to the observatory. The round spot had continued its transit; and I saw it disappear at the opposite margin of the Sun, after having been projected upon his disc for nearly an hour and a half.' 'You will then have determined,' asks Leverrier, 'the time of the first and last contact: and are you aware that the observation of the first contact is one of such delicacy that professional astronomers often fail in observing it?' 'Pardon me, sir,' replies the Doctor, 'I do not pretend to have seized the precise moment of contact. The round spot was upon the disc when I perceived it. I measured carefully its distance from the margin, and, expecting that it would describe an equal distance, I counted the time which it took to describe the second distance, and I thus determined approximately the instant of its entry.' 'To count the time is easy to say, but where is your chronometer?' 'My chronometer is a watch with minutes, the faithful companion of my professional journeys.' 'What! with that old watch, showing only minutes, dare you talk of estimating seconds? My suspicions are already too well founded.' 'Pardon me,' was the reply, 'I have also a pendulum which nearly beats seconds.' 'Show me this pendulum,' says Leverrier. The Doctor goes up stairs, and brings down a silk thread, to which an ivory ball was suspended. 'I am anxious to see how skilfully you can thus reckon seconds.' The lamb acquiesces. He fixes the upper end of the thread to a nail, and after the ivory ball has come to rest, he draws it a little from the vertical, and counts the number of oscillations corresponding with a minute on his watch, and thus proves that his pendulum beats seconds. 'This is not enough,' replies the lion; 'it is one thing that your pendulum beats seconds, but it is another that you have the sentiment of the second beaten by your pendulum in order that you may count the seconds in observing.' 'Shall I venture to tell you,' says the lamb, 'that my profession is to feel pulses and count their pulsations? My pendulum puts the second in my ears, and I have no difficulty in counting several successive seconds.'

"This is all very well for the chapter of time,' says the Director; 'but in order to see so delicate a spot, you require a good telescope. Have you one?' 'Yes, sir, I have succeeded, not without difficulty, privation, and suffering, to obtain for myself a telescope. After practising much economy, I purchased from M. Cauche, an artist little known, though very clever, an object glass nearly four inches in diameter. Knowing my enthusiasm and my poverty, he gave me the choice among several excellent ones; and as soon as I made the selection, I mounted it on a stand with all its parts; and I have not only indulged myself with a revolving platform, and a revolving roof, which will soon be in action.' The lion went to the upper story and satisfied himself of the accuracy of the statement. 'This is all well,' says he, 'in so far as the observation itself is concerned; but I want to see the original memorandum which you made of it.'

"'It is very easy,' answered the Doctor, 'to say you want it; but though this note was written on a small square of paper, which I generally throw away or burn when it is of no further use, yet it is possible I may still find it. Rooting with fear in his Commentaries upon Tithes, he finds the note of the 26th March, 1859 performing the part of a marker, and covered with grease and laudanum (the lion sizes it greedily, and comparing it with the letter which M. Vallee had brought him, he explains: 'But, sir, you have omitted this observation; the time of emergence is four minutes too late.' 'It is,' replied the lamb. 'Have the goodness to examine it more narrowly, and you will find that the four minutes is the error of my watch, regulated by sidereal time.' 'This is true; but how do you regulate your watch by sidereal time?' 'I have a small telescope—here it is—which you will find in such a state as to enable me to obtain the time to a second, or even to some fractions of a second.'

Satisfied on this point, Leverrier then wished to know how he determined the two angular co-ordinates of the points of contact, of the entry and emergence of the planet, and how he measured the chord of the arc which separates these two points. Lescarbault told him that this was reduced to the measuring the distances of these points from the vertical, and the angles of position, which he did by the systems of parallel axes we have mentioned, and the divided circle of card-board placed upon his finder.

Leverrier next inquired if he had made any attempt to deduce the planet's distance from the Sun from the period of four hours which it required to describe an entire diameter of the Sun. The Doctor confessed that he had made attempts to do this, but, not being a mathematician, he had not succeeded; and that this failure was the reason why he had delayed the announcement of his discovery.—Leverrier having asked for the rough draught of these calculations, the Doctor replied, "My rough draughts! Paper is rather scarce with us. I am a joiner as well as an astronomer. I calculate in my workshop, and I write upon the boards; and when I wish to use them in new calculations, I remove the old ones by planing." On visiting, however, the carpenter's shop, they found the board with its lines and its numbers in chalk still unobliterated.

When this cross-questioning, which had lasted an hour, was finished, Leverrier was convinced that an intra-mercurial planet had really been seen, and, with a grace and dignity full of kindness, he congratulated Lescarbault on the important discovery which he had made.—Anxious to obtain some mark of respect for the discoverer of Vulcan, Leverrier made inquiry concerning his private character, and learned from the village cure, the judge de paix, and other functionaries, that he was a skilful physician, and a worthy man. With such high recommendations, M. Leverrier requested from M. Rouland, the Minister of Public Instruction, the decoration of the Legion of Honour for M. Lescarbault. The minister, in a brief but interesting statement of his claim, communicated this request to the Emperor, who, by a decree dated January 25th, conferred upon the village astronomer the honor so justly due to him. His professional brethren in Paris were equally solicitous to testify their regard; and MM. Felix Roubaud, Legrande, and Calle, as delegates of the scientific press, proposed to the medical body, and to the scientific world in Paris, to invite Lescarbault to a banquet in the Hotel de Louvre, on the 18th of January. A similar offer had been made to him by his professional admirers in Chartres and Blois; but he declined all these invitations, pleading as an excuse his simple and retired habits, and the difficulty of leaving the patients under his care.

Here is now the point which is to be fully determined by a re-discovery of this hitherto unknown planet, and toward this all astronomers are giving their utmost attention. Meantime, one—a M. Leas—also a Frenchman, has published a pamphlet in which he asserts not only that poor Dr. Lescarbault is a cheat, but that M. Leverrier's calculations on which he founded the theory of the necessary existence of another planet are false; and that in fact there need not be another; nor, says he, was one seen. This, of course, complicates the matter more still, and makes the interest in it, to astronomers, still greater. Some time before the year is out we may hope to hear further news of this new world in the starry maze.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers are about to publish "Travels on the Amoor, in the recent Russian acquisitions on the confines of China and Japan," by T. W. Atkinson, a very remarkable English artist, who has spent the last fifteen years in those regions and in Siberia. Mr. Sala, well known by his "Journey Due North," says, in a recent English paper of literary gossip: "A strange, hardy, adventurous man must this Mr. Atkinson be. We happened to be in the capital of the Czar years since, just after this traveler's return from oriental and western Siberia. For years he had been wandering, with a wife as heroic as Garibaldi's Anita, and in those inhospitable regions, often depending for his sole subsistence on his rifle and fishing rod. We had the pleasure of inspecting in Mr. A.'s studio the magnificent water-color drawings he had made during his pilgrimage, and of looking with great interest on the little son which had been born to him in the course of his sojourn on the Altai mountains, and to whom he gives the sonorous appellation of 'Alla-tar-tum-lam-Tchiboulak.'"

Mr. Scribner has nearly ready one of the finest printed and illustrated works that has ever been published in this country. It is called "Folk Songs," and is a collection of the choicest English poems of all times—such as have received the stamp of merit by the approval of the popular heart, as well as of the critics. The collection is made by J. W. Palmer, M. D., of this city. The illustrations, more than sixty in number, are by the best artists in America, Kousett, Church, Eastman, Johnson, M'Entee, Hill, Barry, Eytinge, Boughton, Darley, McDonough, McLenan, Wallin, Hoppin, Parsons, Mellert, Hennessy, Nast, and others. I have been shown the early sheets of a portion of the work, and I have no hesitation in praising the book as one admirable in every respect—a book which will probably lie on a great many center-tables, and yet have many [illegible] to the lot of the usual center-table books. To add to its other attractions, it will contain fac similes of the original autograph copies of fifteen famous poems, by Hood, ("The Song of the Shirt,") Tennyson, Bryant, Leigh Hunt, Longfellow, Barry Cornwall, Holmes, Kingsley, Payne, ("Home, Sweet Home,") Whittier, Browning, Lowell, Emerson, Willis, and Pinkney.

Harper's Magazine for September contains a poem by Fitz James O'Brien; "The Sewing Bird," illustrated by John McLennan; "A Summer in New England," second paper on "Martha's Vineyard" (illustrated), by Port Crayon; "Spiders, their Structure and Habits," (illustrated) a very interesting article of natural history; "Gossip," by Mrs. Charlotte Taylor; "The Legend of Micah Rood," by Miss Jane S. Fuller; the completion of Mr. Fitzhugh Ludlow's story of "The Cruise of Two Deacons;" "Eaton Barbary Expedition," by J. T. Headley, who gives here the first full and correct account ever given of this wild escapade; "Batchelor's Hall," by D. R. Castleton; "Somebody's Love Story," by Mrs. E. O. Haven; "Some of my troubles," by Mrs. E. F. Clarke; the second of Mr. Thackeray's papers on "The Four Georges;" and "Unto this Last," by John Ruskin, a paper on the morals of trade, written in glowing language, and worthy of every thinking man's best consideration. The "Table" has for subject "The Anglo-Saxon Mind and its Great Thoughts."

Messrs. Appleton have in press, "Reminiscences of an officer of Zouaves," a translation of a series of very lively and entertaining papers, which have recently appeared in the Review des Deux Mondes, and understood to be from the pen of General Cler.

A very singular confirmation of an important geographical theory hazarded by an eminent African traveller, has just become known. In his lectures before the Geographical Society of New York, last spring, Mr. Paul B. Du Chaillu, the African explorer, announced that he had discovered and laid down for over 150 miles, from their beginning, a range of mountains hitherto unknown, and which, in his opinion, stretch across, or nearly across, the entire continent, without diverging much either way from the equatorial line. From the farthest point he reached, in this mountain range, he brought back some specimens of malachite, or green carbonate of copper, and a few pieces of very rich copper ore. Some of the geographers did not agree with Mr. Du Chaillu in his opinion as to the extent of the new range of mountains, but his theory receives very unexpected confirmation from the narration of an Arab traveler who has just returned to Zanzibar. Colonel Rigby, the British Consul at that place, has sent to the Bombay government a short narrative of travels in Central Africa by this Arab, who is named Said Bin Habeeb. He was sixteen years in the interior as a trader, and three times visited Loanda, on the west coast. Dr. Livingstone mentions having met him on the Zambesi. He is the first stranger who has crossed the continent in so high a latitude. He was every where treated with kindness. He describes the country as populous, except towards the lake Nyrassa, where it has almost been depopulated to supply the slave markets on the coast. For seventeen days he traveled through the Jhuhow country without meeting inhabitants. The soil is rich, and covered with the ruins of villages. The tribes he traded with are all negroes; they make much cotton cloth, and have abundance of copper and iron. The copper mines are situated "in a large range of mountains." After smelting, about seventy pounds' weight of copper are sold for four cubits of American sheeting. There are no horses or horned cattle. The Arab wrote no account of his travels. His reason is characteristic: "I have never written down anything I observed during my travels, because Arabs take no interest in the discovery of foreign countries, and do not care to hear of anything unconnected with the acquisition of riches."

The last No. of the Historical Magazine has the following ingenious piece of poetry, which one of its correspondents vouches to have been circulated in Philadelphia during the occupation of the British, in the war of the Revolution. Its author is unknown. Its peculiarity consists in the manner in which it may be read, viz., in three different ways: 1. Let the whole be read in the order in which it is written; 2. Then the lines downward on the left of each comma in every line; and 3. In the same manner on the right of each comma. By the first reading it will be observed that the Revolutionary cause is deprecated, and lauded by the others:

Hark! hark! the trumpet sounds, the din of war's alarms
O'er seas and solid grounds; both call us all to arms;
Who for King George doth stand, their honors soon will shine,
Their ruin is at hand, who with the Congress join.
The acts of Parliament, in them I much delight,
I hate their cursed hitters, who for the Congress fight.
The Tories of the day, they are my daily toast,
They soon will sneak away, who independence boast.
Who non resistance hold, they have my hand and heart;
May they for slaves be sold, who act a Willgigish part.
Oh Mansfield, North, and Bute, may daily blessings pour,
Confusion and dispute, on Congress evermore;
To North, that British lord, may honors still be done,
I wish a block or cord, to General Washington.

NOTES WHILE ON A FURLOUGH—No. XI.

UP THE MAGDALENA TO HONDA.

New Grenada contributes no large streams to the Pacific, while to the Caribbean sea it furnishes two, the Magdalena and the Cauca, which enters the Magdalena a few miles below Mompose. Inviting as their waters are, and lucrative as their trade promises to be; the Cauca has no boats upon it, and the Magdalena has been navigated but a few years, as a matter of course by an English company. The waters of these two streams drain a large portion of the Republic, for they both have their source far up towards Ecuador. Tradition reports that when the invaders first entered the country, the banks of the Magdalena were almost a continuous village of aborigines from the mouth up, all of whom have disappeared. Similar testimony is given by the same authority in relation to the plain of Bogata. Whatever credit is due to these traditions, it is certain that a war of extermination, marked by unparalleled atrocity and extent, was carried on against them by their Spanish oppressors, countenanced by patristic philosophic theology, which taught "that they could not be of Adamic descent." "By millions upon millions whole races were cut off," says Draper; and the Bishop of Chiapa affirms that more than 15,000,000 were exterminated in his time. The traditions of their wrongs and crimes, handed down to the present time, among the Indians, may account for the fact that there are various tribes now, both in New Granada and Costa Rica, that are entirely unapproachable by the white race. This was tested by the French while I was in the country. Such a tribe is found on the Isthmus of Darien, another on the north-east portion of New Grenada, and the south-east portion of Costa Rica; this latter tribe rose upon and massacred the Catholic missionaries and other Europeans among them, and retired into their mountain fastnesses, many years since. So far as the banks of the Magdalena and the adjacent country are concerned, this tradition is not improbable, for they are exceedingly fertile, and for the most part quite inhabitable.

I alluded in my last to peculiarities in steam-boating in this country. The boats, though built in the United States, differ from ours; the interiorne deck or roof covers but little more than half of the cabin deck, so that the room for passengers is limited. There is a small ladies' cabin in the usual place, with four state-rooms; in front of this are four more for gentlemen. One of these you can have by paying twelve dollars extra; all the rest of the cabin is one room. The boat furnishes you with a cot bedstead, and you are expected to furnish yourself with whatever else you may wish in the way of bedding. If you take a state room, they will add sheets and a pillow, but your musquito net, do not choose to take a state room, select a place and hang their nets in the common cabin, which is very thickly settled at night, when there are many passengers. But it will be inferred from the arrangement of the boat that not a large number are expected; they seldom have more than a dozen to go through. As we are now under way let us glance at our company: we have Dr. Mallaino, late vice-President, and for two years acting President of the Republic, and his son, on their way from Europe, pleasant gentlemen both, rather too fond of cards; a German, who has been doing business in Ambelema—he is an American citizen, formerly resided in New Orleans, and has now considerable of the world; and an English gentleman returning to Bogata, where he has resided some years. Besides these there were several way passengers, natives of the country. As our company was small, and we expected to be together several days, we mutually concluded to become acquainted, and soon were on pleasant terms all round. The Captain was a Genoese, and spoke but little English, and the Clerk spoke less. Only the Engineer, a Scotch American, spoke my vernacular fluently.

As the river was not very high, and there are a number of sand-bars, and as time is not of much importance with these people, after the first day or two they lie by at night for fear of accident. We ran first night out from Calamar, and it was attended by a sad occurrence. About midnight I was awakened by persons running to and fro, and calling "Emanuel! Emanuel!" I saw something had happened, and hastened from my berth. I inquired of one and another what was the matter, but they happened to be Granadians and did not understand me. At length I found some one who could, and was informed that the second mate had fallen overboard. He had laid down on the guard, fallen asleep, and rolled off into the river. He called for help two or three times, but the boat, instead of being in tow, was hauled on dock; it was launched after a long time, and sent in pursuit, but the poor fellow had ceased to call for help, and sunk to rise no more. He may have been seized by a caiman.

Mompose is the first town of any note that we came to in ascending the river, being 140 miles above Barangilla. It is one of the oldest towns in New Grenada; and was built at this point to be out of the way of freebooters. It is finely located, on the west bank of the river, healthy, well built, they occasionally seize n child that ventures into the river imprudently. They shew intelligence in managing their prey, for, on seizing a lnad animal, they plunge to the bottom of the river, and hold it there until it ceases to struggle, and then rise to the surface to devour it.—With they treat differently, as I had nn opportunity to observe.

The valley of the Magdalena produces trees of almost every description. Here nre found not only the orange, lemon, cocoanut, palm, guava, cacno, and totumn, but I saw the cinnamon, cnoret ohouc, (India rubber,) upon the banks; and bock from the river, in the hills, the cinchona, from which the world-celebrated Peruvian bark is obtained, nhounds. The cinnamon tree very much resembles the mock orange. The leuf of the Indin rubber is not unlike that of the nrnnge, but the bork of the tree is much thicker and softer. On moking an incision in the bark, a thick cream-like sup oozes out freely, which on being rubbed for a few seconds by the finger beenmes hard and very odhesive. This articio is procnred in large quantities in portions of New Grennda, but the method of obtaiolng it promises to exhnust the supply at no distant day. Instead of tapping the tree for the sap, and then using it from year to yoar, they cut it down at once and thus destroy it.

After delays by day, too numerous to mention, and lying by at night for nine tedious days, we found ourselves at Coocjo, here steamboat-navigation ends, twenty-one miles below Honda, the point nf departure for Bogota by land. The rest of the journcy to Honda is made, either by land on mules, or by woter in n bongo. This is a large open-bont dug out of a single log, or constituted of different pieces. A champan is a still larger boat, covered over for some twenty feet in the mid with a circular roof, composed of poles, palm leaves, etc. They are propelled up stream with setting poles; the boatmen who perform this drudgery are called "Bogas." Furnished with poles some fifteen feet long, with a fork of another kind of wood fastened to the lower end, they place one end on the bottnm or bank, and the other against their naked shoulders, and walk to the hind part of the boat, uttering a sort of gutturnl cry, that sounds like "oo-e! oo-e!" As this cry is uttered by all, a crew of Bogas keep up n terribio din, and as the current is very strong, harder work than taking n heavily loaded bongo up the river cannot well be imagined. Yet the entire commerce nf all upper New Grenada was carried on by this stream lu this nianner for centuries. As we found no mules at Conego, we concluded to go a part of the way by bongo. When the time for starting came, the rain was pouring, but as the mail could not wait we must go. The bont was narrow, and as the bagus must have room on each side to walk back and forth, we could not use our umbrellns, but sat exposed to n pelting rain for three hours. Having had enough of that kind of travel, as we had made but seven miles in that time, most of the company left the bongo at La Gursere, and took mules. Su much of the day was spent before we started that we lind n very hard ride before us. We took off through woods and fields, and across broad savannas, going at n South American pace. Night was approaching as we reached the worst part of the way—road there was none—on the brink of, and finally down, a precipice some two hundred feet high. The descent commenced in a thick wood; it was now quite dark, and the path had been made fearful by the rains to dismonnted, to feel our way, for we could see nothing. The captuin of the boat, who was of the company, led the way; I followed next, and Pres. Mallarino was brought up the rear. Soon the ex-President called to us that he could not advance, though he had left loose his horse, and was aided by his son. The latin and myself could not leave them, so we had to go. We were descending parallel with the precipice, a terrible bank and thicket. My plan was, to get rid of my mule, hang heavy upon the bridle with my hand, while I felt with my cane for the descents of nine or eighteen inches which were occurring every few steps. Arrested thus, in total darkness, our situation was unpleasant in the extreme. After considerable delay, our companions in the rear came up; we moved cautiously, and at length emerged from the intense darkness and reached the foot of the precipice; remounted, and we reached Honda before nine o'clock.

RITATION IN THE NORTHERN METHODIST CHURCH.

The Northern Methodist Church is widely and deeply agitated in consequence of the action of the recent General Conference on slavery, and the results already produced by it. It is now certnin tlint the Baltimore action of the Border, a strong, influential, and hitherto loyal membership, is irrecoverably lost to the Church. A convention of laymen and ministers is called to meet at the time and place of the next Baltimore Conference, to determine what course they ought to pursue under the circumstances. In addition to this, The Methodist, the independent paper recently established in New York—the best Methodist paper in the North, and the best Methodist paper in the United States started with adequate pecuniary and literary capital and facilities—after upholding the Christian Advocate and Journal, at the head of good feeling, and a widely-extended partyism is likely to be the result. It is not in anger, but in sorrow—not in the spirit of triumph, but of grief—when we say that our Northern Methodist brethren have sometiore sown to the wind, and are now reaping the whirlwind. The fanatical leaders who have brought about this unfortunate state of things now begin to see their danger, if not their folly. Dr. Kingsley, the author of the "New Chapter," vainly pleads with Baltimore. Dr. Thomson, the abolition orntor of the General Conference, who was elected by his party over Dr. Stevens, is as silent as the grave on the slavery question; while The Methodist, in sympathy with Dr. Stevens, is the real leader in the dissensions of the Northern Church, just as the Christian Advocate and Journal, under Dr. Stevens, was before. A two-fold division may be the result.

GLORIOUS TIMES IN NORTH LOUISIANA.

Rev. Dr. C. G. Young writes us from Delhi, La., 14th August, as follows: I stop to drop you a few lines to tell you the Lord is carrying his work among the people through North Louisiana. Some three weeks ago, at a quarterly meeting at Chapel Hill, in Ouachita parish, held by brothers Randell and McClendon, several were added to the Church, and professed. About the same time brother Wright had a very good meeting at Gum Ridge, in the same parish, which resulted in a number of accessions and conversions. Upon the heels of these, brothers Ivy and Smith commenced a camp-meeting, about nine miles east of Monroe. This was a new thing in Ouachita, and many predicted a failure; but it proved to be a happy time. Twenty-odd precious persons joined the Church, and more than that number found peace and pardon. I never attended so orderly a camp-meeting, nor one that was altogether so pleasant. We had six- or eighteen preachers present, and the largest collection of people I ever seen in the parish.

Upon breaking up the camp-meeting, I thought the time auspicious to try what could be done in Monroe, and proposed to the brethren in the ministry to adjourn to town. This was cheerfully agreed to, and brother Trippett, who is well known and very popular there, went and took charge, accompanied by brother Stone, Parvin, Wright, Smith, and myself. Here again some failure was predicted; but the people came to hear, the brethren had great boldness in proclaiming the truth, and God was pleased to bless his word, so that, when I left on yesterday, there were seven whites and sixteen blacks had joined the Church, and I think a larger number had professed Christ. Here, too, may say I have never seen a revival conducted more orderly, better behavior on the part of the congregation, than on this occasion. A large portion of those who have joined the Church and professed are young men, many of whom give promise of usefulness. There were also heads of families and young ladies, so that the work seems to be deep, and to have pervaded nearly the whole community. Quite a number who have been awakened will, doubtless, join other branches of the Church. The meeting is still in progress.

Brother Ivy left the camp-meeting with brother McClaughey to assist him in holding a basket-meeting on Bayou Macon, between Floyd and Monticello; and I have just learned they also have had a glorious time. About forty joined the Church, and in this, as in the previous meetings, many of the accessions are among the solid, substantial men of the country.

Last night brother Ivy closed another of his quarterly meetings, in Franklin parish, at which the Lord graciously blessed the people, and some fifteen joined the Church, and the members were greatly revived. This is in brother Pitts' work.

Brother McClendon is also having good meetings all around his circuit.

Altogether, over 150 persons have joined the Church at these meetings within three weeks, and a great and glorious religious reformation is going on through this whole region. May God carry it on until every family shall erect an altar for worship! During the progress of the meeting at Monroe there have been four sudden deaths in the place and vicinity; one from violence, two from drowning, and one well known citizen was found dead by the side of the road, having died, probably from apoplexy, on his return home from town.

To-morrow there is to be a birthiene here, to celebrate the completion of the railroad to this place, and there will be a large gathering of the people. The track is extending every day beyond this, and is also being laid from Monroe this way, and we hope to have the road completed from Vicksburg to Monroe by the first of December.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

NOVEL LAW SUIT.—A suit has been brought by Gen. A. H. Ledyard, of Cazenovia, New York, against Henry Ten Eyck, for obstructing the plaintiff's view of Cazenovia Lake, by planting willow trees on the shore of the Lake. Mr. Ten Eyck's residence is on the lake shore, and he has built out into the natural waters by filling in with earth and planting trees, which the plaintiff contends he has no right to do.

NEW FEATURE IN RAILROAD ACCOMMODATIONS.—Every day brings something new in the way of accommodations for railroad travelers. First came the smoking car, then the sleeping car, and now we have the restaurant, introduced by the Lehanon Valley Railroad Company, which, like the others, is bound to become a popular institution. This car, supplied with every variety of refreshments in the eating and drinking line, is attached to the through train between Harrisburg and New York city, affording passengers ample opportunity for appeasing their thirst and hunger without leaving the cars for that purpose.

MRS. BRADLEL.—The happy man who is reputed to have married Mrs. Cunningham Bardell, in San Francisco, is Rev. Mr. Sheehan, a Universalist preacher of more than ordinary talent.

WESTERN CITIES.—The four leading Western cities are now nearly of the same size, although ten years ago there was an extraordinary disparity between them. Cincinnati now numbers a population of 165,000, St. Louis 145,000, Pitsburg 110,000, Chicago 120,000. Memphis is probably growing more rapidly than any other.

A KANSAS BUILT STEAMBOAT.—The first steamboat ever built in Kansas was launched on the 30th ult., upon Kansas rives.—It is called the "Kansas Valley," and is nimely feet long, thirteen feet beam, with side wheels, and draws only one foot of water.

SYMPATHY WITH THE SYRIAN CHRISTIANS.—A meeting for the purpose of sympathizing with the Christians of Syria in their present deplorable condition, and of devising the best means for their relief, was held in New York on the 13th inst., and a committee was appointed to consider the subject and report at a future meeting.

PERU AND THE UNITED STATES.—It is reported that the Peruvian Minister at Washington is instructed by his government to return home in case our Minister in Peru, Mr. Clay, should suspend his relations there on account of the refusal of that government promptly to comply with the demands of our own.

STEAM ON CANALS.—The success of steam on the Erie canal, this season, demonstrates still further the practicability of employing this new agent in inland navigation to a large extent.—Steam towing has already become a business of some importance.

CALIFORNIA WOOL.—The first shipment of wool was made from San Francisco to the Atlantic States in 1854, and amounted to only 3500 lbs. The shipments this year will exceed 3,000,000 lbs.

REED'S CHOATE.—A Boston paper states that liberal subscriptions have been made for the purchase of Avons's great picture of Choate, to be presented to the city, and placed in Faneuil Hall, and that nearly the whole amount needed has been subscribed.

ALABAMA AND FLORIDA RAILROAD.—The entire portion of this road from Pensacola to the Alabama State line has been laid. The work of finishing on the Alabama portion is vigorously prosecuted, and ere long there will be uninterrupted communication between Montgomery and Pensacola.

LADY FRANKLIN.—Lady Franklin, wife of the late Sir John Franklin, accompanied by her niece, came passenger by the steamship Adriatic, which arrived at New York on the 11th inst. President Pierce has received the degree of LL. D. from Dartmouth College, New Hampshire.

THE SWISS MISSION.—It is said that the Hon. Elijah Ward, of New York, has been offered the mission to Switzerland and has declined it.

THE GREAT EASTERN.—After returning to New York from her trip to Cape May, the Great Eastern proceeded on a trip to Hampton Roads and Chesapeake Bay. At last accounts she was lying off Annapolis, and visited by thousands of people.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.—It is expected that the Prince will visit New York about the 1st of October, and that he will embark at that port on his return to England.

MRS. HOLT, wife of the Postmaster General, died on the 15th inst., in Washington.

General Harney arrived at Washington on the 15th inst. He was removed from his command of the North Pacific Military Department, at the instance of General Scott, for his conduct in connection with the San Juan difficulty and it is said that he will probably be courtmartialed.

LADY FRANKLIN.—It is stated that Lady Franklin, who arrived in the steamship Adriatic from England and, at last accounts, was on a visit to Mr. Henry Grinnell in New York, will visit the Pacific States, and probably take up her residence next Winter in San Francisco, to which she is advised by her physicians.—Though in general good health, a mild climate is necessary to her, and therefore San Francisco has been recommended. Lady Franklin is now sixty years of age, having been born in 1800.

AN AMERICAN IN A FRENCH PRISON.—The Baton Rouge Gazette says: "We have a private letter from our fellow-citizen J. E. Testard, Esq., written from a prison in Bordeaux, in France, where he has been sentenced by a court martial to six days' imprisonment, and condemned to serve two years in the French army. The government claims this service of him because of the circumstances of his birth in that country.—Serve he must, or buy a substitute. So it seems the French government still persists in not recognizing the rights of American naturalized citizens born in France.

THE TOWN OF HENDERSON (TEXAS) BURNT.—A letter dated Houston, August 10th, says: "A gentleman who passed through Henderson, Rusk county, on Monday morning last, reports that the town of Henderson was discovered to be on fire on Sunday night, 5th inst., and was almost entirely consumed. When he passed through all that was to be seen of the square was smouldering embers, except one dwelling house that escaped the conflagration. "It appears by later accounts that the principal hotel and all but one of the business houses were destroyed.—The loss is estimated at from $175,000 to $250,000. All the supplies of groceries, etc., for the town and neighborhood were burned, leaving many families reduced to want. A negro woman belonging to a man named Herndon, a small tavern keeper, confessed to having started the fire. Herndon and brother are under arrest. Herndon was already accused for having dealt with slaves for stolen goods. The committee were investigating the affair, and many negroes confessed to a knowledge of a general plot for incendiarism and murder.

AN AMERICAN NATURALIST.—The Red River (Hudson Bay Territory) Northwester states that Robert Kennicott, an American naturalist, when last heard from was at Mackenzie river, and had made a collection of five hundred and twenty vertebrate animals, and several hundred invertebrates.

THE GREAT CATHEDRAL AT NEW YORK.—Archbishop Hughes has ordered the suspension of the work upon the new Catholic Cathedral at New York. The walls of the building are now some ten or eleven feet, on an average, over the surface, and give earnest of what the structure will be when finished, but there is such a lack of funds for proceeding with the work, that the Archbishop will not allow the work to go on, lest the workmen will be defrauded of the fruits of, honest toil.

SNOW STORM IN AUGUST.—The steamboat J. K. Lucas, on Sunday, 12th inst., when on her trip from Memphis to St. Louis, encountered a snow storm for some fifteen minutes.

GARIBALDI FUND.—We learn from the Mobile Register that the sum of $223 50 has already been subscribed by the Italian residents of that city, in aid of the cause of Italian Independence, as advocated and planned by Garibaldi, as well as in aid of those who have been made widows and orphans by the loss of their protectors in the battles which have been fought in Sicily.

Judge Grillin, of Washington county, Miss., is said to be the largest cotton planter in the South. His crop is about 5000 bales.

MONUMENT TO JOSEPH GALES.—A meeting to take measures for the erection of a monument to the late Joseph Gales, of the National Intelligencer, was held in the City Hall, Washington, on the 16th instant. A resolution "that it is proper that a marble monument, with suitable inscriptions, be erected in the City of Washington, commemorative of the life and public services of the late Joseph Gales, a former chief magistrate of the city," was adopted, and an address to the public was agreed to.

BATTLE WITH INDIANS IN NEW MEXICO.—Accounts from New Mexico state that a party of Navajo Indians attacked a settlement eleven miles below Santa Fe, killed two men, and drove off their stock. The citizens went out, and after an engagement, recovered the stock, killing thirteen Indians, and losing five of their party.

OREGON.—Advices from Oregon state that the crops are unprecedently large.

CARSON VALLEY.—By the latest accounts brought by the Overland California mail we learn that the recent vote in Carson Valley indicates the organization of a Nevada Provisional Government on the basis of Squatter Sovereignty.

The Rev. Dr. Lipscomb, of Alabama, has been appointed Councellor of the University of Georgia, and has accepted the appointment.

The synagogue of the congregation B'nai Israel, situated at the corner of Stanton and Forsyth streets, New York, was consecrated on Sunday, 5th inst., with the imposing ceremonies peculiar to the Jewish mode of worship.

The Christian Intelligencer gives currency to a rumor that a legacy of $100,000, which was made many years ago to the General Episcopal Theological Seminary of New York, has been almost totally lost through an indiscreet change in the mode of investment.

BALTIMORE.—According to the census just taken, the population of the city of Baltimore is 219,818, being an increase in the last ten years of 50,761.

FOREIGN NEWS.

GREAT BRITAIN.—The weather, at last accounts, was cold and showery and anxiety about the crops was increasing. The House of Commons has passed a resolution authorizing the Secretary for India to raise by loan three million pounds sterling for the service of the Government. In the House of Commons, Lord John Russell had explained the position of the question for making Spain one of the great powers. The movement, he stated, was first initiated by the French Government. Suggestions were also under consideration that Sweden, and perhaps Portugal and Sardinia, ought also to be added to the great powers. Lord John Russell said the concert of the great powers on various questions had tended materially to preserve the peace of Europe. The British Government were of the opinion that it was not unlesirable to make some additions to the mutal force of Europe

FRANCE.—Rumors are again current of an interview to take place between the Emperor Napoleon and Queen Isabella II of Spain. The Emperor, after reviewing the troops destined for Syria, addressed them as follows: "Soldiers—You leave for Syria. France hails with joy an expedition, the sole aim of which is to cause the rights of justice and humanity to triumph. You do not go to make war against a foreign nation, but to assist the Sultan in bringing back to obedience his subjects, who are blinded by the fanaticism of the former century. In that district you have great remindscenes. Fulfill your duty; show yourselves worthy to be the children of those who once gloriously carried into that country the banner of Christ. You do not leave in great numbers, but your courage and prestige are a supply to the dellcieney, because, whenever the French flag is seen to pass, the nations know that a great cause precedes it, and great people follow it." It is said that at Paris great political distrust prevails in the political circles, on the Syrian and Italian question.

ITALY.—At the last accounts the city of Rome was in a perfect state of tranquility. From Naples and Sicily the news is exciting. It is said that Garibaldi has made a descent, with his forces from Messina, on the main land at Reggio, but the story is doubted. The Neapolitan government was making great preparations to repulse the Garibaldians. There are all sorts of reports afloat as to the intentions of Austria, &c., but they seem so unreliable that we do not repeat them.

SYRIA.—In the British House of Commons, Lord John Russell, in reply to inquiries as to the part England would take as regards intervention in Syria, said that marines would be landed from the British squadron, if necessary, to protect English subjects there, but that he had good hopes that the energy of Fuad Pacha would speedily restore tranquility, and render such a proceeding unnecessary.

MARRIAGE OF AN EAST INDIAN PRINCESS.—A marriage recently took place at St. George's Church, Hanover Square, London, between Lt Col. John Campbell of her Majesty's Indian army and the Princess Victoria Caracanna, daughter of the late ex-Rajah of Cogg.

SURVEILLANCE IN RUSSIA.—No newspapers, magazines or reviews are permitted to enter Russia by the post. They must be subscribed for at the post office itself. All travelers, be they Russians or foreigners, have all their books taken from them on passing the frontier—even guide books or conversation books, or even engravings or drawings. They are removed to the nearest censor, who returns them or not, just as suits his fancy or convenience. All strangers arriving at St. Petersburg have to appear before the political police, who interrogate them as to their objects in traveling, as to whom they are acquainted with, and what letter of introduction they are bearers of.

THE IRISH VOLUNTEERS IN INDIA.—Letters have been received in Limerick, (Ireland,) preparing the relatives and friends of respectable young men who took their departure for Home, to join the Pope's army, for their speedy return, they having been much disappointed in not having obtained commissions, upon promise of which, and other flattering inducements, they were enticed to go over. Extraordinary revelations are expected to be made.

The Queen of England, a splendid screw steamship, purchased by the agents of Garibaldi in Liverpool, sailed from that port on August 3, for Sicily. The Queen of England was well stored with muskets, ammunition, etc., and a large quantity of hospital material shipped by the Ladies' Garibaldi Society, London.

RUSSIAN FLEET FOR SYRIA.—A dispatch from St. Petersburg says: "A fleet is ready at Cronstadt to make speedy sail for Syria. It consists of the steam frigates—the Grand Admiral, of sixty guns, newly built in America for the Russian Government; the Gromoboi, and the Oleg." The Nord says that the above fleet will be strengthened by three or four other Russian vessels now cruising in the Mediterranean.

ORIGIN OF THE MASSACRE OF CHRISTIANS AT DAMASCUS.—The immediate cause of the massacre at Damascus is thus stated by a correspondent of the Boston Traveler, under date of Beyrout, July 14, 1860: "On Monday, the 19th instant, children who had been making crosses in the mud, and otherwise insulting the Christians of Damascus, were arrested by the Governor, and after a short imprisonment were sent to sweep the streets of the Christians. This step was the alleged cause of the outbreak, and every Frank considered it but a part of the general plan to produce the result which I am about to communicate. A mob of about five hundred persons rushed to the relief of these children, and attacked the Christian quarters at two o'clock P. M. At this hour the Christian merchants were away from their houses, in the business part of the city, and were unable to reach their families after the breaking forth of the insurrection. The signal for death and destruction having thus been given, the work of carnage commenced, and at the date of the latest advices, yesterday at 3 P. M., the work of murder and pillage was still going on."

It is said that the Count de Paris and the Duke de Chartres contrived to save their lives by travelling rapidly through the mountains of Beirut.

THE FRENCH VINTAGE.—The news of the vineyards of France is excellent and the quantity now certain. The liner wines will be an average crop, but the ordinary wines extremely abundant. High quality will be scarcer, because the vintage is not expected before the 8th or 10th October, and it is rare that very superior quality is obtained in so late a season.

MARRIAGE OF A DAUGHTER OF CHARLES DICKENS.—The second daughter of Charles Dickens was lately married at Higham Church, Kent, to Mr. Charles Collins, a brother of Wilkie Collins, and himself a budding author. Mr. Dicken's country house is at Gad's Hill, in Kent, the scene of Falstaff's Prince Hal's, Nym's, Pistol's, and Bardolph's exploits—the very locality for a man of genius and humor.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM IN GERMANY.—There is interesting news from Germany. The old aristocratic, but free, Constitution of the Republic of Hamburg, is no more. An extensive scheme of reform, in the sense of representative institutions of modern shape, which, under the name of "Constitution of the Nine," has been ventilated since 1848, has been, with but little variation, adopted by the Senate, and by the body of freeholders, or, as they are called at Hamburg, hereditary burgesses.

BIRTH OF A PRUSSIAN PRINCESS.—The Princess Frederic William, of Prussia (daughter of Queen Victoria) was safely delivered of a daughter at Berlin on the 24th of July.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.—We learn from the London papers that the Atlantic Telegraph Company have announced the failure of the efforts made to restore the submerged cable.

A CHANGE IN NAME.—The Official Journal of Naples has changed its title, and is now called Constitutional Journal of the two Sicilies.

In the year 1859 England had no fewer than 1,500,000 depositors in saving banks, and France upwards of 1,000,000.

The Fourth of July, being Garibaldi's birth-day, was observed as a holiday in Sicily.

The Sicilian fete at Milan, July 1, is said to have produced a clear £1000 for the benefit of the revolution.

Since our last issue we have received the following intelligence from British North America, Mexico, Central and South America, etc.

British North America.—The papers in British North America are to a great extent occupied in noticing the progress of the Prince of Wales through the Provinces. Everywhere he is received with enthusiasm. The Prince, before leaving St. John's, New Faundland, presented to the lady of Governor Hannernan a splendid bracelet, set with diamonds and emeralds; also the portraits of his brothers and sisters. He also gave $250 to the Church of England Asylum for Widows and Orphans, $250 to the Benevolent Irish Society, and $250 to be expended amongst poor persons in the town. He arrived at Quebec on the 18th, and during his stay there was the object of the most loyal attentions. At last accounts he was at Montreal, where he arrived on the 21th. On the 25th, (as we learn by telegraph) he "laid the corner-stone" of the tar-famed Victoria Bridge, the ceremony which was the ostensible object of his visit to Canada.—The liberal papers of Canada, while entirely respectful to the Prince, take occasion to remind him of certain ideas of their own. The Hamilton Times, speaking of his intended visit to the United States, remarks: "A valuable lesson will the young Prince learn from observing the prosperity of that people whom his ancestors drove to rebellion. He will see how little a free and energetic people really depend upon princes—how easily they can be dispensed with, and how wise it is to dispense with them when they misuse the prerogatives, which are intrusted to them for the people's benefit." The Queen's Government organs meanwhile, seize the opportunity of the Prince's visit to revive the agitation in favor of a Federal Union of the Provinces. The Toronto leader, one of the organs of the Canadian Government, remarks: "We are safe in saying that this extended tour of the Prince of Wales will go more toward maturing the object of a Federal Union of British America, than could have been done in half a dozen years by the ordinary machinery of Parliaments and the Press." The Montreal Gazette, another Government organ, holds nearly the same language. It says: "On our part, we fervently hope the one important result will be to unite the provinces in one grand sectional empire under the British crown—having one Parliament, one system of defence, one social policy—and let the pettiness of king, lords and commons in small places disappear. Let us have local bodies for local and minor matters, but let all important questions belong to the North American Parliament alone." It is stated in a dispatch from Quebec that the Prince intends to spend as much time in the United States and to see as much of it as possible, before his return to Europe.

Mexico.—The latest accounts from Mexico represent that the Liberal army had invested the city of Mexico, and that Miramon was at a town some 20 or 25 miles from the city, but the general impression was that he could not hold out much longer. The Liberals, it is said, have taken several important towns, and are confident of the speedy triumph of their cause. We have already noticed the fact, that the Spanish commander at Vera Cruz had made a demand on the Constitutional Government for the restoration of the bark Conception, and that the demand had been rejected by President Juarez. It now appears that this demand was made in a peremptory form, and accompanied with a threat of immediate hostilities in case the demand should not be complied with in 24 hours. In consequence of this threat, and the anticipation that it would be followed by some practical demonstration on the part of the Spanish squadron, the Constitutional Government immediately made preparations for defense. Everything was placed in readiness to repel the expected attack. It was expected momentarily that the Spanish fleet would commence a bombardment. We are informed that the greatest enthusiasm prevailed among the population of the city. So far from dreading the attack, it was universally desired that the Spanish fleet should carry its threat into execution. This feeling was produced and stimulated by the conviction that the United States would embrace the opportunity of coming to the assistance of the Constitutional Government. In fact, immediately on the occurrence of these events, President Juarez dispatched letters to this country, which have since gone on to Washington, asking American assistance, or at least the privilege of raising volunteers and procuring arms and munitions of war within our territory. How far these appeals have been successful we have as yet no intelligence, further than the announcement by telegraph that our government is determined to concentrate a strong naval force near some point on the Gulf of Mexico, that the steam frigate Susquehanna, which was under orders for the Mediterranean, has sailed from New York to cruise in the Gulf, that the steam frigate Powhattan proceeds to the Gulf as quickly as possible, and that special orders have been sent to other vessels to repair thither.

Central America.—The news of the taking of the town and fort of Truxillo, Honduras, by General Walker, is confirmed. It appears that he took sixteen cannon, one hundred and twenty-five stand of arms, eighteen hundred pounds of powder and a large quantity of munitions, including clothing, provisions, etc. Gen. Walker, it is said, is confident of being able to hold Truxillo for the next four months against any force that can be brought against him. He is assisted by Gen. Cabanas, who is opposed to the present President, Gen. Guatibola. The latter has applied to Gen. Barrera, Dictator of Guatemala, for assistance, which has been refused. A large number of the natives, we are told, are joining General Walker's standard. It seems to be Walker's object to upset the Government of Guatibola and place Cabanas in power in Honduras, and then with his assistance to invade Nicaragua.

POLITICAL.

The New York Breckenridge State Convention, in session at Syracuse, a few days ago, put forth an Electoral ticket, and nominated James T. Brady, of New York, for Governor.

The Douglas Executive committee in Louisiana has announced an Electoral ticket.

Full returns of the State Elections in Kentucky, Missouri, North Carolina and Arkansas, have not yet come to hand, but the result in each State is pretty well ascertained. In Kentucky, Leslie Combs, the Bell candidate for clerk of the Court of Appeals, is elected by an immense majority. In Missouri, Claiborne Jackson, the Douglas candidate for Governor, is, in all probability, elected. In North Carolina, Ellis, the Democratic candidate for Governor, is elected, but by a reduced majority. In Arkansas, Johnson, the Democratic nominee for Governor, it is most likely has been elected.

The Pennsylvania Breckinridge State Convention in session a few days ago, adopted a resolution, providing to head a ticket with the names of Breckinridge and Lane, and instructing the electors for the State at large to vote for whatever Democratic Presidential candidate can be elected by the electoral vote of Pennsylvania. A full Electoral ticket was nominated.

From California we have accounts that the Breckinridge and Douglas Conventions to nominate Electoral tickets, are to be held in September, and that the movement for a Bell and Everett Electoral ticket was progressing.

The Mississippi Douglas State Convention was held at Grenada, on the 15th inst., and a State Electoral ticket was nominated.

It now appears that the result of the recent North Carolina Election, is the re-election of Governor Ellis, the Democratic candidate, by a majority of about 8,500 votes over John Pool, the opposition (Bell and Everett) candidate. The Democrats also obtained a majority in the Legislature, but much reduced.

The Ohio Bell and Everett convention met in Chillicothe, on the 16th, and nominated a State Electoral ticket.

The New York Douglas Convention, at Syracuse, on the 17th, nominated a State Electoral ticket satisfactory to a Bell and Everett committee, which was present, so there has a fair prospect of a fusion in New York against Lincoln.

A report that Mr. Breckenridge has called a consultation of his friends, to decide on the propriety of his withdrawing from the contest for the Presidency, is declared by Mr. Breckinridge to be totally unfounded.

The Coroner has fully investigated the collision of the two trains on the Carrollton Railroad on Sunday evening, 19th inst. Much testimony was taken, and the jury found the Engineer, Wm. Sullivan, guilty of manslaughter.

There were 142 deaths in the city last week. Three were from yellow fever but this gives no cause for alarm as there are no indications of an epidemic. Generally, the city is quite healthy, and, for the time of the year, very lively.

The Delta learns that a vessel will leave this port, in a few days, for Truxillo, with men, arms and ammunitions for General Cabanas and General Walker.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, August 27, 1860.

The market generally has exhibited but a moderate degree of animation since our last report, though in cotton we have noticed rather more activity in the movement, with more free arrivals of the New Crop and at the same time more favorable advices from Europe with regard to the staple. In Tobacco, operations have been checked by accounts of rain and the consequent impraved prospects of the growing Crop, and the business has been of a moderate character. The stock of Sugar in the City and State is now very low, and we notice only limited operations at higher prices. Western produce has moved off slowly with but few changes in the rates for the past week.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that there prevails considerable irregularity, but the market has generally shown more steadiness than we have had occasion to notice for some weeks past, and closed at about the range of nor quotations.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 2,113,-153 bales, against 1,654,194 bales to same date last year, and the increase of the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with the last year, is 781,575 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is an increase of 703,840 bales to Great Britain, and of 147,153 to France, while to other foreign ports there is a decrease of 49,176 bales.

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Chapter XVIII.

"How softly that green bank sloped down from the hill
To the spot where the fountain grew suddenly still!
How cool was the shadow the long branches gave,
As they hung from the willow and dipped in the wave."

Beautiful indeed was the view spread out before them. The clear, smooth expanse of water, the tall trees with their broad spreading foliage, the deep emerald underwood — branches bent so gracefully, almost lovingly, — the cooling stream, which seemed, in very gratitude — the pleasant shade which they afforded, to mirror them with two-fold beauty; the small but beautifully constructed pleasure boats; the deep, dark forest with its solemn trees and silent shade, "unplercel by human thought;" all, all silent in one harmonious picture, which was indeed capable of winning the mind from all gloom or despondency. And as these youthful beings stood on the verge of the stream, their clear ringing laugh was heard, and even their conversation was for a while suspended, that they might more fully enjoy and appreciate the scene before them. But it was for a moment only that they stood in this wrapt admiration, for as their ears caught the distant sound of the old mill wheel, as its quick successive revolutions broke the smooth surface of the stream some distance below, scattering the sparkling spray in a thousand bright scintillations and mimic rainbows around, their gaiety returned; and eagerly, with excited and impatient hands, were the boats untied and launched upon the inviting stream, filled with gay and happy hearts, whose every pulse beat in unison with the quick oar as they glided rapidly along.

Alline had, in obedience to the commands of her father, remained on the banks of the stream, for it was on this condition alone that she had gained his consent to be one of the party. He feared some accident might befall his child; and though Alline would gladly have accompanied those joyous ones on their excursion down the stream, she felt it her duty to obey her parent, and answered their urgent request, that she would enter a boat, with a pleasant smile and a shake of her head which indicated that firmness of purpose which those who knew her well had learned to respect and admire.

"I remain with Alline," said Ellen.

"And I," said Frank Carlton.

"And I, too," said another whom we need scarcely name as Edward Leslie.

But Alline interrupted them, exclaiming, "No, oh no; you must not deny yourselves this pleasure for me; I will not have it so. I would not have made one of the party if I had thought that to have deprived you of your pleasure. Do go, Mr. Leslie, and you, Frank. Ellen may remain with me, for I know her timid nature, and really believe, as she says, that she would prefer to remain."

Thus urged, Edward consented to leave them, while Ellen and Frank quietly seated themselves on a rude seat near by, as it to satisfy Alline that to urge them further would be useless. This conversation occupied a short time, during which the boats containing their precious freight were rapidly proceeding down the stream, on perceiving which Frank ran forward to hail the nearest boat that it might return and take Edward, but just at this moment he saw that his friend had procured a small skiff whose dimensions were scarcely accommodating even to the cramped position of its occupant, and was following the course of the other boats. Frank looked at him with a dubious smile, but drawing forth his handkerchief, he tied it to his cane, and as the skiff neared the bank where he stood, he hastily placed it firmly in such a position that it might float above, and giving his friend a cheering word, he returned to Ellen and Alline, who were laughing gleefully at the mimic sail. They had been seated only a few moments in quiet conversation when they were interrupted by an exclamation from Ellen, whose eye had watched the small, snowy sail as it floated in the gentle breeze, with anxious interest.

"Look, Frank, for mercy's sake tell me what has happened to Edward's boat. He seems to be unable to guide it. He has dropped his oar!"

Frank and Alline were up in a moment, and with their eyes riveted on the object before them, stood, breathlessly, trying to discern the nature of the accident which seemed to endanger the life of one so dear to them all. This silence was soon broken by Ellen, who uttered in deep, low tones of despair, "Oh, my God! the boat is sinking, and he cannot swim!"

It was indeed so; but before the words were scarcely uttered, Frank had comprehended the situation of his friend and was hastily divesting himself of a portion of his clothing preparatory to plunging into the stream. He was an expert swimmer, and as he struck out from the bank, Alline's and Ellen's hopes arose. Vigorously, and with the energy of despair, Frank struggled on. He saw Edward as he sank and rose for the second time, and knew by the calmness of his manner that he had ceased even his exertions and had resigned himself with the calmness of despair to his fate, and with renewed strength he breasted the placid stream upon which he had gazed with so much delight a few moments before, but which had now lost all beauty for him. He thought of it only as the cruel destroyer of his friend, and as each he struggled with it as with a human foe, exerting all his energy and straining every nerve determined to be the victor or to die. When within a few feet of the place where he had last seen Edward disappear, he had the joy of again seeing him rise, and with one desperate effort he obtained the space between them and seizing the exhausted body firmly in his grasp, he swam toward the bank at the nearest point, which was considerably below where he had left Ellen and Alline. But the girls, wild with affright, had followed Frank's course down the stream, keeping on the verge of the water, and thus witnessed the scene and were ready when Frank reached the shore, to render him assistance in drawing Leslie from the water, and as they bent above that inanimate form, hope died within them, and Ellen sank beside him in utter despair and hopeless grief. Alline and Frank did not lose their presence of mind, but endeavored by every means within their power to resuscitate their — to all appearance — lifeless friend; they had almost given up in despair, when signs of returning consciousness became visible, and as Alline and Frank uttered their fervent, "thank God," Ellen raised her head and fixed her eyes upon that face so dear to her, and finding that he did indeed live, she bent forward and murmured her thanks, inaudible, upon that bosom whose every pulse beat for her alone. It was sometime before they grew calm enough to speak, and then their words were few, for their hearts were too full of gratitude to the Giver of all good for any outward demonstrations. They scarcely had time to recover from their fright when the boats rounded a point and came in view. They were soon all on their return homeward, and though there was less of that exuberance of spirit which characterized their coming, they were scarcely less happy, for, though more serious and thoughtful, their young hearts were full of thankfulness and praise toward Him who had saved from a watery grave one of the dearest and noblest of their party.

Chapter XIX.

"I have a fair and gentle friend,
Whose heart is pure, I ween,
As ever was a maiden's heart
At joyous seventeen."

Some weeks had elapsed since the incident above related, and nothing had occurred to interest the young people of our little village. Each day had dawned brightly for them, it is true, but there had not been any assembling together, no scene of merriment, no new entertainment of any kind, and they were beginning to grow weary of this monotony, when Alline received a letter from a near and dear friend who resided in a village some miles distant. They had learned to love each other while school companions, and though separated, they had kept up their school-day's friendship by frequent correspondence. The seal was hastily broken and the contents perused with much pleasure; from it she learned that her friend was soon to be married, and within her missive were enclosed invitations for others of her acquaintance beside herself. It was not long before those invited to the wedding were assembled to devise ways and means for going. All had been arranged, and they had concluded to begin their journey the day after the succeeding one, as this would enable them to arrive at Mr. Lee's in time for Carrie's wedding.

The roads were in the worst condition from recent rains. Creeks and rivulets which were usually fordable were now swollen to a frightful extent. Mr. Elwin and Mr. Carlton were very sorry that Alline and Ellen seemed so much inclined to attend the wedding, for they knew there was danger in travelling by stage over the roads at the time. But wishing to gratify their children as much as possible, they had not as yet mentioned their fears, hoping that they would themselves think of the inconvenient and difficult mode of reaching Mr. Lee's at that season of the year. But no such thoughts entered those minds intent upon going. They realized only the bright scene which awaited them. What were rain and cold, or even bad roads, if after all they arrived safe? The prospect of joy and pleasant hours at the end of their journey would be sufficient reward for any disagreeable moments endured in gaining them. The morning of the day on which they proposed to start was ushered in by a chill, dreary rain; the wind had howled drearily all night around the mansion of Mr. Carlton, possessing really an ominous sound. But who could think of danger in that bright, happy, and eager group assembled on the gallery of that magnificent dwelling. Frank Carlton, Percy Maitland, and Edward Leslie, with Alline, Ellen, and Alice were excited to even an unusual degree as they moved about, busy in seeing all safely prepared for procedure. Their adieus had been made and they were now comfortably situated within the ponderous vehicle which had stood waiting for them for some length of time. As they drove along on their departure, familiar objects seemed to look sadly upon them; the wind sighed mournfully, and as each gust died far away beyond all human ken, our little party grew more thoughtful and grave. But Frank's usually happy nature soon overcame this momentary abstraction, and diffused a portion of its genial glow upon those around him.

"Come, cheer up," exclaimed he, as his own face brightened up, "one would think we were proceeding to join a funeral procession, so solemn have you all become. In a end of to witness the marriage rite; and this in particular promises to be an unusually brilliant affair, for nothing that wealth or position can lavish will be withheld to make it one of lasting remembrance, as Philip Lee is one of the proudest aristocrats in that portion of the country. His edifice stands far back from the street, surrounded by stately old trees, and graced by cool verandahs and spacious halls, presents a very imposing appearance; he should be a happy man who has won the heiress of that grand old estate."

"Say, rather," interrupted Alline, "that free, guileless being, that priceless gem — a woman's pure, young heart. Bright, joyous Carrie; may she ever be blessed, as now." And the tears that gemmed the eyes of Alline told the strength of that friendship which had been born amid the walls of that old academy, and nursed under the shade of those old trees.

"It is true, Alline, I should rather have thought of Carrie than her wealth, and do sincerely hope that her future husband has bowed at the shrine of her beauty and feeling rather than to Mammon. But do you believe her capable of a sincere and lasting attachment, Alline? She always appeared strangely light and fickle in all her attachments as a child; may she not retain these characteristics as a woman? Think, Alline, how fitfully and with what jesting words and laughing tones she spoke of poor Ellis, who loved her so deeply, so faithfully even unto death. I ever see his sad smile and patient face as her image rises before me with its tantalizing beauty and deceiving smiles. Come, tell me, what do you think of all this, for I would not judge one so young, so rich in beauty, and rare in mind, hastily?"

Alline raised her face to that of her lover's — tears gemming her eyes — as she uttered her reply, "Nay, Frank,

'Ask how on the dark waves breast
The lily's cup may gleam,
Though many a mournful secret rest
Low in the unfathomed stream.
That stream is like her hidden love
In its deep cavern's power,
And like her play of words
That lily's trembling flower.'"

"Beautiful, beautiful," exclaimed all as Alline ceased.

"But do you mean that Carrie really loved Ellis?" asked more than one with surprise.

"I do. Carrie did love him with that wild intensity which characterizes a young girl's first love, but she knew that her father would never consent to her union with one who possessed nothing but the heritage with which nature had endowed him, all sufficient as this was for his own and her happiness; she was well aware that his brilliant intellect and cultivated taste would not equal her own bright prospects, or compensate, in her father's estimation, for wealth, and thus she concealed her deeper feelings from Ellis, and even tried to deceive her own heart and to believe that it was only the semblance not the reality of love."

"This is strange; and stranger still that I should never have thought of it," said Frank, "This explains all that was so fitful and even capricious in her manner."

Children's Column.

A CHILD'S DREAM OF A STAR.

There was once a child, and he strolled about a good deal, and thought of a number of things. He had a sister, who was a child too, and his constant companion. These two used to wonder all day long. They wondered at the beauty of the flowers; they wondered at the height and blueness of the sky; they wondered at the depth of the bright water; they wondered at the goodness and power of Gon who made the lovely world.

They used to say to one another, sometimes, Supposing all the children upon earth were to die, would the flowers, and the water, and the sky, be sorry? They believed they would be sorry. For, said they, the birds are the children of the flowers, and the little pinyful streams that gambol down the hill-sides are the children of the water; and the smallest bright specks playing at hide and seek in the sky all night, must surely be the children of the stars; and they would all be grieved to see their playmates, the children of men, no more.

There was one clear shining star that used to come out in the sky before the rest, near the church spire, above the graves. It was larger and more beautiful, they thought, than all the others, and every night they watched for it, standing hand in hand at a window. Whoever saw it first, cried out, "I see the star!" And often they cried out both together, knowing so well when it would rise, and where. So they grew to be such friends with it, that before lying down in their beds, they always looked out once again, to bid it good night; and when they were turning round to sleep, they used to say, "God bless the star!"

But while she was still very young, oh very very young, the sister drooped, and came to be so weak that she could no longer stand in the window at night; and then the child looked sadly out by himself, and when he saw the star, turned round and said to the patient pale face on the bed. "I see the star!" and then a smile would come upon the face, and a little weak voice used to say, "God bless my brother and the star!"

And so the time came all too soon! when the child looked out alone, and there was no face on the bed; and when there was a little grave among the graves, not there before; and when the star made long rays down to Warm me.

Now, these rays were so bright, and they seemed to make such a shining way from earth to Heaven, that when the child went to his solitary bed, he dreamed about the star; and dreamed that, lying where he was, he saw a train of people taken up that sparkling road by angels. And the star, opening, showed him a great world of light, where many more such angels waited to receive them.

All these angels, who were waiting, turned their beaming eyes upon the people who were carried up into the star; and soon came out from the long rows in which they stood, and fell upon the people's necks, and kissed them tenderly, and went away with them down avenues of light, and were so happy in their company, that lying in his bed he wept for joy.

But there were many angels who did not go with them, and among them one he knew. The patient face that once had lain upon the bed was glorified and radiant, but his heart found out his sister among all the host.

His sister's angel lingered near the entrance of the star, and said to the leader among those who had brought the people thither:

"Is my brother come?"

And he said "No."

She was turning hopefully away, when the child stretched out his arms and cried "O, sister, I am here! Take me!" and then she turned her beaming eyes upon him and it was night; and the star was shining into the room, making long rays down towards him as he saw it through his tears.

From that hour forth, the child looked out upon the star as on the home he was to go to, when his time should come; and he thought that he did not belong to the earth alone, but to the star, too, because of his sister's angel gone before.

There was a baby born to him a brother to the child; and while he was so little that he never yet had spoken word, he stretched his tiny form out on his bed, and died.

Again the child dreamed of the opened star, and of the company of angels, and the train of people, and the rows of angels with their beaming eyes all turned upon those people's faces.

Said his sister's angel to the leader:

"Is my brother come?"

And he said "Not that one, but another."

As the child beheld his brother's angel in her arms, he cried, "O, sister, I am here! Take me!" And she turned and smiled upon him, and the star was shining.

He grew to be a young man, and was busy at his books when an old servant came to him and said:

"Thy mother is no more. I bring her blessing on her darling son."

Again at night he saw the star, and all that former company. Said his sister's angel to the leader:

"Is my brother come?"

And he said, "Thy mother!"

A mighty cry of joy went forth through all the star, because the mother was reunited to her two children. And he stretched out his arms and cried, "O, mother, sister, and brother, I am here! Take me!" And they answered him "Not yet," and the star was shining.

He grew to be a man, whose hair was turning grey, and he was sitting in his chair by the fireside, heavy with grief, and with his face bedewed with tears, when the star opened once again.

Said his sister's angel to the leader, "Is my brother come?"

And he said, "Nay, but his maiden daughter."

And the man who had been the child saw his daughter, newly lost to him, a celestial creature among those three, and he said, "My daughter's head is on my sister's bosom, and her arm is round my mother's neck, and at her feet there is the baby of old time, and I can hear the parting from her, God be praised!"

And the star was shining.

Thus the child came to be an old man, and his once smooth face was wrinkled, and his steps were slow and feeble, and his back was bent. And one night as he lay upon his bed, his children standing round, he cried, as he had cried so long ago:

"I see the star!"

They whispered one another, "he is dying."

And he said, "I am. My age is falling from me as a garment, and I move towards the star as a child. And O, my Father, now I thank thee that it has so often opened, to receive those dear ones who await me!"

And the star was shining; and it shines upon his grave.

"WORMS" ON THE FACE.

"Little black specks are occasionally observed upon the nose and forehead of some individuals. These specks, when they exist in any number, are a cause of much annoyance. They are minute corks, if we may use the term, of coagulated lymph, which close the orifices of the pores or exhalent vessels of the skin. On the skin immediately adjacent to them being pressed with the finger-nails, these bits of coagulated lymph will come from it in a vermicular form. They are vulgarly called "flesh worms," many persons fancying them to be living creatures. These may be got rid of, and prevented from returning, by washing with tepid water, by proper friction with a towel, and by the application of a little cold cream. The longer these little plugs are permitted to remain in the skin, the more firmly they become fixed: and after a time, when they lose their moisture, they are converted into little bony spines, as dense as bristles, and having much of that character. They should be thoroughly, but cautiously squeezed, says another author, and, on retiring to rest, a paste should be applied to the part affected. Recipe for the paste: Take one ounce of powdered bitter-almonds, one ounce of barley flour, and enough honey to make the above ingredients into paste. There is another and still more simple remedy, which you may prefer. Bathe the spots several times a day with lukewarm water and a sponge, rubbing the sponge over a piece of yellow soap. There is a healing power in soap distinct from its cleansing properties."

THE GREEK CHURCH.—A struggle has been going on for several years in the Greek Church, to deprive the patriarch of Constantinople, the acknowledged head of the Church, of secular power, (he and his Synod have hitherto exercised similar authority in secular matters with the Pope,) and confine him entirely to ecclesiastical authority. The national council of the Greek Church, which has been in session for nearly two years, and closed its deliberations in February last, has been agitated by the question. The decision of the national council is, by a decided majority, to deprive the patriarch and Synods of all secular and judicial power, and especially of the right to levy taxes. There will be a serious struggle, however, before this long-held and dearly-cherished authority is relinquished.

MINOR EFFECTS IN MONEY-SPENDING.—There is one thing we would be glad to see more parents understand, namely, that when they spend money judiciously to improve and adorn the house, and the ground around it, they are in effect paying their children a premium to stay at home as much as possible, to enjoy it; but that when they spend money unnecessarily in fine clothing and jewelry for their children, they are paying them a premium to spend their time away from home, that is in those places where they can attract the most attention and make the most display.

ANOTHER TENNYSON.—Another poetical brother of Alfred Tennyson has appeared, in the person of the Rev. Charles Tennyson-Turner, as a contributor to Macmillan's Magazine. This gentleman joined the laureate in his first publication, "Poems by two brothers;" he afterwards took the name of Turner on succeeding to a property in Lincolnshire. A younger brother, Frederick, published a volume of poems in 1854.

COSTLY GAS WORKS.—The editor of the North-Western Christian Advocate, who has been in Washington lately, writes home: "As we drove from the depot, a lady in the omnibus espied the great unfinished dome of the Capitol (which don't look much like a dome at present,) and said, innocently, 'I suppose those are the gas works?' 'Yes, madam, for the nation,' was the reply of a fellow-passenger."

DISCOVERY OF ANCIENT RUINS AT ST. ANDREWS, SCOTLAND.—The workmen employed in excavating at the Kirkhill, for the battery or gun platform for the use of the St. Andrews artillery volunteers, have come upon the ruins of what has evidently been a chapel built in the form of a cross. It is supposed by some to be the remains of a Culdee chapel, and to be the oldest piece of architecture about St. Andrews.

Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with the family of our deceased brother, and assure them that his memory will ever find an abiding place in our hearts.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished his family, be spread upon the minutes of this quarterly conference, and be published in the New Orleans Advocate.

Union Cross Roads, La., July 2, 1860.

Whereas it has pleased the Grand Architect of the Universe to visit us by the ruthless hand of death, taking from our mystic band our beloved brother and honored W. M., JAMES A. MARTIN, who departed this life May 25th, 1860, having surviving orphans; this seventy-eighth; leaving seven children helpless together a happy family. And as this visitation that held mands from us an appropriate expression of our feelings—

Resolved, That in the death of Brother J. A. Martin masonry has lost a zealous member, our lodge an active and efficient presiding officer, the fraternity a warm-hearted and worthy brother, society a useful citizen, and his children—who can estimate their loss, so truly orphaned so so short a time?

Resolved, That we deeply commiserate the poor little orphans of our deceased brother, and sincerely commend them to the tender mercies of Him who careth for the orphan; and it shall be our constant aim practically to demonstrate to them that a mason's affection embraces the orphans of a brother; that they possess a claim on us, sacred to every mason's heart.

THOMAS CAMACK is no more. He died at the house of his daughter, Ann Bell, near Crystal Springs, Copiah co., Miss., April 10, 1860. He was a son of James and Mary (or Elizabeth) Camack, and was born in the North of Ireland, June 1, 1784. His widowed mother, his elder brother William, himself and his twin-brother James, emigrated to the United States and landed at New York in the fall of 1707. He visited his uncle, David Camack, a farmer, residing near Charleston, S.C., with whom he remained several years, devoting himself to agricultural life. There he married Isabella Neely, about the year 1805. After his marriage he removed to Kentucky, and from thence to Tennessee, where his wife died. In Tennessee he was married again to Joanna Macklemore. In 1818 he removed to Mississippi, and after several changes of residence, settled permanently in Copiah county. He joined the M. E. Church as a seeker of religion, in Tennessee, and was a firm and devoted member some 40 or 45 years. In his last illness he was calm, and full of unbroken trust in God. He was the father of twelve children, and at his death looked upon a long line of healthy and prosperous posterity, numbering 7 children, 49 grandchildren, and 4 great-grandchildren. His mortal remains sleep in the burial-ground of Popler Springs church, where he was let down with religious solemnities, and amid a throng of weeping relatives and sympathizing friends, there to await the change of the archangel's trump and the matchless glories of the great rising day.

S. L. L. SCOTT.

N.B.—Should this sketch meet the eye of any of the relatives of the deceased, his son, James D. Camack, will be rejoiced to receive a line from them, at Crystal Springs, Copiah county, Miss.

MARY ELLIS, wife of Rev. Stephen Ellis, died August 12th 1860. She was born near Natchez, Miss.; removed in infancy to Washington parish, La., with her parents; was married Sept. 12th, 1822, and united herself with the Methodist E. Church in 1828. From the happy day on which she gave her heart to God she continued till the period of her death an humble and consistent christian. Through checkered scenes of joy and sorrow, she pursued the even tenor of her way, displaying the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit." As a wife, she had but few equals, and perhaps no superior. As a mother, it need only be said, that "her children arise up and call her blessed;" and as evidence of her efforts to guide their minds aright, nearly all of them have become the subjects of divine grace. As a friend and neighbor, it may be truly said of her—

"None knew her but to love,
None named her but to praise."

R. BARRINGTON.

Franklin, La., August 14, 1860.

MRS. SARAH C. FOWLER, wife of Rev. D. C. Fowler, and daughter of John and Elizabeth Bury, was born in Butler co., Ala., March 25th, 1824, and died in the same county, July 12th, 1860. In early life she embraced religion and joined the M. E. Church, of which she remained a faithful and consistent member until the day of her death. Sister F. was among the best of women. She lived and died a christian. Her last words were, "glory! glory! glory!" She has left a husband, two little children, and many friends and relatives to mourn her departure.

MRS. ELIZA PITTS, wife of Nathan Pitts, of Russel county, Ala., died June 18, 1860. She was born in Warren county, Ga., March 22, 1803, where she was raised. In early life she embraced religion and joined the M. E. Church, of which she remained a faithful member. Her piety was truly Scriptural, and had its influence on her family, and on all who knew her. She bore her last illness in a christian. The writer visited her, administered to her the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, found and left her calm in the love of God. On her last day on earth she became quite happy, saying, "all is well." She addressed her children, exhorting them to be fervent in spirit. She also exclaimed, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!" Then, saying "all is well, all is well," she passed away, leaving a kind husband and six children (five of whom have professed religion), and many friends to mourn.

JOHN P. DICKINSON.

THOMAS ALVA, infant son of Rev. J. W. and Mrs. L. A. Shores, died in Autangaville, Ala., July 2d, aged nearly four months. Most keenly do we feel the death of this lovely and interesting child; but the Lord gave him and has taken him back, and we can but say, "Let Him do what seemeth Him good."

HIS PARENTS.

TOBITHA REEVES was born in Calcasieu parish, La., Jan. 3, 1840; was married to James Reeves July 9, 1857; shortly after she joined the Methodist Church, under the ministry of the Rev. R. Parvin. Last fall, at our camp-meeting, she professed religion, and died July 30, 1860. After a day's illness, she died in the triumphs of faith, and to-day she rests from her labors.

OUR REPRINTS versus ECLECTICS, &c.

As we have for many years been paying more than $1,000 annually to the British publishers for the matter furnished in these Periodicals, thus virtually becoming co-partners with them in the profits of the Reprints, we trust the public will consider this in bestowing their patronage, and give us the preference over Eclectic and other patchwork publications, whether monthly or weekly, which now extract so liberally from our works and pay nothing either to the Foreign Publisher or to us for the same. As to cheapness, nobody can complain of paying $3 a year for the four leading British Reviews and Blackwood's Magazine, and by taking these works entire subscribers are not obliged to be guided or by others in the choice of the articles they may desire to reject. Moreover, taking into consideration the duty to which each of its pages are published, and their acknowledged fidelity to the original editions, and also the advantage of an early issue by means of the advance sheets—our series will be found as cheap as any of the competing publications to which we have alluded.

AN EPISCOPALIAN, A PRESBYTERIAN, AND THE BIBLE.

A correspondent of the Presbyterian complains that an Episcopal clergyman, who was allowed to occupy the pulpit of the Presbyterian church at Atlantic City, took occasion to assail the doctrine of limited atonement, which, he must have been aware, was a doctrine of the Presbyterian Church. In airing his disapprobation he alleges that said minister assailed what Presbyterians believe to be a cardinal truth of God's word, and which neither he nor any other man can refute.

We like the unequivocal announcement, that a limited atonement is not only a doctrine of the Presbyterian church, but is a cardinal one with them. We should like to see the minister of that church who would attempt to defend that distinct proposition before a popular assembly in this country. Such doctrines may do for ante-communion lectures, for the lecture-room of the Theological Professor, but not for the great Bible-reading public.

"Refute" that which inspiration has robbed of all support, when it declares that "Jesus Christ tasted death for every man!" Heb. 2, ix. A distinguished Presbyterian commenteter says on this text, "for each and all, for bond or free, high or low, elect or non-elect." How could words affirm more clearly that the atonement made by the Lord Jesus was unlimited in its nature and design? How can we express that idea in more clear or intelligible language? The friends of the doctrine of general atonement do not desire any other than scripture language in which to express their belief. It expresses it exactly, without any need of modification or explanation. Of the opponents of this doctrine he says, "they cannot incorporate it into their creeds, that the Lord Jesus tasted death for every man." Indeed they can't; the Bible has to be ignored on this doctrine, for no passage within its lids says that he died for a man less than the whole race. What it says of one it says of all, John 3, xvi, &c. Yet this man, who claims to be a Christian, wants somebody to "refute" the doctrine of limited atonement. Let him lay aside such an utterly unwarranted notion, and pray God to forgive him for ever harboring it.

II.

LONDON PREACHERS.

The pulpit orators of London, both among the churchmen and nonconformists, are in the main faithful, learned, and eloquent men. I have been pleased with their manner of preaching. It is generally free from the rhetorical display so prevelent in America, and far better calculated to win souls.

BAPTIST NOEL.

I wound my way to John street Chapel, to listen to the Hon. and Rev. Baptist W. Noel, formerly of the established church, and at one time chaplain to the queen—but who some two years since joined the Baptists, and is now considered one of the first dissenting ministers in London. The John street Chapel is very plain, but the honest intelligent look of the large and attentive audience assured me I had fallen in good company. The church numbers some six hundred members, and the Sunday-schools are very large. There is nothing remarkable in Mr. Noel's style of preaching. He has a sweetly persuasive voice, and his forte seems to be calmness and kindness rather than novelty or boldness—and there is a delightful simplicity and sincerity in every word that falls from his ready lips. Those most hostile to his separation from the Establishment, where his fame and talent would certainly have insured him great influence and honor, never for a moment question the conscientious integrity with which he entered his new ecclesiastical relations, and made a change involving a sacrifice of which an American can scarce form an adequate idea.

DR. CUMMING.

The Rev. Dr. Cumming, of the Scotch Chapel near the Drury Lane Theatre, is very popular with the masses. He is a smooth, deep preacher. There is nothing startling in his manner, but much to delight. His chapel, (an awkward building to climb up to,) on London the Sabbath, make it a point to attend, and censequently the galleries contain mixed and strange audience. I have been to hear the doctor twice, and could secure a seat on neither occasion.

Dr. Cumming enjoys a high reputation as an author. His "Voices of the Day," "Voices of the Night," and "Apocalyptic Sketches," have had a wide sale, and withal he may be said to occupy the front rank in popularity among the metropolitan clergy. He is rather a comely man, with heavy bushy hair, and large black whiskers, and is yet young in years, and apparently fitted for a long and energetic career.

Soon after Dr. Cumming was licensed to preach, he went to London, poor and unknown, taking with him a letter of introduction to a baker, whom he asked what he could do for him. The baker replied that they had a small church, but could not pay a minister; but if he would stay a month with them he would hoard him.—The young preacher assented, and said if they would give him the pew-rents he would always be satisfied.—"Why," said the baker, "they will not find salt for thy porridge." The bargain still remains, and it is said the popular preacher now receives £6000 per annum.

WILLIAM BROCK.

The Rev. William Brock is one of the ablest Baptist ministers in London. His chapel is on Bloomsbury street, near Oxford street—a very spacious and neat edifice. Mr. Brock is a regular John Bull in appearance and action. His sentiments are ejected with a sturdy emphasis, and one can but realize the preacher's devotion to his holy calling. He is a man of great talent, and enjoys the esteem of all denominations. Though differing in every respect from the Hon. and Rev. H. W. Noel, he has a reputation equally high; and together, these eminent divines give the Baptists a prominence and good standing in the metropolis which they fail to have in many other portions of the kingdom.

JAMES HAMILTON.

The Rev. James Hamilton, D.D., F. R. S., the talented author of the "The Royal Preacher," "Life in Earnest," and other justly popular religious works, is yet a young man. His preaching is of that plain and earnest style which at once impresses the hearer with its truthfulness. Dr. Hamilton holds a high position. He is a Scotchman, and most of his church-members are from the "Land o'cakes." I had the pleasure of breakfasting with him a few days since, and found him as amiable in the domestic circle as in the pulpit.

THOMAS BINNEY.

The Rev. Thomas Binney is the "main stay" of the Congregationalists of London. He is a noble looking man, and a forcible and popular preacher. I have met him on several occasions.

HUGH M'NEILE.

Having heard that Dr. M'Neile was to preach in London, and having lost an opportunity of hearing him at Liverpool, I was in attendance at the Rev. Mr. Nolan's Chapel, St. John's Bedford Row, where it had been announced that the eloquent preacher would appear. Long before the time of commencing, the sidewalk was thronged with persons anxious to get a hearing. Rev. Hugh M'Neile, D.D., of Liverpool, has long maintained an exalted reputation as a preacher of the gospel. He is about sixty years of age, some six feet in height, not very stout, and has as fine a head of silvered hair as you may meet in a day's walk. His voice is peculiarly fitted for attracting the attention—neither harsh nor faint, but melodious and most agreeably distinct. Standing in the pulpit, arrobed in the clerical gown of the Church of England, he presents at once a dignified and graceful appearance. He had no notes, but held a small Bible in his hand. Taking for his text the words recorded in the twelfth chapter and second verse of Hebrews, he discoursed for nearly an hour in a thoroughly practical and highly eloquent vein. His allusions to the war between Kingland and Russia, and other exciting topics of the day, satisfied me that unlike many modern preachers, he sought to deal with his hearers as rational creatures, rather than as persons of fancy and fine spun theory.—The large chapel was crowded to excess, every aisle and nook filled with eager listeners. Aged women officiated as sextons or pew-openers. The singing charmed me.—"Old Hundred," sung with a will by the vast assembly, sounded more beautiful to my ears than the choicest opera ditty Maretzek ever imported.

HENRY MELVILLE.

Once or twice I have dropped in to listen to the "Golden Lectures," founded by a fund left many years since, and now delivered in St. Margaret's Church, opposite the Bank of England, on successive Tuesday mornings, by the Rev. Henry Melville. These admirable discourses are listened to by hundreds of the principal citizens and merchants of London, and it would be difficult to speak too highly of their practical value.

SHERIDAN KNOWLES.

Sheridan Knowles, once a popular actor and long noted as a dramatic writer of much ability, having lately entered the ministry, (of the Baptist church,) I, with no little curiosity, embraced an opportunity to hear him in his new character and calling. His sermon, or more properly lecture, given in one of the Islington chapels, was alike eloquent and powerful; and the rare talents so long directed merely to the entertainment of his fellows are now fully consecrated to a higher and nobler end, that of their eternal well-being.

CITY ROAD CHAPEL.

The City Road Chapel remains very much as in the days of the Wesleys, and is one of the modest lions of London. It is still in regular use, and is the home of a flourishing and influential congregation of that ever extending sect, for the establishment of which the intrepid brothers learned:

"How sublime a thing it is
To suffer and be strong."

On the right of the chancel are plain tablets to the memory of John Wesley, Adam Clarke, Thomas Coke, and Richard Watson, and on the left are those of Charles Wesley, and John Fletcher and Joseph Benson. In the yard just back of the chapel, and very nearly in a line with the pulpit, is the grave of John Wesley, around which thousands of pilgrims from all lands gather every year, to drop a silent tear in memory of the great and good apostle. It has been well said by a recent English writer: "The moral state of that man is not to be desired who can enter within the gates on the right of the City Road Chapel, and tread the narrow path which leads to the obelisk tomb of the founder of Methodism, without solemn thoughts and reflections, or throbs of deep emotion." Close beside Wesley's honored grave repose the remains of Dr. Adam Clarke, the wise and popular commentator.

BUNHILL FIELDS.

Immediately opposite the City Road Chapel is the small cemetery called "Bunhill Fields." After the showy and costly sculptures of the Abbey and St. Paul's, with their fulsome and oft unmerited inscriptions, the plain gray grave stones here compactly crowding one another, offer comparatively little to attract the casual observer, but to him who patiently treads its winding walks, and honors the world's true heroes, "Bunhill Fields" discovers a rare intrest. Here is the tomb of that sweet singer, Dr. Isaac Watts, whose beautiful songs range from those taught us in our nursery days, and never forgotten, to the sublimest of our church hymns—and here also is the grave of Dr. Ripon, another eminent Christian psalmist. The chief attraction, however, amid the thousand monuments, is the unpretending slab on which is written:

"MR. JOHN BUNYAN,
AUTHOR OF THE 'PILGRIM'S PROGRESS,'
Died August 31, 1688,
AGED 60."

From my earliest recollection, Bunyan, and his immortal "Pilgrim's Progress," have occupied no small space in my affections, and to stand in the presence as it were of the ashes of the "marvelous dreamer," was quite enough to stir the liveliest emotions of my nature.—What writer has exerted a wider and happier influence than Honest John Bunyan? What book has been so universally read and re-read, as his wonderful allegory? Next to the Bible, and no book could more properly follow the divine word, it is every where cherished and admired. Even the poor Feejees (or Fijians) are soon to have it translated in their native tongue, and it will to them, as to the better civilized, prove a volume of the purest and most captivating interest. I wish I might enumerate the editions that have been printed in English alone. Every publisher has striven to give it a richer dress, every succeeding age claims for it a higher value, and now, though the dust of the Elstow tinker, who living had no friend at an earthly court, has an honored place in the gallery of sculpture in the House of Commons, he lives far more imperishably in the hearts of the brave and good of every land. As on the occasion of my visit to the cemetery, several pretty children were lightly tripping through the grass with [illegible] gazing upon the tomb of the stern old pilgrim, I was reminded of the never-ceasing charm of his glorious dream to the youthful mind, and its many lessons for the young. Who may more appropriately linger in "Bunhill Fields" than the children? Only the other other day, I was told of a sweet little boy, who, after reading the "Pilgrim's Progress," said to his grandmother: "Grandma, which of the characters do you like best?" She replied, "Christian, of course, he is the hero of the story." He responded: "I like Christiana best, because when Christian set out on his pilgrimage, he went alone; but when Christiana started, she took the children with her." I wish the little fellow was here that his tiny hands might scatter flowers over the quiet grave of him who counseled Christiana to take her four boys with her to the celestial city!—M'Cormick.

PHYSICAL EDUCATION.

THE STRONG MAN, AND HOW HE BECAME SO.

The public have been not a little interested, for a few years, in occasional accounts of Dr. Winship, the "strong Yankee's," experiments in physical self-education. He is about twenty-six years old, five feet seven inches in height, and weighs one hundred and forty-eight pounds. He can lift eleven hundred pounds, and is now the best example of physical education in the United States. He was seventeen years of age when he began his experiments, and was then but five feet high, and weighed only one hundred pounds; his health was not good, for he already suffered from the usual dyspeptical troubles of American youth. So great has been his improvements, that he now declares it to be his opinion that no one, having "an atom of strength and life," need despair of the benefits of a right system of training. He instances Dr. Warren's testimony respecting a veteran invalid, who began gymnastics in his seventieth year, with very salutary effects; and of, course, old Cornaro (famous in Addison's Spectator) is not forgotten, who, though no gymnast, began in his fortieth year to restore a broken constitution, and lived a life of health and of enviable cheerfulness till his hundredth year.

But what has been the efficacious theory of the strong Yankee? He has given it in the Massachusetts Teacher, but, unfortunately, in an article of too great length to be read much. We propose to take unusual liberties with his communication, in order to condense into a more readable shape, his interesting details. They are the best prescriptions we have ever met for physical self-recuperation; and, in this day, when "muscular" merit has become a matter of special ambition, and physical training a subject of even moral preachments, it may not be unprofitable to present to the public an example which, from both its moderate good sense, and its extraordinary results, may be pronounced a model one.

How, then, has the Yankee doctor surpassed all the pugilistic training of the age? We enumerate, at much length, the principles of his system. We give the most essential particulars, presenting them, however, with our own enumeration.

1. He has breathed an abundance of fresh air "almost constantly;" practising, we suppose, inhalieo of the lungs.

2. He has drunk no ardent spirits, and used no tobacco. The English "training" for the "ring," it is well known, prohibits these articles.

3. He has taken, nearly every day, about a half-hour's gymnastic exercise, in the open air, and his is an example of the surprising moderation with which he has accomplished surprising results.

4. He has eaten heartily of such food, animal and vegetable, as agreed with his stomach, scouting the "maxim that" you should leave the table hungry." He began not to recover from his dyspepsia till he escaped this nonsense.

5. He has taken at least ten hours rest daily, including sleep; and appears to have devoted as much of it to sleep as nature would allow.

6. He was worn every article of his dress as loose and as easy as the freest action of his muscles and limbs would demand.

7. He has used the bath once a week in winter, and twice a week in summer. He denounces the daily use of cold baths.

He has pursued this course for nine years, and it has, during this long period, afforded him some important observations, if not discoveries. Here are a few of them:

1. That it is as easy to increase the strength of the human body as it is that of a magnetic.

2. That whatever increased his strength increased his general health. He enjoys now the maximum of the latter as he probably does of the former—for his force is now equal to that of two ordinary men.

3. That by developing his body harmoniously he could preclude the possibility of hernia, or any similar injury, that otherwise might result from an extremely violent exercise of his muscles.

4. That lifting is the safest and surest method of procuring "harmonious" development, as also the most strengthening of all exercises—a fact not generally supposed.

5. That the performance of twenty different gymnastic feats once, is better than the performance of one feat twenty times.

6. That he gained more by forty minutes' exercise once in two days, than by twenty minutes once a day.

7. Twenty or fifteen minutes' gymnastics sufficed for each day.

8. That as strength increases, more intense but less protracted exercise should be the rule.

9. That increase of muscular power is attended with a proportionate increase of digestive power.

10. That great physical strength may be acquired independently of hereditary tendency to it, and indeed, in spite of hereditary weakness of constitution.

11. That increased strength cannot long continue on a purely vegetable diet.

12. That increasing the strength makes exertion take place less by the skin, and more by the lungs and other emunctories.

13. That long before he could raise eleven hundred pounds with the hands, or shoulder a barrel of flour, he had put to flight the whole brood of ailments—sick headaches, nervousness, indigestion, etc., which are the familiar companions of American health, or rather ill health.

The Sampsonian doctor proceeds to give some very judicious results, deducted from his experience, for all aspirants to good health and manly vigor. He advises that:

1. You should select for your sleeping room, an apartment on the "sunny side," and let the sun play into it, at least six hours a day, if the clouds will allow him to show his face.

2. Keep it ventilated all the time, and especially keep the windows partially open at night, but avoid drafts.

3. Practice general ablution once a week in cold weather, twice a week in warm. Too much bathing, he asserts, "defeats every intention for which water is externally applied."

4. Take not less than eight hours' rest per day.

5. Use no food which has been prepared in a copper, brass, or bell metal utensil. Use no water that has come in contact with lead.

6. Use such food as your appetite prefers, in spite of Leibig or any other authority.

7. Practice lifting as the best of gymnastics; but begin cautiously and be careful of too much fatigue. Dumb bells he considers next desirable to lifting.

8. Never exceed half an hour in any gymnastic exercise.

9. Never rise early unless you retire early. Be sure to get sleep enough.

10. Gradually wear less and less clothing about the neck till you can keep it entirely exposed without taking cold.

Such is an outline of Mr. Winship's system. It is singularly sensible; it is almost universally practicable, except, perhaps, the prescription about sleep, could it be generally adopted in the United States, we doubt not that, in one generation, it would reduce the medical faculty fifty per cent., and the rates of life assurance correspondingly, and render us the most vigorous and most long-lived nation on the globe, as we are now decidedly the "smartest."—N. Y. World.

THE ITALIAN REVOLUTION.

GARIBALDI'S ENTRY INTO MESSINA.

MESSINA, Friday, July 27.—Medici arrived at 11 o'clock with 2000 men, all Italians—they are a handsome race of men, and all young. Medici rode at the head of his regiment, on the charger of Bosco. He entered the town amidst the vivas of a multitude, flags flying, drums beating, and altogether a manifestation of enthusiasm which cannot be described. With baggage the Italians don't seem to be much incommoded; for with 2000 men there were only three or four carts, certainly not more, upon which there were only boxes. All the men wore bouquets, and flowers were plentifully showered down upon them in the town. I rushed to learn the cause, and was told by thousands of people that Garibaldi, the liberator, had at length arrived. I hastened to meet him at St. Leone, as by this gate it seems he had entered from Palermo. His carriage was surrounded by thousands of men, who drew him along amidst continual bursts of cheering. His face did not shew the least sign of excitement. He even seemed not to see masses of troops—not to hear the acclamations of the people. His mind was evidently occupied with something quite different. He proceeded to the house of the former intendante, and there took up his dwelling. Twice he was obliged to yield to the popular demands, and to show himself to the people, coming to a window for that purpose. Still, he seemed not to recognize why there was all this commotion. He had no sooner settled in the house than he ordered a carriage and horses to be prepared. The man has neither quietness nor pence—motion is his element.

At 4 o'clock Garibaldi and his Adjutant set out in the carriage and went at a rapid gallop to the Faro (the promontory commanding the Straits between Sicily and the mainland.) There he called around him all the oldest and most trustworthy mariners and pilots. He asked each of them their opinion respecting the course of the currents, the depth of the channel, and in fact he informed himself of the nature of the whole of the terrene, so that something really earnest must be in contemplation. To discover what this was, I followed him on horseback, came up with his party, and entered into conversation with the different officers. From what I learned, it appears that as soon as he has gathered sufficient means of transport, he is determined to cross to the mainland; and for this purpose he has ordered boats to be collected with all possible diligence. When I returned, I found Messina quite a different place. People thronged the streets, and all had returned to the old course, as if nothing had happened. Shops were opened, music resounded on all sides, the coffee-houses were filled, and instead of Neapolitan soldiers, we saw nothing but Piedmontese and the young squadri. I found that Garibaldi had sent a commissioner to buy three hundred pieces of linen for his camp at the Faro—from which it seems that there he means to establish his headquarters and to entrench himself.

Saturday, July 28.—The Neapolitans are still going on board their ships, and are deserting the different forts. They have now thrown upon the main land at least 10,000 troops. At 1 o'clock, Garibaldi again drove to the Faro. The workmen have now collected materials for building boats for transporting artillery, cavalry, and every kind of war materials; and they have also got together between two and three hundred boats of all descriptions. In fact, we expect daily to see Garibaldi sail for Calabria. At 6 o'clock this indefatigable man returned to his house, but immediately set out again for the other end of the town, where he made similar arrangements with regard to the supply of boats and other vessels. To-day a number of police spies were arrested.

To-night Garibaldi's eldest son is expected from Cosenza and Catania with thirty cannon, which were taken from the Neapolitans at the battle of Melazzo, so that it seems Messina and its neighborhood will be made the headquarters of the whole force of the Garibaldians. We are now restored to the older order of things, and it seems quite a dream that anything else has existed. Shopkeepers are opening their lakes, which had all been packed up, and are decking out their shops once more. Garibaldi's troops are now refreshed, and, being cleansed of the dust and dirt resulting from their long journey, you could not wish to see a finer set of men than these Italians are. The officers themselves appear, from their looks and bearing, to be from good families. After all the great disorder we have witnessed, with the want of military look and esprit among the Neapolitan troops, it is quite a pleasure to see their places taken by these fine military men.

The Sicilians should thank their God, and pray that nothing ill may happen to Garibaldi. If such should unfortunately happen, we should certainly fall back into the old order of things, and the delivery of Messina and Sicily would be lost. Garibaldi's bearing, his simple manners, his affability, in fact, everything around and connected with him is such that it immediately draws every one to him; and I can no longer wonder at the courage of his soldiers, or the devotedness with which they follow and cling to him.

RUSSIAN ACQUISITIONS ON THE AMOOR.—Russia has obtained a territory more valuable than all the supposed cotton districts of Africa, watered by hundreds of streams flowing into the great artery that passes through its entire length. The climate is good, and well suited for Europeans; its animals belong to both the cold and warm regions, while its luxuriant herbage and magnificent flora prove that the temperature is neither severe in winter nor excessively hot in summer. It is possible that some of these great plains may be suited to the culture of the cotton plant; if so, a supply of this valuable product will ere long be found at the Russian ports in the Sea of Japan and in the Gulf of Tartary.—Atkinson's Travels.

EXCITEMENT IN RUSSIA AGAINST THE TURKS.

SYMPATHY WITH THE SYRIAN CHRISTIANS—THE POPULACE DEMANDING WAR WITH TURKEY.

The following letter from St. Petersburg, dated 16th of July, is published in the London Times:

I can not describe to you the increasing excitement which prevails here in consequence of the news from Syria. The French and German journals which contain them are read with an avidity which surpasses all that could be imagined. The recital of the massacres, profanations and atrocities of which the Druses and Turks have been guilty, excite an irritation which is carried to an extreme of fury. I thought I knew the Russians, but I was deceived as to their character. The merchant holds certain religious opinions, but with the English, French and Germans he is mild and tolerant, and the difference of religion does not prevent him from showing them great kindness. As to the people, they are possessed of a superstitious faith, but they live on good terms with all Christian sects. Both merchants and people entertain a violent fanatical hatred against all Mussulmans, but particularly against the Turks. The upper classes are indifferent in matters of religion, but politics and national traditions have accustomed them to execrate all that is Mohammedan.

All classes are unanimous in stigmatizing—cursing is the word—the cruelties of the Turks. The passions of the people are excited to a pitch I could not have suspected, and at this moment one might believe that every Russian is a fanatic, which is certainly not the fact, but the old hatred so strongly resembles fanaticism that one might mistake it. There is but one voice—one cry: "We must succor the Christians, exterminate their barbarous oppressors, revenge religion and outraged humanity—finish with the Turks and drive them out of Europe."—The army appears to experience even more violently than the people this paroxysm of anger. These soldiers, so mild in their relations with the people, have for some time past assumed a martial attitude; their features have become hardened, and their eyes flash fire. One should see this metamorphosis to believe it. It is particularly at the camp of Krasnoe-Selo that the spirit of the army shows itself with the greatest energy. When the Emperor makes his appearance, the acclamations, which were always warm and sincere, are now enthusiastically frantic, of which the meaning can escape nobody. The Emperor appears to be perfectly well satisfied with them, and the soldiers have received more presents than they they had for a long time. The army appears to be convinced that they are on the eve of war, and this feeling communicates an ardor which forms a strong contrast with that species of languor and carelessness which were remarked during the last three years. At Moscow it is still worse, and what is remarked here can not bear a comparison with the demonstrations which have taken place in the old capital of the Empire.

According to the best authenticated accounts we receive every day, the rage of the people there is unbounded.—The orthodox population demand why troops are not already on their march against the miscreants—the infidels—who murder old men, women and children, and who drink Christian blood. The people crowd their churches, and listen attentively to their Popes, whose sermons are allusions to the atrocities committed by the Turks, and and who pray to God that his just anger may not fall on the heads of those cold and inhuman politicians, who hear without shuddering the cries of the victims immolated by the Mussulman's scimitar, and who are not affected at seeing the palpitations of the smoking entrails of so many thousand Christians. They say that holy Russia can not long remain an accomplice to that cowardly indifference—to that hideous egotism—that treason to the Christian religion. These sermons, sometimes eloquent, inflame the multitude, and excite them to a pitch which we, in our skeptical societies in western Europe, can scarcely comprehend. Here the people believe firmly, and one must not offend their opinions, unless one wishes to degrade himself in their eyes, even because they coincide in opinion with the people or that they have received orders to that effect, will not interfere with these manifestations. The soldiers, who are to be seen in the churches mixed with the people, make the sign of the cross when they hear of the acts of barbarity which the priest narrates from the pulpit, exclaiming at the same time, "When is the holy war to be commenced?" Old men who recollect the excitement which existed in the year 1812, declare that the irritation was then less terrible and less implacable.

RESCUE OF SYRIAN WOMEN AND CHILDREN BY BRITISH MEN-OF-WAR.

The following letter from Capt. Paynter, of the British Navy, describes some few of the horrible scenes he has recently witnessed in Syria, and gives an account of the rescue of 2000 women and children by the British men-of-war:

"With reference to the Dier-el-Kamer, the Druses commenced on Wednesday, the 19th inst., to enter the town in large armed bands, and began pillaging the shops and warehouses at 4 o'clock in the afternoon; the troops joined the Druses in plundering. During the night the Druses of the Hauran and the Metualis entered the city from different directions. Early on Thursday morning the town was set on fire in several places, and a massacre of every male inhabitant, from the helpless old man to the infant at the breast, commenced, and the women who did not fly were violated. These atrocities continued without intermission until Friday.

"At 8 P. M. on Thursday his excellency Khoorsheed Pasha, Governor General of Syria, arrived, but taking no notice of the horrors committed by the troops or Druses, passed on to a station called Hubeen, which overlooked the town. He then issued an order to stay the slaughter, which was disregared by both the troops and the Druses; 1500 males, it is stated, are now lying unburied amid the ruins of Dier-el-Kamer, and the women and children who fled from the scene of slaughter, I was informed by Mr. Consul General Moore, were making their escape to the sea-side, near the Damoor river, hunted down like wild beasts.

"I instantly dispatched Capt. Lambert, of the Gannet, who was about to proceed to Athens, and desired him to signalize to the Mohawk, then on her way from Sidon with the fugitives from the massacres at Hasbeiya, to assist her with the boats in embarking the refugees.

"I inclose you the report of Commander Lambert and Acting-Consul West, and in doing so I beg leave to inform you that the service was performed under great difficulty, and reflected great credit on all concerned; and it will be gratifying to you to know that, with the means you have placed at my disposal, we have saved from the horrors of famine, murder, and violation, upwards of 2200 Christian women and children.

"In the first trip the Gannet brought up seven hundred, and the Mohawk four hundred and fifty-six; the second trip the Mohawk brought up six hundred and twenty-four, and the third trip upwards of five hundred, in every stage of misery. The most severely wounded I received on board of the Exmouth, and their wounds were dressed by the surgeon of this ship; the remainder were landed and sent to the French hospital. The whole of those wounded were shot or sabred flying from the town after their husbands and male children had been slaughtered.

"I received every assistance from the boats of the French, Russian, and Turkish ships lying here in landing these poor creatures; and the French Commodore dispatched to the northward a vessel in order to rescue any others that may have remained, but I have every reason to believe that the fugitives from Zalde, Hasbeiya, and Deir-el-Kamir have been taken off from our vessels.

"The conduct of Osman Bey really appears in this age without a parallel. He first of all induced the Christians to surrender their arms; he then crowded the poor creatures in the courts of the Serai, and for eight days kept them with barely sufficient food to keep life together; and then, when unable to resist from physical debility, he opened the gates and allowed the Druses to rush in and massacre them to the number of eight hundred—men, women and children. The few that escaped owed their preservation to crawling under the bodies of the dead, and escaping under the cover of darkness.

"On hearing of this butchery, and believing it possible that many of the women and children would escape to the seacoast of Tyre and Sidon, I immediately dispatched the Mohawk, on the 21st, to those places, with orders to communicate with the Vice-Consul, and bring off any of the fugitives. It was on the return of the Mohawk from these places with five hundred, that she assisted in embarking the women in Dier-el-Kamar on board the Gannet."

MOUNT VESUVIUS.—The London Daily Telegraph's correspondent states that a Polish proprietor belonging to Posen, has purchased Mount Vesuvius of its present owner, Prince Castelcicala, and intends studding the lava surface of its precipitous declivities with villas, hotels, and other places of recreation, for the amusement and accommodation of tourists.

THE ECLIPSE IN SPAIN.

Mr. E. J. Lowe publishes, in the London Times, an interesting account of the eclipse of the 18th of July, and the attendant phenomena, as observed in the neighborhood of Santander, Spain. He says:

"Before totality commenced, the colors in the sky and on the hills were magnificent beyond all description; the clear sky in the north assumed a deep indigo color, while in the west the horizon was pitch black (like night). In the east the clear sky was a very pale blue, with orange and red like sunrise, and the hills in the south were very red; on the shadows sweeping across, the deep blue in the north changed like angle to pale sunrise tints of orange and red, while the sunrise appearance in the east had changed to indigo.

"The colors increased in brilliancy near the horizon, overhead the sky was leaden. Some white houses at a little distance were brought nearer, and assumed a warm yellow tint; the darkness was great; thermometers could not be read. The countenances of men were of a livid pink. The Spaniards lay down, and their children screamed with fear; fowls hastened to roost, ducks clustered together, pigeons dashed against the sides of the house, flowers closed (Hibiscus Africanus as early as 2h. 5m.); at 2h. 52m. cocks began to crow, ceasing at 2h. 57., and recommencing at 3h. 57m. As darkness came on many butterflies which were seen, about flew as if drunk, and at last disappeared; the air became very humid, so much so that the grass felt to one of the observers as if recently rained upon. At 5h. 55m. a mock sun was formed 22° below the true sun, having the ordinary circular form. From the summit of Pena Castilla, overlooking the Bay of Biscay, Mr. Heath noticed the magnificence of the coloring of the sky reflected in the sea, while the water near us was of a deep leaden hue, owing to clouds overhead. I am indebted to Mr. Thompson, master of her Majesty's ship Himalaya, for the following observations: Totality commenced at 2h. 52m. 55s. when prominences were visible, one on the west and two on the east, of a bright lurid lake color, followed by the corona shooting out on the east of the sun in two forked toogues. The color of the corona was white darting outward. Toward the end of the totality another prominence was noticed on the west side of the sun, of the same color as those first seen, and below this a most beautiful collection, one of golden beeds closely strung together, shone out, extending to the lowest part of the western limit of the sun. The stars numbered seven and eight in Mr. Hind's map were distinctly visible in the telescope. The cusps of the sun were rounded before and after totality, and the prominences were lurid and well defined. A very considerable variation of the compass took place during the eclipse. Lieut. N. C. Barton, of the same ship, states that Venus appeared shining very brightly in the midst of the totality at 2h. 59m. 56s. Pollux also was seen at 3h. 0m. 21s., but was only in sight four or five seconds, in consequence of a cloud overcasting it. Three red protuberances showed during totality to the left of the sun, the upper one being very bright. Some beads were also observed of a light shining character—very like a diamond necklace worn by a negro belle. At Los Corrales, Mr. J. Mould remarked that the blue sky over Santander appeared a very dark indigo, afterward changing to a deep amber, and was most beautiful, and that his fowls began to march a cama, but light coming on they returned to their usual occupation. The temperature in sun ranged on the grass between 109 deg. and 62 deg. Before totality the sky became overcast."

RAILROAD GRANT BY THE CONGRESS OF COSTA RICA.

By the arrival of Mr. Dimitry, Secretary of the Legation to Costa Rica, the important intelligence has been received that we can announce the passage by Congress of the grant of a railroad right to Ambrose W. Thompson. It had been submitted by President Montelegre to the Congress of Costa Rica, and a most determined outside opposition was interposed; but on the 4th of July it was approved by the House of Delegates, with only two negative votes, and by the Senate unanimously. The grant is for eighty years; the roadway is to be three hundred yards in width; a strip a mile square on each side is set apart and alternate sections a mile square on each side are donated in fee. The other alternate sections are reserved to the Government, but an equal quantity of the public lands in any other portion of the Republic, at the selection of Mr. Thompson, are granted him in perpetuity. The ports at each end of the road are to be free ports throughout the terms of the grant. The location of the road is to be between the Bay of Coronada and the Granadian boundary line on the Pacific, and the point of Carita and said boundary line on the Atlantic. Costa Rica claims, with great justice, as her boundary, a line drawn on the Escuada de Veraga, on the Atlantic, to the Point of Burica, on the Pacific. This gives the whole of the lagoon of Chiriqui, on the Atlantic, and the entire of the Gulf of Dolce, as well as two fine bays in addition, on the Atlantic, on which to terminate the roadway. The road is to be first class. The surveys are to be made within two years, and built six years thereafter. The grantee is to maintain an efficient corps of police all along the line to preserve order. He has the right to erect and maintain public hospitals at the termini. The troops and messengers of the Government are to be carried over the road free of expense, but no foreign troops or munitions of war are permitted to pass over it without consent of Costa Rica. The road cannot be transferred to any foreign Government. Contracts made by the grantee in foreign countries for service or labor shall have the same force in Costa Rica as in the place of their egreement. Costa Rica is not to dispose of any of her lands, or give titles thereto, until Mr. Thompson has selected the quantity given in lieu of the alternate sections reserved to the Government on the line of the road. A charter for the purpose of organization is given by Costa Rica, with all the powers and privileges as contained in the Chiriqui Improvement Company charter, granted by the State of Pennsylvania. Six per centum of the net profits of the company are to be paid annually to Costa Rica. Fifty thousand dollars are to be deposited within one year as a guaranty that the road will be made. This is to be returned without interest as soon as the road is completed. There is no other tax reserved upon the road or mails passing over it. In case there is any disagreement as to the meaning of the articles, the Supreme Court of Chile are to be arbitrators. This is considered to be the most liberal and valuable railroad grant which has ever yet been made across the great American Isthmus.

THE CHRISTIANITY OF THE EAST.

The following extract from a letter, written by an American gentleman in Constantinople to a friend in Philadelphia, will be read with much interest:

Constantinople, July 17, 1860.—There is a strong not-side pressure which is hastening the conflict between the followers of Mohammed and of Christ. But, believe me when I tell you that Mohammedanism is mercy itself compared to the Christianity of the East. Our Minister here, Mr. Williams, has just been called upon to endeavor to procure Christian burial for an American Protestant, which has been resisted for five days by an immense mob of Armenians, headed by their priests. For five days the disgraceful spectacle has continued—the dead body remaining during the whole time exposed on the ground, and the mob of Armenians, which last evening numbered four thousand, refusing to allow of the interment. These are the Christians over whose cruel wrongs the Christian world is called to weep, and to curse the tyranny of their Moslem oppressors. Turkish troops in large numbers have been sent to the scene of disturbance, but as yet nothing has been accomplished, and the corpse remains unburied.

HEROISM OF A SICILIAN NUN.

A Palermo letter tells the following story of a nun in that city: "A young patriot, named Francisco Riso, was killed on April 4th, during a popular demonstration which took place before Garibaldi's arrival. On April 20th his father, Giovanni Riso, sixty years old, was shot by the Bourbon soldiers, without so much as the form of a trial. On the very day that Garibaldi entered Palermo, a young and beautiful nun, Ignacia Riso, the sister and daughter of the two Risos above-named, left the convent, amidst a shower of balls and grape-shot, a cross in one hand and a poignard in the other, placed herself at the head of Garibaldi's column, crying, 'Down with the Bourbons! Death to the tyrant! Vengeance!' She kept her place as long as the fighting lasted, and her courageous attitude electrified the volunteers. Ever since that day the name Ignacia Riso has been held sacred. When she passes in the streets the soldiers bow low, and bless her with the most profound respect. Garibaldi himself pays her great attention, and loves her as if she were his own daughter.

REMARKABLE CAREER OF A CLERGYMAN.

The Newcastle (England) Chronicle traces the formidable career of Rev. Blythe Hurst, incumbent of Colliery, near Lancaster. This clergyman was born at Winlaton in 1804, his father being a smith. At seven years of age he was taken from school, and was sent to make small nails at the smith's shop. To the age of [illegible] he attended a Sabbath-school, and in the meetings commenced to learn the business of a pattern-ring maker. About the time he was fifteen Mr. Hurst was led to think seriously of religion, and joined a Dissenting body. He became a local preacher, and devoted all his leisure to mental improvement. He married early, and had to provide for a family; but contrived to purchase the necessary books to gain a knowledge of the French, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic languages. While at work he used to write upon his "flame stone" (the stone suspended before a smith's fire to protect the eyes of the workman) the conjugations of the verbs in whatever language he was studying, and in the evenings he wrote his exercises and translated them. In the beginning of 1840, Mr. Hurst, being an effective local preacher among the New Connection Methodists, replied in a pamphlet to some lectures delivered by one of the disciples of Mr. Robert Owen; and this work was brought under the notice of Dr. Maltby, the then Bishop of Durham, who at once wrote that, "although it might be written by a common man, it was the production of no common mind." The Bishop interested himself in the case, advised Mr. Hurst as to his course of reading, and supplied the means of following out this recommendation. A feud in the New Connection church at Winlaton had induced Mr. Hurst and others to leave, and to become members of the Church of England; and in 1841 the "learned blacksmith" was ordained to the curacy of Garrigill, near Alston. He was subsequently appointed to the living at Sealey, near Hexham; and since then to that of Colliery, near Lancaster, which he now holds. Mr. Hurst's preaching is said to be of a very high order, and, in a course of lectures which he has delivered in Newcastle, he displayed great information upon the Shaltite inscriptions and on Egyptian hieroglyphics.

MUTILATING THE RECORDS.

We stepped into the office of the County Clerk a few days since to look at the files of the State Register for 1849, which was then required by law to be sent to all the County Clerks in the State, and to be preserved by them as a part of the public records of the State. We found that the Register for November 8, 1849

OUR MISSIONARY CRISIS.

We have reached a crisis in our missionary affairs.—There is nothing to be gained, but much to be lost, by attempting further to conceal it. The state of the missionary treasury is so serious, that recently a meeting of the Board at Nashville was had, and a circular prepared and sent to all the Conferences; and the Board has acted wisely in so doing. The whole Church should and must know that our missionary honor and interests cannot be maintained by the Board, unless the money is furnished to replenish the treasury. It should and must be known that not the Board, but the lukewarm, inefficient, and positive, in the different Conferences, are principally to blame for our present embarrassment. Some of the Conferences do nobly, and some do feebly. The leading men in some of the Conferences have been kindling and fanning the missionary fire for years, until a power has been created which includes the whole body and sweeps everything before it. The leading men in other Conferences, or those who stand in the place of leaders, do nothing toward developing the missionary power of the body to which they belong, and stand in the way of those who, though younger and untrained, would, under favorable conditions, do the work they have neglected. In some Conferences a regular missionary plan has been at work for years, growing more and more perfect, comprehensive, and efficient, until every preacher, and every charge, is educated, and disciplined, the missionary progress and value of each made known by a complete system of missionary statistics, the results published in annual reports, the esprit du corps of a regular army created, and every preacher and every charge made to feel that it is a point of honor to bring up a good missionary report. Other Conferences have nothing of the sort.—They are without system and without training; without zeal and without progress. Splendid individual achievements reflect no honor on, and give no courage to, the individual or the Conference, because swallowed up in a meagre general report. Preachers are well spoken of by their Presiding Elders, pass the annual examination without challenge, and gain standing and position in the Conference, without any regard to their efficiency in missionary matters.

Not only are men thus imperfectly trained, but many men are taken into the Conferences who have no business there—they have neither the qualities nor the attainments necessary, and they never can be trained to missionary efficiency. They break down, and bring to their own low level, the finances, if not the character, of the Church, wherever they go. The missionary interest, as well as the other interests of the Church, will never harmoniously and adequately prosper, until each preacher, as a rule, can be as much relied on, according to his ability, as a bishop, for its faithful and fearless advocacy. Many preachers pass most of their ministerial lives without ever knowing the whole circle of the duties of a Methodist preacher. There is among us, in many places, a looseness in the choice of men, and a looseness in ministerial training, that is doing not only the missionary interest, but the whole Church, serious damage.

But, this exposition of some of the causes of our present missionary embarrassment will not bring the needed relief. Our preachers, one and all, must take the field in behalf of our missionary treasury; the faithful, blithe-hearted and the unfaithful, the veteran and the raw recruit the presiding elder and the stationed preacher, the circuit preacher and the missionary. The entire territory of the Church, in every nook and corner, must be canvassed—thoroughly canvassed. Missionary meetings should be held everywhere, and missionary speeches made. The missionary orators of the Church should leave the "stump speakers" of the Presidential canvass utterly in "the shade." They should labor not only publicly, but also from house to house. They should approach not only the members of the Church, but go, indiscriminately, to those "without." This is a christian country, and every man should have the credit of being considered interested in and identified with every christian cause.—In some of the Conferences, nothing can be done until after the annual sessions; in others there is yet time for vigorous action. But in all, both before and after the session, the work should be made thorough. In the meantime, we trust that liberal souls, in and out of the Church, will do liberal things for the relief of the missionary treasury. As to the Conference action necessary, we will let the Board speak for themselves:

THE AMD DEAR BRETHREN.—By order of the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at a meeting held August 10, 1860, we submit to your consideration the following Circular:

At the Annual meeting of the Board, in April last, the following appropriations were made for the ensuing year, viz.: Kentucky, $1,500; Tennessee, $2,500; Holston, $2200; South Carolina, $24,000; Alabama, $14,000; Georgia $13,000; Virginia, $4000; Florida, $4000; Louisville, $1200; Western Virginia, $1200; St. Louis, $2000; Missouri, $5000; Louisiana, $3500; Memphis, $2200; Mississippi, $2000; Texas, $4500; East Texas, $4000; Rio Grande, $5000; North Carolina, $5000; Pacific, $3000; Kansas, $9000; Wachita, $2500; Arkansas, $3500; Indian Mission, $16,500; China, $16,750; Japan, $1000; Central and South America, $2000; Incidental Expenses, $4000; German Paper, $1000; Deficiency, $40,000; making $208,050.

For these amounts the Bishops of the respective Conferences were authorized to issue drafts, by and with the approval of the Annual Conference Mission Committees.

To enable your Treasurer to honor these drafts, it became necessary for the Conferences to raise, by voluntary contributions, large amounts; hence the Board divided the sum in the following proportions, asking each Conference to collect the amount annexed, viz.:

Kentucky, $4000; Tennessee, $10,000; Holston, $4000; South Carolina, $30,000; Alabama, $40,000; Georgia, $28,000; Virginia, $10,000; Florida, $4000; Louisville, $8000; Western Virginia, $1500; St. Louis, $7000; Missouri, $4000; Louisiana, $10,000; Memphis, $14,000; Mississippi, $15,000; Texas, $10,000; East Texas, $7000; Rio Grande, $4000; North Carolina, $13,000; Pacific, $2000; Kansas, $1000; Wachita, $7000; Arkansas, $3000; Indian Mission, $1300; making $247,300.

The difference existing between the amounts proposed to be raised and the amounts to be drawn for upon the treasury, is to meet what is supposed the amount will be for which drafts are not made, but returned as missionary money, and which has been contributed to the missionaries for their support on the work.

The treasury is now empty. We have not a dollar on hand, and have been compelled to borrow largely to meet the drafts of the past year. This deficiency is owing to the fact that for years the appropriations have exceeded the collections, and the Board has been compelled, to borrow funds and pay interest, or cause the Church to be discredited.

Under these circumstances the Board entertains serious fears as to the collections of the current year. A drought prevails to an alarming extent throughout the South generally; the crops, in many places, are cut off, and the finances of the country are embarrassed; and yet, from the foregoing facts and figures it will be seen that, unless the Conferences collect the amounts mentioned, it will be impossible for the Treasurer to meet the drafts.

The question has arisen, What can be done?

If the Board proceed to issue the drafts according to the appropriations, and the Conferences fail to make the collections mentioned, then your Society will be bankrupt, and the credit of it will necessarily be protested. It is not to be supposed in a great many cases, that the friends of the Society will borrow to meet the demands, especially when they have exceeded the credit of the Society in prosperous times.

The Board suggests, first, that no mission that can be avoided or be sustained within your bounds the present year; and, second, in case your Conference has not raised the apportioned amount, that the Bishop shall draw only in proportion to the amount collected. For instance, the Bishop of the Tennessee Conference is authorized to draw for $2500, and the Conference is supposed to raise $10,000. Now, if it happen that said Conference shall raise only $5000, then in that case the Bishop should only draw for $1250; and so with every Conference in the same proportion.

Your Board may rely upon it, that unless the collections come up to the appropriations, the drafts must be reduced, or the credit of the Society protested. We hope your body will seriously consider this matter, and act as becomes Christians. "Love is no man any thing but love," is a good maxim for a Church, as well as for individual members of the body of Christ.

It is painful for the Board to be compelled to state a deficiency in the funds of the Society, and to suggest the necessity of retrenchment; but the point is upon us, and we must deal honestly with it. We must have more money or expend less. This is compelled to raise a great deal more; no one questions. The Board would call attention to another point. By a previous resolution, Bishops were requested not to draw the first quarterly instalments under three months from the adjournment of the Conference. To draw at sight, or three days after sight, embarrasses the treasury. It will be borne in mind that, as matters now operate, we have to borrow money to pay the fourth instalments. This leaves the treasury with a heavy debt at the time of the meeting of the Conferences. To take, therefore, the money collected, and pay the first drafts in advance, is to leave the Treasurer without means to meet his bank liabilities. Again, beginning in advance, the drafts are always in advance, and your Board has to transact the business of a whole year in nine months, which every business man knows is very embarrassing, especially when a large part of his business is transacted on borrowed capital, and bearing interest. The simple fact that the drafts all fall due in the space of nine instead of twelve months, has cost your Society thousands, beside a vast amount of trouble. The Board can see no reason why missionaries, except to foreign lands, should be paid in advance rather than their brethren in other fields. Besides, there is a principle involved here which we do not at present propose to elaborate.

Hoping that your Conference may harmonize in its views with the Board, and praying the blessing of God on our mission fields, we remain your brethren in Christ."

Signed, on behalf of the Board,

J. B. McFERRIN,
H. N. McTYEIRE,
P. W. MAXEY,
T. O. SUMMERS,
N. HOBSON,
Committee.

Nashville, August 10, 1860.

NOTE.—Brethren, by sending their drafts when mature to the Treasurer, can have returned to them checks on New Orleans, St. Louis, Charleston, Savannah, Louisville, or Richmond; or, if they prefer, on New York. This would be much better than to sell at a heavy discount. The rates of premium are generally very low, and in nearly all instances the exchange will sell for what it costs.

J. B. McFERRIN, Treasurer.

ANOTHER EUROPEAN WAR.

Another European war seems inevitable. The great fillibuster, Garibaldi, has undertaken the grand task of liberating and uniting all Italy under the constitutional scepter of King Victor Emmanuel. To accomplish this he must overturn the throne of the King of Naples, the temperal power of the Pope, and the dominion of Austria in Venetia. Sicily is already rescued from the King of Naples, and his remaining dominion seems tottering to its fall. His army and navy cannot be relied on for his defence, and the population of his kingdom is every where arming for the final struggle for freedom. Garibaldi is expected shortly at the head of his victorious legions, and the downfall of Naples, it is thought, will be the immediate result. Rome has made common cause with Naples, and Austria is preparing to make common cause with them both. The King of Sardinia, who has professed to oppose the course of Garibaldi, will be compelled to assume the position claimed for him by the whole Italian people, as their champion and king, or let the golden opportunity pass forever beyond his reach.—That he will adopt the better and bolder course is to be inferred from his character and history, and from the immense military preparations he is making. Indeed, he is about to be forced into the conflict, for Austria not only has sent a note to the Sardinian government, denouncing it as responsible for Garibaldi's course, but announcing that she will interfere in behalf of Naples the moment Garibaldi's troops disembark on the main land. This will be a violation of the treaty of Villa Franca, and will bring both France and Sardinia into the field.

Austria is about to commit the same blunder she committed in crossing the Ticino last year, and thus making herself ostensibly responsible for the war.—Should she confine herself to the defence of her own dominions in Venetia, she would not become involved with other powers, and would have only Garibaldi—formidable enough in himself—to meet. But if she undertakes to interfere in the affairs of other Italian governments, she will give Sardinia the pretext she has long desired of interfering also, and of taking advantage of the success of Garibaldi, and the enthusiasm of the people of Italy for annexation. But, more important than all, she opens the way for Louis Napoleon. He caused the Italian war to cease, and made the peace of Villa Franca, well knowing that the work begun would not cease. He advised against the annexation of the Duchies and of the Romagna, well knowing that its accomplishment was inevitable. He gave as a reason for opposing annexation, that the cause of Italian unity having gained thus far, would not cease its progress, but would be stimulated to seek the annexation of Sicily, Naples, Venetia, and the remaining Roman States. For these consequences he said he would not be responsible. But he very well knew that his mentioning these results as probable would be one of the very means of their accomplishment. And although he has, it is said, recently written a letter to Victor Emmanuel to be careful how he provoked a collision with Austria, as France, bound by the treaty of Villa Franca, could not assist him; yet, relying on the blundering stupidity of Austria, he no doubt sees that Austria, and not Sardinia, will provoke the collision, and that she will violate the treaty of Villa Franca, by some such act as interference in behalf of Naples, and that then he will be released from his treaty obligations, and will be again called upon to appear upon the Italian battle-field. Such is the interpretation we give to his mysterious course in regard to Italian affairs. At any rate, whether the struggle be long or short, the accomplishment of Italian unity is only a question of time.

In the meantime, the Italians are soliciting the Hungarians to make common cause with them. They have sent the following proclamation to the Hungarian soldiers: "Hungarian soldiers! Italy has risen to make herself united and free by the hands of her own sons.—The life of Italy is the life of Hungary. If you will unite with and fight for us, we will unite with and fight for you. Sons of the Hungarian people, the Italian people invite you to participate in their battles. Come with us to the aid of Garibaldi, who will soon advance from Sicily into Naples. Then we shall march upon Rome with arms in our hands, from Romo to Venice, and from Venice to Hungary. Long live Hungary Long live Italy!"

The Pope seems to have utterly lost heart and hope. He says that he regards his dominions as lost to him—that his life is in danger, and that he may be assassinated, but that he will never leave Rome. Poor old man!

From the complications alluded to in the foregoing remarks, it will be seen that it is quite probable that Europe is on the verge of another war, serious in its extent, and important in its bearings.

THE "VIRTUE" OF CHRIST.

More than once, in the New Testament, is the word "virtue" applied to Christ, as expressing an attribute of his character. Wherever the word "virtue" is used, it signifies an excellent principle or quality. When applied to physical things, it generally denotes a vital principle or power. We speak of the virtues of plants or medicines. When applied to moral things, it implies a good quality. We speak of the virtue of chastity, honesty, temperance, patience, courage. A virtuous man, or woman, means one in the possession and practice of the virtues. Though thus divided in its application, we can easily see that the original and most comprehensive signification of virtue is, that it is the principle of all life and excellence, physical, mental, and moral. Physically, it is the principle of life and health, as opposed to death and decay. Mentally, it is the principle of mental soundness and vigor, as opposed to insanity and weakness of mind. Morally, it is the principle of rectitude and spirituality, as opposed to vice, sensuality and wickedness. In the largest and best sense, a virtuous person is one who cultivates the health, rectitude, and purity, of body, mind and spirit. It is the opposite of all vice, physical, mental, and spiritual.

This view—that virtue is the principle of all life—is strengthened by its application to Christ. A woman with an incurable bodily infirmity touched the hem of his garment and was healed. And he said "virtue" had gone out of him. At another time, the multitude sought to touch him, for "virtue went out from him and healed them all." That is, the principle of life and health, which had been weakened by disease, was restored to its natural vigor and life-giving power. Thus it is established that virtue is the principle of physical life, and that Christ is the author of "virtue." In other places we have it established that Christ is the author of that virtue which is the principle of mental life. This is proved by all the lunatics, maniacs, and demoniacs that he healed. Some of them were affected physically as well as mentally, and he restored the healthful exercise of the principle of life in both their bodies and minds. And some were affected physically, mentally and spiritually, and he restored them to a three-fold health; he healed their bodies, rectified their minds, and converted their souls; thus imparting virtue in the largest sense, and proving that all virtue is of God, and that Christ is God.

Here is a wide and fruitful field for devout and instructive meditation. Christ created and gave life to all animate and inanimate nature, and the principle of life that is in them is simply the "virtue" of Christ. When the Spirit of God brooded over chaos, and nursed it into the form and life of the universe, that Spirit, proceeding from the Father and the Son, imparted virtue from the same fountain whence all physical life is supplied. When God breathed into Adam the breath of life, and he became a living body and a living soul, he imparted the "virtue" of Christ. The sap of grass and trees, the blood which is the life of man and beast, the laws and harmony of the universe, all have their "virtue" from Christ. All students of nature, science, philosophy, are really students of the "virtue" of Christ, had they but faith to perceive it. So of the life of the mind. "There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." "The life (Christ) was the light of men"—"that enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world." And as to the soul—"thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins."

AUTHORS AND BOOKS.

I had something to say a few weeks ago about a "Book of Rogues and Vagabonds," said to have been edited by Martin Luther, and about to be published in a translation in London. One may be held excusable for considering such a volume as rather of antiquarian interest, and of no great popularity, for our day. But it turns out to have a real and tangible value, and in this way: it seems that the beggars and thieves' slang there given, though three centuries old, does not differ much from that used in England at this day, while the signs do not differ at all. Now, some two years ago, Mr. Hotten, who reprints this book, published a "Dictionary of Modern Cant, Slang, etc.," in which the history of vagabondism is touched upon, and a few of their hieroglyphics or signs of the begging thieves given. Behold the result! By these marks this class of tramps formed a kind of written language, by means of which they gave each other valuable information. The marks are, it seems, quite common in English towns and country places. They are found on door-posts, corners of streets, and house-steps; and they inform the initiated beggar of all he requires to know. A simple cross means "no good—they are too poor and too knowing;" a mark like the prongs of a pitchfork means "go in this direction, there is nothing the other way;" a diamond means "good, safe for a potato, if for nothing else;" a triangle means "spoilt by too many tramps;" a square means "unfavorable—mind the dog;" a circle with a spot in its center means "dangerous—sure of a month in prison;" and a circle with a cross in it means "religious, but tidy on the whole." Now, since Mr. Hotten's book was published, it is stated in an English Journal that "many country gentlemen have placed [illegible] spotted circle upon their door posts, and have found a singular immunity from alms-seekers in consequence."

Mr. Hotten observes, of the kind of vagabonds mentioned in Luther's book, "the Stroller, or master of the black art, is yet heard of in our rural districts. The simple farmer believes him to be weather-wise, and should his crops go wrong he crosses the fellow's hand with a piece of silver, in order that things may be righted. The Wiltsers, or finders of pretended silver flagers, are now-a-days represented by the 'fawney-riggers,' or droppers of counterfeit gold rings. Toners, or card-sharpers, are, unfortunately, still to be met with on public race-courses; and the Over-Sonzen-goers, or pretended distressed gentry, who went about 'neatly dressed,' with false letters, would seem to have been the originals of our modern 'begging-letter writers.' Those half-famished looking impesters, with clean aprons, or carefully-brushed threadbare coats, who stand on the curbs of our public thoroughfares and beg, with a few sticks of sealing-wax in their hands, were known in Luther's time as 'Goose shearers.' Another class, known amongst London street-folk as 'Shiveriag Jemmies,' were found in Germany under the title of Schwanfelders; and men who maim children, and then carry them about to excite pity; borrowers of children for the same purpose; beggars who pretend to suffer from fits, with their mouth crammed full of soap to produce foam; traveling quack doctors, and tinkers who mend one hole in a kettle and make two, are all to be found in Luther's "Book of Vagabonds."

I make haste to inform any of your readers who may be collectors of autographs, that a fine collection is now open in this city, and at private sale, with prices annexed. Messrs. Bangs, Merwin & Co. are the house having them in charge. There are nearly five hundred letters and documents, English and American, and some very rare. The two highest priced on the catalogue are an autograph line and signature of Gen. Joseph Warren, the Martyr of Bunker Hill, and a letter of Gen. Washington to Gen. George Clinton, dated at "Headquarters, Morristown, March 31, 1777." These are each valued at $20, which is very cheap. There is an autograph letter of Governer John Endicott, 1644. Very rare, price $10; letter of Joseph Brandt, chief of the Six Nations, $15; letters of Samuel Adams and John Hancock; a copy of the "Old Oaken Bucket," in Samuel Woodworth's handwriting. (Said Samuel Woodworth, by the way, was long ago a compositor in the printing office of Messrs. Harper & Bros.; from which same printing office Rev. Dr. Griswold was, and the Rev. Dr. Nicholas Murray (Kirwan) is also a graduate.) To continue, there is a sarcastic and threatening letter of Benedict Arnold to a British officer who had treated him with insult, priced $5. A bond with seal and autograph of Col. Ethan Allen, $10. A long letter of Col. Joseph Brant (Thayendanega) to Gov. Clinton, $15. MSS. of Edgar A. Poe; autograph of S. Pepys, in Life of Charles II.; of the Earl of Chatham, and many other distinguished statesmen. Toward the latter part of the list a letter of Martin F. Tupper is catalogued and valued at 25 cents. Besides letters and documents in the handwriting of presidents, kings and queens, generals, authors, actors, divines—in short, of half the people who have made very much noise in the English-speaking world of the last few hundred years.

The library of Mr. Crowninshield, a deceased book collector, of Boston, was not long ago sent to England, to be sold, with a curious idea that the books, mostly on America, and very valuable, would fetch larger prices there than here; when it is notorious that for seven years the price of rare editions of rare old books has risen enormously in England, only on account of the American demand. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, if many of the best books in this now scattered, but once nearly unique collection are eventually brought back to this country. The business of old book-selling is a very extensive one here, and particularly in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, where very large capitals are invested in this way, in places scarce known to the great busy world of the street, but well known, indeed, and greatly loved by collectors and literary men in general. Meantime it is stated that the copy of the "Bay Psalm-Book," the first book printed in British America, at Cambridge, Mass., and which did not appear at the sale lately held in London, comprising a portion of the Crowninshield library, has been sold, not to the British Museum, but to a private collector in England, for one hundred and fifty guineas. When advertised with the rest of the library, in Boston, before the collection was disposed of entire, several bids as high as $600 were received, and it would, most likely, have brought quite as much in this country as the sum realized in England.

Mr. Charles Reade's new book, "The Eighth Commandment," which turns out to be a forcibly written Essay on the rights and wrongs of the English and French Dramatic copyright law, contains some curious particulars about the remuneration for various kinds of artistic and literary labor in England and France, in this century and the last. It seems that of six pictures by Faed, Maclise, O'Neil, Landseer, Roberts, and Stanfield, respectively—sold last April at Glasgow—the average price was upwards of $5000; of fourteen others lately sold in London, the price averaged about $3000, one by Landseer fetching $14,000; and another by Maclise $5,150. On the other hand, Sir E. Lyttou received, it is said, only $2,500 for the "Lady of Lyons," Mr. Jerrold received only $300 for "Black-eyed Susan;" and Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Reade himself, only $750 for "Masks and Faces." In France, he adds, it would have been worth $15,000, and the "Lady of Lyons" worth $30,000; Mr. Reade has himself received $5,500 for a novel, inferior, as he says, to the play for which he received $750.

Mr. Reade remarks that in the last century this state of things was exactly reversed. Plays then commanded a far higher price than either novels, poems, or pictures. For the "Lives of the Poets," Johnson received $1,000; for "Ireno," a tragedy, $1575; Goldsmith received $300 for the "Vicar of Wakefield," for the "Good-natured Man, $2,500, and $4,000 for "She Stoops to Conquer." Holcroft received $4,500 for one play, and $6,500 for another; and Cay, for the "Beggar's Opera," had $10,000. Hogarth, on the other hand, cleared $500 by the "Marriage a la Mode," and $920 by the "Harlot's Progress." In France, at the present day, "a good first piece is worth $7,500 to $15,000; and Mr. Reade gives instances in which $20,000 and $25,000 have been received.

One thought occurs to me in looking over this comparative list. England in the last century was about as morally corrupt as France is now. It seems that that country which most highly pays the play-wright—that is to say, which most largely patronizes the theatre, is (in both these cases) the most corrupt.

Mr. T. Duffers Hardy, who is an eminent English scholar and paleographist, has just published a pamphlet on the Collier-Shakespeare controversy, which is another annihilating blow at Mr. Collier, who, poor old gentleman, is convicted on all hands now of stupid blundering, or worse. With reference to the hand writing in the corrected folio of Shakespeare, which is the matter in dispute, Mr. Hardy pronounces emphatically that its character in the notes and emendations, or rather its combination of characters, is not only improbable, but downright impossible. The hand writings in the Devonshire folio vary from the stiff Gothic of the time of Henry VIII. down to the round style of our own time, thus leaping over the two entire epochs in handwriting: that of Elizabeth, which was more inclined and less stiff than the Gothic which prevailed in her father's time, and that of the seventeenth century, when the hand-writing was cursive, but "utterly unlike the cursive hand of these pencillings." And lastly, an argument of a cogent nature is found in the extraordinary variations in the letters, which in some cases [illegible] ways; and Mr. Hardy challenges Mr. Collier to produce out of the British museum or the State paper office any single MS. in which the writer employs such various formations of the same character. Mr. Hardy divides the errors which the "Emendations" profess to correct into four classes:—(a), typographical and self-evident; (b), typographical, but requiring some critical acumen or fancy to amend; (c), errors corrected by other commentators; (d), those corrected for the first time in the Devonshire folio. The result of an analysis of the corrections in "Love's Labor Lost" is that their author is convicted of plagiarism in thirty-three instances, and of stupidity in nearly all the rest. The account is thus summed up:

1. Restored to various owners,.....21
2. Restored to the old copies,.....12
3. Abandoned by Mr. Collier,.....25
4. Condemned for reasons stated,.....10
5. Admitted (conditionally),..... 1—99

Mr. Hardy produces seventy emendations, taken from twenty-three plays at hazard, in which the "Old Corrector" has anticipated the conjectures of Tyrwhitt, Rowe, Baron Field, Blackstone, Daveanat, Knight, Singer, Theobald, Malone, Stevens, Sidney Walker, Pope, Hanmer, Jackson, Capell, Farmer, Mason, Warburton, Tollet, Johnson, and even Mr. Collier himself! And, what is particularly worthy of notice, he has anticipated not only the good but even the bad conjectures.

Thus vanishes the last vestige of authority and value possessed by those so much vaunted corrections, of which Mr. Collier made such good use that he even published, some years ago, an edition of Shakespeare, with these spurious corrections introduced in the text!

While upon Shakespearianaa I may mention a recent publication, a "Dictionary of Old English Plays," by James Orchard Halliwell, Esq., which is, in some regards, a valuable addition to our bibliographical works. But Mr. Halliwell is an Englishman, and cannot see beyond the Land's End. At any rate, he is blind to all merit on our American side of the water. It is known to all lovers of Shakespeare that Mr. Richard Grant White, who has been ranked for some years among the most clear-headed and eminent of Shakespearian scholars, and whose writings on this subject have always received unusual attention from the most eminent of the English critics and commentators, has published (by Little, Brown & Co., of Boston,) an edition of Shakespeare's works, in which his comments are of acknowledged excellence and value—acknowledged not only in this country, but in England as well, even by the Athenæum, which is rarely kind to Americans. Now, in an appendix to his work, Mr. Halliwell gives a list of "Editions of Shakespeare," and in the list of modern editions he mentions all but Mr. White, with which he was certainly acquainted, for it has been noticed by all the Shakespearian critics in England. It seems a pity that a literary man should have such small jealousies.

Most of your readers will remember Mr. Chas. Mackay, who made a tour through the United States some years ago, and did not make such a stir as he evidently thought he would. In fact he confined himself chiefly to writing poetry about Mr. Longworth's Catawba wine, of which, when in Cincinnati, he seems to have had as much as he wanted. Mr. Mackay recently published a long poem, which some of the critics in England gave the go-by, as not having merit enough to make it worth notice; while others pointed out its faults. Nobody praised it, I believe; and so the poem had a short life. In the last number of his new paper, the London Review, Mr. M. revenges himself on the critics, whom he calls criticasters, and divides into no less than twenty-four classes.—This done, he proceeds to quote from these imaginary classes. He says: "Not to be personal, let us (i.e., the reader and myself) suppose that there are before us several criticasters drawn out of these twenty-four classes; and that their names are A., B., C., D., E., &c. Let us, furthermore, suppose that a new book has just appeared—a poem—a novel—or a history; that the book is good; that the frogs are in their own pool of criticasticism, and that they have just begun croaking.

A. leads off thus:

> My head is wooden: 'tis an age of wood,—
> Who is not wooden, is nor great nor good.

B. follows:

> My spectacles are yellow; let none dare
> To say that skies are blue, or earth is fair.

C. prolongs the noise:

> He gives no dinners; how can he rehearse
> Great thoughts or deeds in memorable verse?
> Give me the poet who can keep a cook
> And choicest wines; or else—I'll damn his book.

D., who is melancholy, adds his croak thus:

> My harp's unstrung; I hate the common loon,
> Who talks to me of harmony and tune;
> I feel unwholesome, jaundiced, and awry;
> The art of writing's dead;—low let it lie!

E., who is sour as verjuice, croaks still more lustily:

> I've failed; and shall another man succeed?
> Not if by spiteful pen, or tongue, or deed,
> Or shrug suggestive, I can blight his fame,
> And tag disfavor to his hateful name."

It is evident that Mr. Charles Mackay has lost his temper.

Among the most astounding of recent German announcements is one, by a Mr. Schild, of Dresden, that he will shortly publish an edition of "Goethe's finest poems, revised and corrected according to the wants of the present age!"

Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, of Boston, announce as in press a new volume of poems, by Prof. Oliver Wendell Holmes, the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table; a new volume, by James Russell Lowell, called "Fireside Travels;" a volume of poems, by Miss Rose Terry, of Hartford, Conn. They announce, also, a new poem, by Coventry Patmore, author of "The Angel in the House;" the Life of Major Andre, from original sources, by Winthrop Sargent; the "Eighth Commandment," by Chas. Reade; Frederica Bremer's "Switzerland and Italy," translated by Mary Howitt; "Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character," by Dean Ramsay; and "Hesperia," by Richard Henry Wilde.

Messrs. Gould & Lincoln of Boston, have in press, "The Benefits of Christ's Death," an old volume, written three hundred years ago, by Antonio Della Pedin. They have just published "Metaphysics; or, the philosophy of Consciousness, Phenomenal and Real," by H. Longueville Mansel, a book which has created much discussion in England.

Messrs. Mason & Brothers will publish the third and concluding volume of Mr. Parton's Life of Andrew Jackson early in September. The Life of Gen. Philip Schuyler, which Mr. Benson J. Lossing has been engaged upon for some time, and for which he was furnished by the family a great number of original letters and documents, will also be published by Messrs. Mason.—They are just putting to press Mr. Abbott's "Italy," a continuation of his successful historico-biographical series, of which "Austria" and "Russia" have already been published. In the department of popular music-books, Messrs. Mason have just published new volumes by Dr. Mason, and Messrs. Root, Bradbury, and Hastings.

Messrs. Derby & Jackson have sold, within the last twelve months, of the "Minister's Wooing," 30,000 copies; of "Beulah," 24,000; of "Rutledge," a recent publication, 12,000; and of Marion Harland's "Nemesis," which the Philadelphia Press (Dr. Shelton Mackenzie) pronounces the best work of the season, 10,000 copies—all which were needed to fill advance orders; for the book is but just out. The ladies are making the great literary successes of the year.

GOOD NEWS.

[illegible] end, and the harvest [illegible] that the summer would [illegible] ing of the Spirit of God, which the Church has been in the habit of praying for, and expecting, would not be enjoyed. The drops before the shower, however, begin to fall. A great and sweeping revival was never more needed than now.

Rev. U. L. Thompson, who is on Gadsden circuit, Ala. Con., which is mostly in the valley between the Look-out Mountain and the Coosa river, below Rome, Ga., writes us that that beautiful country is rapidly improving, and that a glorious revival, the meeting continuing 18 days, has resulted in the conversion of 70 or 80 persons, and the addition of 62 to the Church. It was a glorious time.

Rev. W. H. Ardis, Sepulga circuit, Ala. Con., writes us that they have recently closed some very profitable protracted meetings. At Wesley chapel many were converted, and 25 added to the Church. At Asbury chapel, about 20 conversions, mostly probationers, and 7 added to the Church. At Bethel many converted, and 38 added to the Church. About 100 have been converted, and 152 added to the Church this year.

Rev. L. R. Bell, Pleasantville circuit, Ala. Con., writes us that they have been blessed with a gracious revival, and the addition of 175 to the Church on probation.

Rev. U. B. Philips, Fish River Mission, Ala. Conf. writes us that 93 have been received on probation since the second quarterly meeting, 65 of whom have been converted. There are 6 preaching places served twice a month; about 800 catechumens; 50 have received baptism, of whom 21 were children.

Rev. W. H. McNeill, Paulding circuit, Miss., writes us that, at a protracted meeting at Paulding, 18 whites and 15 blacks were added to the Church. Up to this time, 21 have been converted, and 97 added to the Church. The recent revival was a glorious one.

Rev. Thomas Price, Georgetown circuit, Miss. Con., writes that at a protracted meeting at Chrystal Springs Church, the Lord poured out his Spirit abundantly.—Number received on probation: whites, 29; colored, 44; total, 73. Received into full membership, 8; baptized, 45; converted, about 30.

Rev. B. F. Alexander, Louisiana Conference, writes that, ten miles from Pleasant Hill, in the parish of Natchitoches, an interesting revival has been in progress for more than a fortnight. The principal workers have been J. W. Howard and B. S. Porter, local preachers. A new church of 43 members was formed; one-third of these had been members in other States, and had letters. About 25 professed conversion. A great interest on religion prevails in all the regions round about. A Sunday-school had flourished there for three months before the revival began. There are many destitute places south of Red River, where such efforts would be attended with like success.

Rev. T. H. McClendon, Ouachita circuit, writes:—We have had 10 conversions, 11 accessions, and left many at the altar for prayer. We are expecting good times at other points. The Lord is reviving his work among us. Our Baptist brethren are having some refreshing seasons.

Rev. T. J. Lacy, Winnsboro' circuit, La. Con., writes us that near fifty white persons, and a number of colored, have been added to the Church this year, and many of them have embraced Jesus as their Savior. He had just returned from Oakley, where, for four days, the Church wrestled as one man; and twenty-three accessions, with many professions of trust in Jesus, was the result.

RETURN OF A MISSIONARY FROM SYRIA.—Rev. J. Frazer, with his wife and two children, were passengers in the Arabin, which arrived at Boston on the 22d ult. Mr. Frazer was an American missionary, of the Presbyterian branch, and was located at Damascus as colaborer with Rev. Mr. Graham, of the Irish Presbyterian mission. Mr. Frazer left before the outbreak in that city, and endeavored to induce Mr. Graham to accompany him. This Mr. G. declined to do, and was afterwards found murdered in the streets.

OUR ANNUAL STATEMENT.

We furnish our readers this week with the annual Commercial Statement for the year ending August 31st, 1860; also, the Financial Statement for the same period. We are indebted to the Crescent of this city for these valuable documents—a paper always most thorough and reliable in commercial and financial matters. Our readers will find the Statements of great interest and value to them for present perusal and for future reference.

FLORENCE WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY.

This Institution, located in Florence, Alabama, combines facilities for the most thorough mental and moral cultivation. The President, Rev. R. H. Rivers, D.D., has but few equals, and perhaps no superior in the government of young men. His long experience, his extensive knowledge of human nature, and his firmness and unremitting kindness, at once secures the confidence and love of students, and obedience is almost a necessary result. He is associated with a full, able, and laborious faculty; and in addition to the usual course, Rev. J. W. Hamer, D.D., of the Tennessee Conference has been elected Professor of Biblical Literature. He will enter upon his duties as such so soon as the endowment of the Chair will justify him in so doing. The amount can be raised very soon, we think, more than half being already raised.

The healthfulness of this location; the convenience of access from all parts of the union by rail-road; the intelligence and morality of the community; the provision for boarding students in the best private families; the abundant facilities for instruction, together with its constantly increasing reputation, commends the University to the confidence and liberal patronage of an intelligent public.

The next session will open the 4th Wednesday in September next.

F. A. KINNELL.

Florence, Ala. Aug. 12th, 1860.

GREENSBURG CAMP-MEETING will commence on Friday before the 4th Sabbath in September. Rev. B. Pitkin, the Presiding Elder, requests us to say that, in consequence of the drouth, and the scarcity of grain, etc., it is hoped that all who can will have tents; that those who do not tent will, as many can, come with cloth tents; that those who do neither will, as many as come and return home at night, bring provisions for themselves and others, as in a basket-meeting; and that he wishes it known that provender for horses, except those of the preachers, will be provided on the ground at the "usual rates." In short, times are hard, but the camp-meeting is desired, and all must help who can. He is right.

HAVE YOU PAID YOUR PREACHER?—Your preacher will soon leave you for Conference. Have you paid him? Have you paid the full amount assessed? Was the assessment large enough? Can gentlemen, of the same sized family, live on it in your country? If not, are you going to increase it? If you do not, can you claim to be either pious or honest; to say nothing of honor, taste, dignity? Think, while there is time. Let no more sighs of grief and wounded feeling go up to God, from your own pastors, against you.

THE STATISTICS.—Brother preacher, are you preparing to present to your approaching Conference full and accurate statistics of the work in your charge? Have you the printed blanks ready to be filled up? Will there be a "gain" over last year on your work?

THE COLLECTIONS.—Brother preacher, have you done all you could? Have you preached [illegible] the best circumstances and in the best mode your wisdom could suggest, before every congregation?

THE TEST.—How long has it been since you have witnessed a clear, powerful conversion in your church?—Consider. Has your fig-tree any fruit?

ANOTHER TEST.—Does the instruction in your Sabbath-school lead to the conversion of the children? Do the teachers aim at it, and labor and pray for it?

There were only 126 deaths in this city last week, being 16 less than in the week previous, and but one of yellow fever. The city, in fact, is remarkably healthy, and there being no fears now of an epidemic, we look for a very large and rapid increase of the population.—Already the summer tourists are returning, and the city is throwing off its summer lagnor and looking quite brisk and business like.

The Charleston Mercury learns that the Rev. Dr. Kirkpatrick, late pastor of the Glebe-street Church, and one of the most distinguished and able divines of the Presbyterian order, has left that city in response to an invitation to supply the pulpit of Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, lately under the charge of the lamented Dr. Alexander.

NEW METHODIST COLLEGE.—A splendid new college building is in course of construction at Bowling Green, Ky., under the patronage of the Louisville Conference of M. E. Church, South. Nearly sixty hands are at present employed on the building, which it is estimated will cost thirty thousand dollars.

RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT.—The Independent American Catholics of Richmond, Va., have formed a congregation, under the pastoral lead of Rev. Mr. Tirion, formerly a chaplain of the French army in the Crimea, and have fitted up a house at the corner of Broad street and Brooke Avenue, for religious worship. They observe all the forms and ceremonies of the Roman Catholic church, but do not acknowledge the supremacy of the bishop.

SUGAR....As anticipated at an early period of the season, the Sugar crop has fallen very considerably short of the yield of the preceding year, and seven of the year 1857, planters having received with a backward spring, a drouth in summer, and severe early frosts in the fall.

The following table gives the production of each parish in the State during the last two years, as estimated by Mr. P. A. Champomier in his annual report:

Of this total of 221,840 hhds., 192,108 were Brown Sugar, made by the old process, 23,909 Refined, Clarified, etc., and 5763 Cotton Bottoms. The weight of the crop is estimated by Mr. Champomier at 255,118,750 pounds, against 414,796,000 pounds last year.

ALLINE OWIN: A TALE OF ALABAMA.

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Chapter XX.

"High o'er our heads arose a cloud so vast,
Our eyes and heaven a fearful shade it cast."

The [illegible] drawing to a close when they arrived at a small [illegible] the roadside, where they would be detained for [illegible] and where they would obtain a few hours' rest before proceeding on their journey. Nothing had occurred to disturb them on the road thus far, and they were congratulating themselves and the driver on their safety, when the coachman spoke up quickly and seriously:

"It has been bad enough all day, and is worse ahead, for the river is still before us, and the creeks may have overflown their banks. It will be dark, and I think you had better wait till morning, for there is no prospect of more rain."

"We would willingly do so," said Percy, "but that we will scarcely arrive in time by traveling all night; indeed I should much prefer remaining till morning, for I feel strangely [illegible] and the sky does look threatening indeed."

Even while they spoke the low muttering of distant thunder was heard, and soon the rain began to fall with renewed violence. The girls had retired to their rooms, but the young men sat silent and thoughtful, listening to the splashing of the water and the rushing of the gale as it whistled around the old inn. The shutters creaked in the wind, and a low sullen roar fell ever and anon upon their ears, like the distant sound of a freshet.

"As you please," muttered the man, as he passed along to change his horses, "but you must be responsible for the consequences."

Night had closed in, and among the various persons who crowded the rude tavern was one who seemed also intent upon proceeding that night, notwithstanding storm, rain, and darkness. He was apparently old in years, and also in experience, or so thought our young men, for they were consulting with him upon venturing onward, and finding him inclined to proceed, soon regained their courage also. It was not long before the coachman sung out, 'all ready,' and drew up at the door. A few moments more, and our little party were seated again in the stage, muffled warmly, and cheerfully entertaining each other in earnest conversation, unheeding the war of elements without. The night soon became black as ink, but the coach rolled on, bearing its freight of human beings on, on to inevitable destruction—unless, indeed, the hand of an ever-watchful Providence interposes to save. Was the hand of God stretched forth in time? We shall see.

The driver had proceeded on through darkness, wind and water for some time safely, and thinking that he was fording only the shallow water which had fallen during the day; but as it grew deeper and deeper each moment, he began to feel more unpleasant, fearing that he had missed the bridge and was really forcing his horses through the swollen creek. He also became aware of a roar, as of many waters, around him. But if he had missed the bridge, it was now too late to return, for there was no room to turn his horses' heads, and he was about to urge them forward, when a lurid flash of lightning burst along the sky, illumining the midnight darkness to almost noonday splendor, by which, to his horror and amazement, he perceived what he had taken for shallow water, or, even at the worst, the creek, was the frightfully swollen river, from whose banks he had for the last few moments been trying to urge his frightened steeds, the bridge having been swept away. He was not long in determining in what way he could best save himself—this one thought occupying his mind wholly at this moment. Before, behind, and on either side presented to his eye only one sheet of water, in the hasty glance which he had obtained by the lightning, and as he could not save those who were within the coach, he thought not of remaining to share their fate. So, leaving his seat as he drew up suddenly, he proceeded noiselessly and hastily as possible to unharness his horses, while the water continued to rise with frightful rapidity. Those within finding that they had stopped suddenly, felt a thrill of alarm; and Edward, raising his voice, called loudly to know what had happened; but receiving no answer, he leant far out of the window, that he might see, if possible, the cause of the delay. What was his dismay at finding the condition of all without! He scarcely had time to realize their situation, when the coachman, mounted on the back of one of the horses, darted past him, and was soon enveloped in impenetrable darkness. Comprehending, at once, the manœuvre of the man, and fully conscious now of their imminent danger, together with their impotence and hopelessness of escape from almost certain death, he soon made known their situation to those within, who awaited his explanation with such intense suspense. Each one clearly understood their frightful condition there on the bank of the swollen river, surrounded by waters which had overcome all barriers, and, as it disdaining their prescribed channels, and scorning alike the omnipotent power which held them within bounds, and the command, "thus far shalt thou come and no farther," had rushed along, bearing all before them in their onward course; and now seeming, by their angry roar and fierce violence, to be rejoicing that they would be—if long favored by darkness and storm—the instrument of death to those who had ventured so hopefully into their very midst. Yes, our heroes and heroines fully comprehended their nearness to that bourne whence no traveler ever returns; and awed and terror-stricken, after their first ejaculation of "God, have mercy upon us!" was uttered, no word escaped their lips. Each one seemed absorbed in prayer; all was calm—the profound calmness of despair. Only the aged gentleman of whom we have spoken, who ventured forth with our little party from the inn, appeared to be able to utter a sound. His teeth chattered, and his frame shook with such violence, that Alline, who sat nearest to him, forgot her own fears for a moment in pity for the agony he endured. Ever and anon there came from his bosom such despairing groans, and such fervent ejaculations to God to spare him, that it was truly terrible to hear.

As the night of wind and rain wore slowly on, the water continuing slowly to rise, the inmates of that old coach gave up their last faint hope. Higher and higher rose the water, till they were obliged to draw their feet up on the seats to keep them dry; and these soon becoming covered by the water, they were all contemplating a remove to the top, determining to cling to the stage as long as there was the slightest hope of safety in thus doing. Oh, how earnestly they wished for dawn! Never before had they experienced such yearning for the morning light, which had beamed so often upon them unappreciated, and for which no grateful prayer had been offered up. But their contemplated move, they soon found, would be unnecessary, for an ever-watchful Providence was over them. God had not forsaken that despairing group, for at this crisis the wind lulled, the rain ceased, the water began to fall, and the long hoped for dawn began to break; the rosy light of morn, which none of them had scarcely hoped ever to witness again in time, was seen to gild the east with its brilliant hues. Ah, their gratitude and praise were not forgotten now, for, with returning light, returned also hope, for they must be discovered, and assistance would be given. Yes, they would now escape a watery grave, but this escape was more difficult than they at first imagined.

As they had expected, morning saw the opposite bank of the river crowded with persons anxious to render assistance. Many ways were suggested; but all were found, after deliberation, inexpedient; and it was noon before it was decided in what way assistance could best be given them, and it was later still when the raft, which had been proposed by some one, was completed—this being the only means by which a chance of rescuing them seemed probable, everything like a boat having been washed away, if indeed there had ever been one near. The raft was made available by ropes being attached to both ends, one of which was thrown across to the stage by means of a stone being attached to a small cord, the cord having been made fast to the end of one of the ropes. Thus the frail structure could be drawn to and from the distressed party, it being only large enough to carry one person at a time. Necessity soon overcame the fear and timidity of the girls, and as each, one by one, stepped upon the rude raft, their hearts bounded with hope and courage.—An hour or two later saw the entire party safely delivered from their peril.

SUDDEN DEATH AT A RELIGIOUS MEETING.—The Boston Transcript of the 20th inst, says: "The familiar quotation, 'in the midst of life we are in death,' is suggested by a sad occurrence which took place in the vestry of Trinity Church in this city this morning. A social and religious meeting is held at that place every Monday morning, from half-past eight to half-past nine o'clock, in which the clergy and laity of the Episcopal Church take part. Near the close of the meeting this morning, as Benjamin Howard, Esq., (the father-in-law of Bishop Clark,) was reading an interesting letter from a distant part of the Union about religious matters, his voice failed when he was in the middle of a sentence, and he took his seat. A gentleman present rose and said he would occupy the time of the meeting while his friend rested, and would give way when he wished to resume his reading.—These words were hardly uttered when Mr. Howard was observed to fall over upon his right side. His wife and daughter and others near him tendered their aid, but the vital spark had fled.

A CENTENARIAN.—The census-taker has found a negro man in Washington county, Ohio, one hundred and fifteen years old. He was purchased at Richmond, Va., in 1776, by Bienserhasset's agent, by whom he was conveyed to Bienserhassett's Island, where he remained until misfortune overwhelmed his master. The old fellow says he recollects that he "had his gwine to see de gals long time fore the revolution war broke out."

VENICE.—A letter from Venice gives a sad picture of the state of affairs in that city. All the noble and wealthy families who used every year to occupy apartments in the Palaces of the Canal have abandoned it, and the emigration of the native inhabitants is becoming more numerous every day. There is an undisguised struggle between an unarmed population, who manifest by all the means in their power their hatred of foreign rule, and an obstinate stupid local government, revenging itself on the mass of the population by various petty annoyances.

The Palatine Library of Florence contains a likeness of Dante, which represents him at the time of his ripe manhood, and which is ascribed to Giotto. It will soon be published, together with the collection of MSS. of that library, and Verletti is lithographing the portrait.

THE CAPTURE OF LONDON.

If ever the invasion of England be attempted, the point to be aimed at by the invader will be the capture of London; and for the very simple reason that it alone will repay the costs and risks of an attack. If Portsmouth dockyard were destroyed, Devonport would remain; if both were lost, there would be Chatham; give all three to an enemy, and we have Pembroke; let them take all four, and England might still build ships on the Clyde and the Severn and the Mersey by private enterprise; better, perchance, than in royal dockyards, the gunboat failures notwithstanding. An enemy would not be likely to place himself permanently on Portland Hill, or any other part of England, to capitulate and make terms. What might happen if a conqueror were to get possession of the Bank of England, and appoint a General of Division Governor pro tem., who would make the bank parlor his headquarters, and bid his soldiers mount guard over the bullion vaults, it is difficult to say. With London in a state of siege, a Provost Marshal installed at the Mansion House, a park of Artillery on Tower Hill, the Royal Exchange and Guildhall converted into military posts, and foreign soldiers quartered upon the inhabitants, there would be no Quotations of Consols on the Stock Exchange, nor any of the usual telegrams or leading articles in the newspapers. The Government would be powerless for anything but making terms with the invading foe; Parliament would be nowhere; martial law alone would prevail; our glorious constitution would be abrogated, and the monarchy itself might be in jeopardy. The day of England's disgrace and humiliation might inaugurate a saturnalia of brutal soldiery; crime and misery, such as the imagination recoils from conceiving, might desolate our hearths and homes; and destruction of property to the value of untold millions would involve paralysis of commerce, death of credit, stoppage of manufactures, ruin of trade and the dissolution of every bond of law and society; nay, even this frightful calamity might be heightened by the horrors of the sack of London.—Cornhill Magazine.

MADAME GARIBALDI.—The daughter of Count Raimondi, who accepted the hand of Garibaldi, but from whom he separated himself immediately after the performance of the nuptial ceremony, on receipt of a letter informing him that she was about giving birth to a child by a previous lover, is now residing at Freiburg, in Switzerland, and persists in calling herself Madame Garibaldi.

The Rothschilds are about to establish a house in St. Petersburg.

Burmeister has recently returned to Halle, from his four years' exploration in South America, with immense zoological and palæontological collections.

A new Rachel has made her appearance in Paris, in the person of a young Alsatian Jewess, named Albertine Esslinger, who has given performances in the house of Lamartine, and in the literary and artistic circles, where the most sanguine expectations have been raised by her genius, although she is only about 13 years of age.

The Pharo de Loire says that a convention has been signed between France and England for the emigration of six thousand coolies to the Isle of Reunion. The management of the recruiting will be entrusted to a French house in Calcutta.

Count Palffy, a Hungarian, formerly in the Austrian service, and recently intrusted in the Papal army with the organization of the light cavalry, died June 16, at Viterbo, as is supposed, by the hands of highway robbers.

Mr. Alfred Dickens, a brother of Charles Dickens, recently died at Manchester, England. He was by profession a civil engineer. He was much admired for his brilliant conversational powers.

The marriage of Mlle. Picolomini with the Duke of Gaetani has taken place at Sienna.

M. Costi, the United States Consular agent at Damascus who was wounded on the very first day of the late massacres in that city, is of Arabian descent, and accordiag to the Boyrout correspondent of the Paris Presse, has only within a few years worn the European costume.

The Dublin Freeman's Journal says the harvest prospects in Ireland are very bad.

The original manuscript of Gray's elegy in a country Churchyard was lately sold at auction in London for £100.

Victor G. Audubon, son of Audubon the ornithologist, and himself an artist of no little distinction, died at his residence, near New York, on the 17th ult.

HEAVY RAINS NORTH.—On the night of the 22d, New York, Boston, and Philadelphia were visited by very heavy rains, which did much damage to property. In New Jersey the storm was very severe.

NIAGARA SUSPENSION BRIDGE.—The Niagara Suspension Bridge has lately undergone a very minute and careful inspection. It is pronounced by those competent to examine it, as perfect as when it was completed, and there is not the least evidence of weakness in any part. Those best acquainted with the bridge, express the opinion that a century of time will make no impression upon the structure in any part.

Buffalo city has increased her population 7065 in the past five years, or at the rate of nearly fifteen hundred per annum. The population is now 81,541.

ARREST FOR FORGERY.—A New York despatch says that Mr. Frank Ward, formerly a banker in the city of San Francisco, has been arrested on a charge of forgery.

The valuation of the city of Boston, for 1860, shows an increase of over $13,000,000 over that of last year.

DIFFICULTY IN NORTH CAROLINA UNIVERSITY.—The Raleigh Press says that a difficulty occurred at Chapel Hill a few days since between the faculty and a number of students belonging to the sophomore class, and that about eighty of the students have left for their respective homes.

SENATOR BRODERICK'S WILL.—It is reported from San Francisco that the published will of the late Senator Broderick of California, has been by experts declared to be a forgery.

A collection of fugitive pieces by the great humorist, Douglas Jerrold, has just been put forth under the auspices of his son. It is called the Brownrigge Papers; the greater number of them having been contributed to the periodicals in which they appeared under the signature of Henry Brownrigge.

WESTERN TELEGRAPH.—It is expected that the telegraph line between St. Joseph, Missouri, and Fort Kearney, will be finished by the middle of November.

SLAVES IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.—The census is showing a great falling off in the slave population in Western Virginia. They are being rapidly sold and removed South.

The fire companies of Knoxville, Tenn., have been disbanded, on account of the refusal of the council to make the usual allowance.

DR. BURDELL.—The heirs of Dr. Burdell, (of Cunningham memory,) are at law among themselves in New York. Of course the money of the murdered dentist is the cause of the difficulty.

AN OLD SOLDIER DEAD.—Capt. Stewart Megowan, a soldier in the war of 1812 and of the battle of New Orleans, died in Lexington, Kentucky, a few days since, at an advanced age.

AMERICAN SCIENTIFIC ASSOCIATION.—This Association, recently in session at Newport, R. I., has decided upon Nashville as the place of the next annual meeting. Professor Barnard, President of the University of Mississippi, has been elected President of the Association. The Philadelphia Ledger, in noticing this fact, says that Professor Barnard is "one of the very first men of the country or the age."

Jessie White Mario, of Mazzinian notoriety, is mentioned as being at Palermo engaged in the superintendence of the hospitals as is Florence Nightingale.

It is said that the Empress Eugenie is about to present the Emperor with a new token of conjugal love.

AUSTRIAN ARMAMENTS IN ITALY.—An arsenal is now being organized at Peschiera, by order of the Emperor Francis Joseph, to serve as a depot for the flotilla of the Lake of Garda. Workmen continue to be employed in building and fitting out war steamers and gun boats.—Peschiera will moreover have barracks for 300 men, and bomb-proof storehouses for ammunition and other supplies.

It is stated that Lords Kildare, Dunraven and Talbot de Malahide, have associated themselves with Drs. Todd, O'Donovan, and other Irish scholars, to promote the compiling and printing of a native Irish Dictionary.

MISS FREDERIKA BREMER.—A note to the Boston Transcript informs the world of the whereabouts and present occupation of Miss Frederika Bremer. She left Jerusalem in May, 1859, after a full survey of the most interesting parts of Palestine, having lived in convents, and seen much denied to less distinguished travelers. She undertook the most adventurous excursions on horseback into the interior, with a single Arab as her guide and servant, not fearing the wild Bedouins of the Desert. She has examined the Holy Land from Mount Lebanon to the Dead Sea; visited the memorable places, passed to Constantinople, Smyrna, and the great places in the East; and then reached Athens to rest and write. She has arranged and copied her notes on Switzerland. Her travels in the East and Greece will make two other works. She will spend this summer among the Greek Islands, and return to rest one more winter at Athens. More than all this, she promises to give the world a treatise on Prayer, which is already completed.

ARMING IN SWITZERLAND.—The Swiss are arming actively but quietly. Fourteen thousand men have already been armed with rifles, and to these 14,000 more are now being added. This will form no despicable force, especially in a country where almost every boy is taught to shoot, and where, therefore, these 28,000 will be picked men. Great attention is also being bestowed upon improving the artillery, and the troops are being regularly drilled. Some of the worst mountain passes are also about to be formed into good military roads. The Gemmi is to be made accessible for cavalry, and roads fit for artillery will lead across the Grimsel and the Furca. The National Assembly have almost unanimously given full powers to the government, and all the requisite sums have been readily and cheerfully granted as soon as asked for.

BUENOS AYRES.—Advices from Buenos Ayres to June 29th, have been received at New York. A compact or union between the Argentine Confederation and the province of Buenos Ayres was celebrated at Parana on the 6th and ratified by both governments on the 19th. A decree immediately issued for the assembling of a convention, ad hoc, within thirty days, the result of whose deliberations was to be submitted to the next National Congress, to which Buenos Ayres, after having sworn to the Constitution, would send members. Until Congressional action shall be taken, Buenos Ayres remains as at present, and with entire control of her own army and Custom House. Early next year Buenos Ayres will have surrendered her quasi independence and become once more a member of the Confederation.

HELP FOR THE SUFFERERS IN SYRIA.—The committee appointed at a public meeting of citizens of New York, to devise measures whereby the sympathy of our American people in behalf of the sufferers in Syria may find practical and effective expression, have published an address, embodying some interesting facts, and urging prompt action. They request remittances to the treasurer of small or large sums, as may be convenient. The American Consul at Beyrout and the missionaries there are to be the almoners. It is stated that there are more than seventy thousand wretched people, many of them widows and orphans, homeless, shelterless, in want of food, of raiment, and many without hope, who need help. In a country like this, where wealth abounds, such an appeal cannot be made in vain.

A SECRET FOR ONE HUNDRED YEARS.—We see it stated in the Massachusetts papers that the treasurer of Amherst College, in that State, has lately received from Hon. David Sears, of Boston, a heretofore liberal benefactor of the College, a small and carefully sealed box, with the instruction that it is not to be opened for one hundred years, on pain of a forfeiture of the gift which it contains. Speculation is at fault as to the contents and the reasons for the accompanying condition. The shrewdest guess is that the box holds deeds of real estate in Boston, now under lease for one hundred years, but then to be transferred to the college. "But let us be patient till 1960, and then we shall all know," says the Springfield Republican.

PRESENT TO MISS NIGHTINGALE.—Florence Nightingale in her sickness and retirement, is cheered by a continuous stream of blessings, that takes its fountainhead from her merciful sojourn in the Crimea. A very elegant little present has been forwarded to her by a grateful officer, who recovered under her exertions. It consists of a small repeating watch in a ring, the cylinder of which is made of an oriental ruby. Its diameter is the fifty-fourth part of an inch, its length the forty-seventh, and its weight the two hundredth part of a grain.

THE PACIFICATOR OF INDIA WELCOME.—When Lord Clyde, the pacificator of India, was welcomed to London after the every great battle in which the British have distinction in since Corunna, was installed as a peer in the House of Lords, besides the hero being a Campbell, the Lord Bishop of Bangor, who read prayers, was a Campbell; the Lord Chancellor, who presided at the woolsack, was a Campbell; and the new peer was introduced by the Duke of Argyll, now Lord Privy Seal, and chief of the clan.

THE GRAVES AT SEBASTOPOL.—Le Nord publishes a letter from a Frenchman staying at Sebastopol giving an entire contradiction to the statement that any bones had been removed from that place. He says he had just visited the French and English cemeteries in company with an English tourist, and they found not the slightest trace of their having been in any way disturbed. The bones which were carried away were those of a vast number of animals belonging to the besieging armies, which had died in the neighborhood: these were collected by a Jew, and exported for manure.

GARIBALDI AND THE SICILIANS.—Garibaldi finds the administrative and financial difficulties of his new Government more perplexing than those of the battle-field. No one wishes to pay any taxes. The Sicilians have yet to discover that no government, constitutional or despotic, can do without money, and that casting off tyranny is not casting off taxation.

A NEWLY INVENTED TELEGRAPH CABLE.—A London letter states that Mr. W. H. Pigott has laid and satisfactorily worked an experimental cable between Ryde, in the Isle of Wight, and Alverstoke, on the main land. This cable has the remarkable peculiarity of being uninsulated, and of having neither India rubber nor gutta percha in its composition.

SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS IN IOWA.—A proclamation for the sale, in November next, of 1,250,000 acres of public lands in the north-western part of the State of Iowa, has been issued by the President. These lands are in the Fort Dodge and Sioux city district, and embrace some of the best agricultural lands in the State, upon the head waters of the Des Moines river.

POPULATION OF MOBILE.—The Mobile Tribune says: "Talking the other day to one of the census-takers of Mobile county, we came to the conclusion that the population of Mobile city will be about 28,000; and that of the county about 40,000. The time at which this census was taken exhibits the very lowest point of our population.—Taken in January, we have no doubt the difference would be four or five thousand."

ABOLITION DOCUMENTS.—The Memphis Enquirer, of the 25th ult., says: "Incendiary documents, of the very worst Abolition sort, have been pretty generally circulated on our streets. These documents are generally dropped on the streets at night, to be picked up by persons passing in the morning. We are glad to hear that the guilty parties are closely watched, and it is hoped will be speedily brought to justice.

The Rev. Arthur Cleveland Coxe, D.D., now rector of Grace Church, Baltimore, and formerly rector of St. John's Church at Hartford, has been unanimously elected President of Trinity College, in the latter city, vice the Rev. Dr. Goodwin, resigned. The new President has long been known as a poet and churchman.

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH.—Bishop Otey, of Tennessee, gives notice in the Nashville papers that the corner-stone of the principal building of the University of the South, will be laid, with appropriate ceremonies, at University Place, Franklin county, Tenn., on the 10th of October next.

The two books of Michelet, "La Femme" and "L'Amour," which met with so large a sale in this country, are considered too broad and free for the French people.—M. Marie Haus has written a "Refutation of the Propositions of Michelet," wherein he handles pretty severely the two works alluded to.

THE GREAT EASTERN.—The total number of persons who visited the Great Eastern during her stay in New York was about 159,000. The visitors at Annapolis numbered not far from 20,000—a total of 179,000, which at 50 cents a head would make her receipts for sight-seers $89,000.

THE SYRIAN EXPEDITION.—The Turkish Ambassador in Paris signed on the 5th inst. all the protocols which empower France to send an expedition to Syria. France has sent 6000 troops. They embarked on the 5th inst., at Marseilles.

The U. S. steam frigate Powhattan arrived at Philadelphia on the 14th ult., after a cruise of two years and eight months in the Chinese and Japan seas. The officers and crew were in the best health.

The Hon. Willie P. Maagum, of North Carolina, has partially recovered his physical powers, for some time impaired by paralysis, though he can neither speak nor walk with ease. His mind, however, is clear and calm.

LEONARD SCOTT & CO'S REPRINT OF THE BRITISH REVIEWS, AND BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE, by SCOTT & CO., New York, continue to publish the following leading British Periodicals, viz:—

1. THE LONDON QUARTERLY (Conservative).
2. THE EDINBURGH REVIEW (Whig).
3. THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW (Free Church).
4. THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW (Liberal).
5. BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE (Tory).

These Periodicals ably represent the three great political parties of Great Britain—Whig, Tory and Radical—but politics forms only one feature of their character. As organs of the most profound writers in Science, Literature, Morality, and Religion, they stand, as they ever have stood, unrivaled in the world of letters, being considered indispensable to the scholar and the professional man, while to the intelligent reader of every class, they furnish a more correct and satisfactory record of the current literature of the day, throughout the world, than can be possibly obtained from any other source.

EARLY COPIES.

The receipt of Advance Sheets from the British publishers gives additional value to these Reprints, inasmuch as they can now be placed in the hands of subscribers about as soon as the original editions.

POSTAGE.

In all the principal Cities and Towns, these works will be Delivered Free of Postage. When sent by mail, the Postage to any part of the United States will be but "Twenty four Cents" a year for Blackwood, and but "fourteen cents" a year for each of the Reviews.

TERMS.—For one of the four Reviews, $1; for any two of the four Reviews, $5, for any three of the four Reviews, $7; for all four of the Reviews, $8; for Blackwood's Magazine, $4; for Blackwood and one Review, $5; for Blackwood and two Reviews $7; for Blackwood and three Reviews $9; for Blackwood and the four Reviews, $10.

DUPLICATE REPRINTS versus EXACTNESS, &c.

As we have for many years been paying more than $1,000 annually to the British Publishers for the matter furnished in these Periodicals, thus virtually becoming co-partners with them in the profits of the Reprints, we trust the public will consider this in bestowing their patronage, and give us the preference over Electric and other patch work publications, whether monthly or weekly, which now extract so liberally from our works and pay nothing either to the Foreign Publisher or to us for the same. As to cheapness, no one can complain of paying $10 a year for the four leading British Reviews and Blackwood's Magazine, and by taking these works entire subscribers are not obliged to be guided by others in the choice of the articles they may desire to read. Moreover, taking into consideration the style in which our Reprints are published, and their acknowledged fidelity to the original editions, and also the advantage of an early issue by means of the advance Sheets—our series will be found to challenge any of the competing publications to which we have alluded.

ANNUAL REVIEW —OF THE—
NEW ORLEANS MONEY MARKET,
—AND OF—
COMMERCIAL AND FINANCIAL EVENTS,
From September 1, '59, to August 31, 1860.

ADVOCATE OFFICE, September 5, 1860.

The twelve months ending the 31st August, 1860, was attended with great prosperity to the great Southwest. A large growth of cotton for the year 1858 was received, and sold for highly remunerative prices. Our own State rejoiced in profitable returns for its great staple, sugar. Our city was free from pestilence. The war between two of the three great Powers, which, it was believed, might operate to the disadvantage of our country's commerce, was brought to a close. Our financial institutions were in the strongest position, and were continued to be managed with characteristic ability and uprightness which have for years distinguished them, under our admirable system of banking. Our city continued to increase in population and extent, both without limit, and known to the foreign financial and commercial world as the highest of the high; with cheering indications of another immense yield in the controlling element of the globe of the world and with prospects of a good return in our local staple sugar. Under these auspicious prospects we commenced the commercial year now under review

But chequered results have followed. An early and severe frost last season severely injured the great product of our State, reducing the yield one third from the estimates; and though the reduced yield was followed by enhanced prices, nevertheless the deficiency was sufficient to have an important bearing on the market through the season.

Following the exuberant returns of the cotton crop of 1858-'59, it was anticipated that much of the indebtedness at the country directly connected with our city would have been cancelled. True, a yearly increase in commerce and agriculture requires additional resources and credit; yet it is manifest that the increase in lands and negroes has been too rapid, and not warranted by the condition of the country. In isolated sections of the cotton and sugar regions there are exceptions. These exceptions are, however, so restricted that the agricultural community will have to be charged for yielding and paying prices nearly all have to be charged for yielding and paying prices for negroes and lands which cannot, it is believed, be productive of even the legal interest of our State, at the scale of prices which have governed the great staple for the season now terminating.

It is useless to attempt to disguise the fact that we cannot look to appeal to the future with fond hopes or cheerful feelings. As the political aspect or condition of our country is far from being of that nature which will warrant a confidence of universal prosperity and good feeling from Maine on the East and North, and Texas on the West and South. It is difficult to bring our minds to believe that the peace, welfare, or the greatness of this nation will be exhanguted. Portentous clouds hang over the political horizon. We can only hope they may be speedily dispelled. True, the great South round subsist by itself; but Kind Providence has not vouchsafed that this season, if we are to credit the returns of the grain crops throughout the South-western States, that we can or shall be independent. What results or what effects a division of this confederacy of States would have on five hundred millions of dollars value in the Northern States which centers in the great metropolis, New York, can be imagined. Political disturbances and emeutes are in this age of progress so blended and intimately connected with finance that it is difficult to review one branch without embracing or alluding to the entire position of affairs and measures—the social, commercial and political compact.

With the events attending the past twelve months, the most important to the commerce of the civilized world has been another large yield of cotton, as will appear by the annual statement made up to this date. It will exhibit a very large increase over the great years of 1855 and 1858. Yet, with the very good prices obtained, the liabilities and obligations of the country connected with our city have increased, and are not, in all probability, destined to be much curtailed out of the crop which is now coming to market. Although we do not regard the present disturbed state of Southern Europe as likely to have any direct and adverse influence on the trade and business of our city the coming season, yet the course of events on the European Continent, the bold stand and assumptions of the Ruler of France, prevents us from looking to the future without misgivings and serious doubts. The war in China will not, of course, affect us directly. There may be an interruption in the demand and trade in manufactured cotton goods, which will directly bear on the Lancashire spinners and traders in cotton.

Although we can point to our cotton bales as the basis of a great and mighty trade, increasing, as it will, in every good season, we are sadly lacking and deficient in the way of direct communication with our largest customers, we will not call them our best ones, because they would not purchase our cotton if they were not compelled to,) England and France. We have not to-day a direct line of steamers to run direct between this port and that of Liverpool. The proposals fell harmless, though one-half of the amount of capital required was tendered by merchants in Liverpool and capitalists in London. Whether the project will be carried through, depends in a great measure on the action of our commercial community. One-quarter—yea, one-eighth—of the money disbursed by our citizens this very summer through the North, supporting people who are so very inimical to the South, would have built and equipped lines of steamers for Liverpool, Havre and Bremen. We do not despair yet of direct communication by steam with the European continent. It has everything to recommend it—nothing averse to it, only the indifference and want of support on the part of our leading merchants and citizens. Whether the vast coast trade in the transportation and freighting of cotton be under the influence of Northern ship-owners, is a subject worthy of consideration, not only by every merchant, every planter, all raisers of cotton, but our corporate associations and bodies, our insurance companies' and banks, as well as the body politic denominated the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans.

There appears to be very little desire, very little activity, still less spirit, we regret to say, on the part of our community to organize associations for the promotion of commerce and manufactures—to conduct the gigantic trade of our city—to give security to commerce, industry and agriculture. We have in our community fully protective capital, associated fire insurance companies, to the amount of ten millions, and a half millions of dollars to protect an inward stationary trade, and outward commerce amounting fully to three hundred and fifty millions of dollars.

We can pass over the impediments and obstructions at the mouth of the river Mississippi, at the bars at Pass l'Outre and Southwest Pass, with only a few remarks. As usual, in the spring of the year, or following of the annual rise in the river, the channel at the mouth of the Mississippi becomes obstructed, but not to the extent of the months of January, February and March, 1859. The detention to the most burdensome and heaviest draft of water vessels was only of a short duration. Name forming the obstructions, nature, in its course, removed them, and the shipping community went on their way rejoicing, as it was.

We are still lacking and wanting in the essential elements in order on an emporium real, actual, independent. The absence of associations for manufacturing purposes has been often complained on. with all the appliances of water, with forests of timber unbounded, with iron mines of extraordinary capabilities for supplies within thirty-six hours' travel, with daily commerce with miles of coast also unbounded, vessels are built in distant States, steamboats are year after year furnished for our lakes and inward commerce, by the transmitting of hundreds of thousands of dollars to the West. Steamers employed in the great coasting trade of the South are yearly sent to Northern ports for repairs. Sugars, in the raw state are every season shipped to distant places, refined and brought back to us with large profits accruing to those industrious friends of Northern enterprise. There are, to be sure, licensed in our midst some foundries, boiler manufactories and other mechanical pursuits represented by humble establishments, but not on a scale to compare with those in other cities; yet there are no cotton manufactories, and steam-mills for flour, although two or three sugar refineries. The ship-building business or repairing of vessels is well represented by associations; yet with all the great forests affording the best timber in the world directly at our doors, all we can record as the result of our ship-yards for the last year are two or three steamboats for the towing trade, and the machinery of one of them was brought from the great Black Republican State of Massachusetts. We have waited some years for Southern independence, as it is termed; but we have not attained it as yet, nor shall we until our citizens remain at home, encourage home mechanics and artisans, form associations for manufacturing purposes, and retain the millions of dollars at home which are usually paid out to those who have no affinity, very little friendship, and less feeling for our welfare and prosperity.

We regret that, while reviewing the occurrences and course of trade for the past twelve months, we cannot congratulate our community, city and country, with the enlivening prospects and determination we did a year ago. A season most unprecedented in its effects, attended with drought of long duration—extenuating, in many sections, to months—with political agitations of a most serious nature, has caused alarm and fear. The effects of the drought will, of course, be most seriously experienced in some parts of our own State. Starvation stares the inhabitants in the face. Crops of cereals of every kind have been dried, and stock and stock-raising have felt the effects. In fact, the rich and productive State of Louisiana is, in several parishes, likely to feel the effects of a famine. We can only hope for the best, and that evils may be averted.

While we congratulate our commercial and financial community on the favorable results of the year's business closing this day, yet the future does not appear as harmonious as could be desired. We commenced the commercial years of 1859-'60, under the "effects" of a large yield of cotton, reaching the high figure of 3,851,000 bales as the production of the United States for the year of 1859. Admitting that there was a deficiency in the sugar crop, the difference in returns or the deficiency was more than made up in the aggregate by the excessive yield of our other product, which has produced an excess of over 165,000 bales to us alone, equivalent to $22,000,000 enhancement to the resources of our commercial, financial and social rottpact, but the prospect for speedy release from the grasping hands of creditors is remote.

On the last Saturday of September last we indited for our daily mutcrary article the following:

The improvements in the general market for the week ending this evening have not been in the extent anticipated from the large receipts of cotton and Western products, with the great additions to the stocks of general merchandise, and the very healthy condition of the city and country immediately connected.

The sales of cotton for the week have been 27,931 bales, against 30,000 bales for the corresponding week last year. The demand for the staple is fair, but it does not appear to be taken up with the facility that the position of some of the foreign markets generally manifested this moment under the large increase of consumption. A majority of the leading dealers for the English market are, however, absent. Several of them happen to be interested in the working off of the season's purchases, so that they cannot be expected in market before November.

Trade in the wholesale branches of dry goods, groceries, hardware and clothing has not opened. In some branches there is a falling off in sales and orders from last season. With North-west Louisiana and the Ouachita section of country we need not look for any demand or any trade until the resumption of navigation, which appears to be rather remote in this moment.

The opinion seems general that more country merchants have visited New York and other Northern cities for purchasing merchandise than in any former season. This is believed to be so. We are informed that in New York particularly, merchandise could be seen hour after hour marked for almost every town and village in the Southwest. In some sections of the country closely connected with this city, as identified with New Orleans, planters, and planters will largely look at a stock of goods known to be purchased to hold in altogether too early. Another important feature in trade is that returns of credit are more than usually prompt. Cash and even in Baltimore, than in this city, many of our jobbers and wholesale traders requiring city paper for their sales, and the same obtains and increased when the cotton trade is active. New York and Boston all buy cheapest for double inland paper or on their own notes. Now withstanding the advantage the country merchant realizes going Northward, it is believed that the mass of our merchants sold as many goods last year to other cities as will get paid for. This would seem to lead to the conclusion that the facilities of trading in our city are circumscribed, and that there are not sufficient stocks of merchandise to meet the consumptive demand

The following is the amount of assets and capital of the eleven Insurance Companies in New Orleans on the 31st August, 1859, taking the returns or statement of the fiscal year of each Company as the guide. Capital and assets, and cash on hand in August, 1859:

LETTER FROM CHINA.

SHANGHAI, May 29th, 1860.

MR. EDITOR:—From want of time I did not write by last mail, which was some two weeks since. I was then on the eve of a journey to some important cities not quite one hundred miles from Shanghai, for the purpose of preaching to them Jesus and Him crucified. I have just returned,—and for your better understanding the mode by which the gospel is carried to these benighted heathen in distant cities, I will give you in full an account of the journey. On the 16th of this month, (May) I hired a Chinese boat, worked by five men, paying them not quite one dollar per day, to take me wherever I wished to go, and traveling until nine or ten o'clock at night; this, however, they do sometimes, not because I desire it, but they wish themselves to seek a place of security from the thieves and robbers which infest this land, where Satan's stronghold has been so long established. The boat is about thirty feet in length, and is partitioned off into three rooms. The room upon the bow is about six feet by five, and is generally used for the native teacher who goes with the missionary. The middle room is a little larger, measuring seven by eight, in which one is just able to stand erect. There the missionary sleeps, eats and studies. There is a little table, something over a foot in width and two in length; and one or two small windows on each side of the room made of thin pieces of oyster-shell, or, as the the Chinese call them, the "transparent tile." It admits of light, but one is unable to see distinctly through it. This difficulty has been remedied by putting in the center of these windows a small piece of foreign glass, a few inches in width and length. The third room is about two feet in width and six in length. There the cook finds a resting place. The boatmen all sleep on the stern of the boat in the open air, and have only curtains on each side from which to protect them from the inclemency of the weather and night air. When the boat was called on Wednesday, I put aboard a lot of books, consisting of the New Testament, Genesis, a very good and useful tract called, "The Two Friends,"—a dialogue between two persons on the subject of Christianity; a tract called "Come to Jesus;" I had also the gospel of James, in the Shanghai colloquial, and some other tracts on religious subjects. I got ready my bed and a few changes of raiment, and prepared for an early start the next morning. Thursday morning came, and a beautiful and pleasant one it was. Two English Methodist missionaries, who have just reached Shanghai, joined me. About nine in the morning we left Shanghai and started up the Wampoo river, but we had not gone far before we turned to the right in a small canal which leads into the interior, direct to the Foo city of Sung Kong. In two hours from Shanghai we were opposite the Roman Catholic church, four miles from the city. It is a large and spacious building, fitted up in Roman Catholic style. We went in a few minutes to see the workings of Romanism in China. On entering we were invited by the Chinese door-Keeper to take a seat in one of the reception rooms until the priest could be sent for. I thanked him and said that we had but a few minutes to spare. However, we went in and saw that the room was evidently prepared for Chinese visitors. Everything was in rather a confused state, and reminded one of Chinese notions of order. They are not a people for order or taste in the arrangement of furniture. There was in the room a dusty cross, with the image of our Savior, a few Chinese ornaments, and also a confused mass of chairs and tables. Soon one of the priests made his appearance and accosted us in French; not being able to speak French, I addressed him in Chinese. He was not able to speak English and so little Chinese did he speak, that often he was unable to understand, and was evidently much troubled. He led us in and through quite a labyrinth, to the rear of the cathedral, not desiring us, as I suppose, to go into the main building, knowing our views in reference to their religious belief. He was very kind and polite, and showed us the different schools under their supervision. They were divided off into four rooms. The first was a class of young men, all busily engaged in committing to memory their Chinese classics, having an image of the Virgin Mary in front of them. Some were so interested in their lesson that they scarcely took any notice of us. Some with countenances seemed to be repeating what he had learned. In the other rooms the scholars were smaller, but all had an image of the Virgin Mary before them. We saw images in almost every direction, and our hearts yearned to tell them of a better way. Surely, "they have the form of godliness, but deny the power thereof." The priest who had introduced us to these scenes of idolatry had been in China but a short time. He said there were four priests there in the cathedral, and eighty-four boys in the school, who were being prepared for the office of native priests. Such worship pleases the Chinese very much, and reminds them of their own Buddhist chants and ringing of bells. On returning, the priest who had been round with us stepped into a room and called one who could speak Chinese well, and we had some few minutes conversation with each other in a language foreign to our own tongue. He was very pleasant and polite, which is the general characteristic of all Romish priests. Theirs is a religion of winning ways and manners. We did not go into the main building, nor into the shops, where they have craftsmen of every description, employed in making a savior, or a saint, or the Virgin Mary, according to order or to their liking. O how much I wished to tell them of Jesus, as I felt him to be a precious Savior, and one altogether lovely! But no, I must recollect I am on Romish ground and they would not hear, "having their consciences seared with a hot iron." I was grieved to see so much idolatry among those who profess to know the Lord and obey his holy law. They abolish and make laws to suit their own views and desires. The reading of the first and second commandment is changed. The third is blotted out.—The fourth is so altered as to suit the poor, in order to give them a half day's work on the Sabbath. The tenth commandment is divided into two, to take the place of the third. We took our departure after looking around at this splendid and costly building, filled with its images as lifeless as those of Buddhist temples, and we mourn that our fellow man should be thus deluded and "taken captive by the devil at his will." The ground upon which the building stands was given to the Roman Catholics, some two hundred years ago, by a Chinese convert to their belief, and the place still holds his name. Our boat, in the meantime, had gone some distance ahead of us. We walked on through the fields, which in China are left quite exposed without any fence, in the narrow pathway which leads from village to village. Occasionally we stopped to talk with the countrymen as they were busily engaged in preparing their land for the rice crop. The land is well watered and moistened by the process of irrigation, and is thus kept under water for some weeks before the rice taken from another spot of land where it has been allowed to grow, and is transplanted in this. It is then but a few inches in height. We passed the Pagoda to our left. It is seven stories high, and was built about fifteen hundred years since by the mother of one of the Emperors of China. At that time there were three Emperors in China and they were continually waging war against each other. The mother's object in building this Pagoda was to implore for her son long life and a prosperous reign. It is called the "Flowery Dragon Pagoda." The natives have a legend among them, that on the fifteenth day of the eighth month all the pagodas in China, or of this province, come to make their obeisance to this one. After we had walked about four miles we came to a small village, where we were saluted by the term, "thief! thief!" from almost every boy. We paid no attention to it, but passed on, though on telling my English brethren what they said, they were not a little amused and surprised at their boldness and impertinence. In China we must turn a deaf ear to these opprobrious and insulting epithets.—About four o'clock we passed a large village called St. King-nam, having perhaps forty thousand inhabitants. Here we saw a small Roman Catholic church which has just been erected. We passed immediately through, hoping to get to Sung Kong by night. The people rushed to the doors of their houses, and to the sides of the canal, and on the bridges to see us pass, calling us all the while "barbarians." I believe the Chinese will never weary looking at a foreign barbarian. The women came jumping along on their small feet, as though they were on stilts, and frequently excite us to laughter, though they need our pity. After we passed the village we fell in company with a small boat having three or four persons aboard. One was an old man, and seeing us on the bow of our boat, he began to expose his cross and beads to view. When I discovered them I immediately entered into conversation with him about the worship of God in spirit and in truth. I tried to prove to him the fallacy of trusting to a brazen image for salvation, or attaching any merit to the counting of beads. He acknowledged the truth of what was said, but excused himself by saying he had been thus taught to worship God. He frequently spoke of the Virgin Mary. I gave him a New Testament and requested him to read it. He thanked me much, and said he was coming to Shanghai and would visit me. May God bless his Word, and cause it through the blessed influence of the Holy Spirit to give light and knowledge to the darkened understandings of this heathen and sin-loving people, is my heart's desire and prayer.

We arrived at Sung Kong Foo about nine o'clock at night, and anchored just under the wall, on the outside of the city, near the east gate. This is where Mr. Ze, the native teacher who is with us, lives. The city gates were closed, but for a few cash given to the gate-keeper he succeeded in entering the city, and was soon with his own family near the south gate.

On Friday morning, after our morning devotions and breakfast, we armed ourselves with a number of Testaments, tracts, etc., and entered the city at the east gate. We had not proceeded far before the soldiers discovered us, and not wishing us to enter so easily without acknowledging their authority by giving them a few cash for the privilege of entering the city, they immediately accosted the teacher and wished him to return with these foreigners. They insisted upon our returning by the east gate, as the Mandarins had forbid foreigners coming to the city. This was all false, and only a pretext of their own to obtain from the teacher or from us, if possible, a few copper cash. From the sallow appearance and gaunt figures of these "celestial guards," with the letter or character, "brave," marked quite conspicuously on their backs, we could see that opium was making rapid strides upon their constitutions. Their energy was now impaired, and needed the continual stimulus and narcotic effects of the opium to keep them in a state of excitement. We paid no attention to them, and walked on through different streets of the city. The streets here are much more cleanly and wider than in the city of Shanghai, though the city is not so thickly inhabited as Shanghai. Shanghai is under the jurisdiction of Sung Kong Foo, the city we are now in. This city has only something over one hundred thousand inhabitants, while Shanghai, a smaller city, has about three hundred thousand inhabitants. The ancient name of Shanghai is Woo-Toke-Lu, and was built by the Prime Minister of one of the dynasties of China, some two hundred years after the Christian era, and is situated immediately on the sea coast, to protect themselves against the pirates, which is the meaning of the above name. The present city of Shanghai is twenty miles from the coast and has been built only about eight hundred years. It signifies "on the sea." There are seven Mandarins in the city of Shanghai, not including military officers.

SHANGHAI, June 8th, 1860.

I continue my description of the trip into the country: Sung Kong Foo, the first city I visited after leaving Shanghai, has twelve officers of government, not including the military officers. This city had at one time eight cities under its jurisdiction, but one was swallowed up beneath the earth by some great convulsion, and is now covered with water. This inundated city is about forty miles from Shanghai, and still holds its name among the eight, though not a vestige of it is remaining. The Chinese look upon it as a judgment sent upon the city by Heaven for their wicked deeds. The ancient name of Sung-Kong-Foo was Yung Ke, founded more than two thousand years since, near the close of the Tsen dynasty. From this city, after it was founded, there was a continual warfare made against King Yen of the city of Kurshun, whose seat of government was in that city. It is about forty miles from Sung-Kung-Foo.

After we had passed entirely, not meeting many persons by the way, or seeing many neat shops, we passed out of the west gate. There we find the most populous part of Sung-Kong-Foo. The streets are crowded with the country people bringing in their produce for market, and the shops present a gay appearance. Frequently your attention is attracted by the reaching out of half a dozen hands from one shop, begging you to give them a book. Often one is troubled by some persevering fellow from behind pulling at your coat, or trying to impede your progress by knocking lightly at your elbow, until you give him a book; but if you still refuse to give, you are sure to receive some abuse for giving to one and not to him. Often some dirty boy, or ragged and beggarly looking man, are most persevering in their endeavors; it would be folly to give books to such, as they cannot read; therefore I always refuse to such.

We passed on into the large open side of the square the jugglers had arranged themselves for their audiences. It is quite amusing to see how they exert themselves to fix the attention of the crowd around them, as they see as approach, for they look upon us as their opponents in one sense of the word. Some had already began to amuse the crowd, but soon the largest crowd was around the foreigners, and I began to preach to them of sin.—They gathered around me in great crowds, and eagerly listened to the story of the fall of man and then of his redemption by the suffering and death of Christ the Son of God. I preached to them from the text, "Ye must be born again." All listened with the greatest attention, and many continued to give assent to what was said by a nod of the head, through the whole of my remarks. Many literary men came around, and one seemed to be a Mandarin, but he did not remain long, lest some should say he is listening to the doctrines of a foreigner. They fear the loss of their popularity, influence and power over the people. When I come to give away my books I was scarcely able to do so from the press of the crowd, and I am afraid some were not judiciously given away.

There was an old man in front of this temple last year with whom I had a warm discussion about opium. —We are often attacked on that subject and we have no other alternative but to defend ourselves before the people, and prove our innocency if possible. He said his son was killed by eating opium, and he tried to prove to the people that, though I tried to preach a good doctrine, yet it was but the cloak under which the opium was introduced and the minds of the people poisoned. In China the judge and jury is always present when you can get a crowd. However, the people took up for me, and said the old man had gone crazy about it. I do not wonder at such being the case. How many citizens of our own country would see their sons murdered by a foreign drug and never murmur? Opium is destroying the life-blood of China. The people see it and mourn over it, yet the evil has taken such deep root, that now it requires more than the moral force of China to eradicate it. Japan has escaped it thus far. She prohibits the article, except as medicine. Foreign merchants have used every endeavor to introduce it into that country, but without success. Money, money, is all they want, cost what it will!

At the temple in Sung-Kong-Foo we received no abuse, as formerly, at which I was somewhat surprised. I trust the people begin to see our errand is a good one, and that we are disposed to do them good. The pagoda at Sung Kong is nine stories high. It was originally intended to be thirteen stories, but they found the base was not sufficient to sustain the great weight above it. The temple near it is called the Western Grove. In the temple where I preached there is a small body of water, which tradition designates as one of the eyes of the seal. There is another temple in the city called the Universal Enlightener. Near the parade ground there is a temple the front door of which is called the "Southern Heaven," in which Mr. Ker, a celebrated moralist, worshiped and at the same time burned vermillion. The lake near by, according to tradition, became of live colors. This city is famous for two brothers who lived about nine hundred years since. They were both of high literary grade. All China know them by the name of "two deer in the clouds." There was also an excellent scribe, a native of this place, called Mr. Toung, who was, as the Chinese express it, of "world-wide fame." His house is still to be seen. In front of the door of the city temple there are several stone monuments carved by a Mr. Toung, a stone cutter, who carved a Marix upon one, and the people say of a summer night it can be heard making a noise.

We returned to our boats about ten o'clock, and proceeded on our way. We were soon in the Wang Poo again, and found the tide coming in rapidly. Where we entered, it was a wide and noble looking stream, but before we had gone far it began to branch off into quite a number of small canals. At four o'clock we were compelled to come to anchor, for the tide was against us. Here the canal was quite narrow. When we had safely anchored, I saw a village not quite a mile distant. I concluded to go and preach to them, and give them some books. I soon had a good congregation, for they came from every quarter to see and hear the foreigners or "barbarians." The main temple was filled to overflowing. I mounted a bench by the side of a cooper who was occupying the temple, and began to preach to the people. As many as could, listened attentively and seemed interested, especially some old men. Each one was eager to get a book, and even the little boys were exceedingly clamorous in their attempts to get books, so that it was with difficulty I could prevent them from being taken by force. There was a number of well-dressed, good-looking men among them. A great crowd followed us on our return through the village. They said no foreigner had ever been there before, and they all wanted to see the strange looking creatures from the ocean. "What a strange dress," some would say, and others, "They do not shave their heads and have no cues." Many followed us to the boat, and continued to gaze until darkness coming on, they were compelled to return to the village. We left our place of anchorage some time during the night, and reached the city of Ping-po about daylight. After having religious services and getting some breakfast, we got a number of books and religious tracts, and went into the city at the east gate, through immense crowds of dirty people, so filthy that I could scarcely feel that I had escaped safely through, as they have so many vermin about their bodies. Crowds of these dirty-looking people met us at every step. This is the most populous part of the city. We passed through the crowded street to the main temple, where missionaries have preached hundreds of times. There I preached from Matt. iii, 12, to a large crowd of exceedingly noisy people. There were some street gamblers who kept up an incessant noise behind and before me. Some listened attentively, but were evidently amused at the words of the text, as though they thought I was preaching to the wrong people. I fear what was said was only heard by few to profit. The word of God has often been preached here by faithful missionaries, and I pray God we may yet see the abundant fruit of it.

From this temple we went to another, and there I preached to a more quiet and peaceable crowd the words of eternal life. The whole house was filled with idols, some twenty and some thirty feet in height, and all having different names. The Chinese are at a loss sometimes to know which one it would be best to worship, and lest they should increase the displeasure of one, and lose the virtue of another, they bow to all. O, that this people had only the desire to receive instruction; but their minds seem filled with gross darkness, and their hearts with all filthiness. There were but few good looking men among them, and all seemed poorly dressed. As we came out of the city, we met many beggars, some of whom had live serpents twined around their bodies, and in this way go from house to house, and get a bare subsistence. Before we left Ping-od, we ascended the pagoda outside of the city. It was a beautiful scene all around; but what a sad thought it is to us, that hundreds and thousands in these are still without the knowledge of Him who created them and still preserves them. Such thoughts as these cause us to mourn for this great people in bondage yet to the power of darkness. Every thing in and out of the city seems to be going to destruction. Nothing seems in a state of repair. The people lived as though ready at any day to abandon their houses. The temples around this pagoda are entirely deserted by the priests, for I saw no one but a few beggars, and they seemed to be enduring the last pangs of a miserable life. One young man seemed dying, and his mother was watching by his side. They seemed to be much distressed. He was lying on the ground without even a bit of straw under him. We could not then do more than give them a few cash. Some of the idols at the door of these temples had suffered the loss of their eyes, some the nose, others their hands, and one, strange to say, had lost his head.—And yet the people will come and worship these unsightly images. But we trust that day is soon to pass, never to return in China. They now have but little regard for them, but because it is and has been the custom, they make these prostrations before them. There is a fort at the foot of this pagoda, which commands the canal, but is now abandoned to destruction, as all other public works are in China. To travel about in China, and see the old houses and dilapidated city walls, we immediately associate them with the age of the flood. The Chinese themselves look antiquated, and the present government is like an old ship tossed by wind and waves; it leaks, and is just about to be broken to pieces on the rocks.

We passed on in the direction of Hay-E, a walled city on the sea-shore. We saw numerous temples on the banks of the canal, into one of which we entered, and found it to be a nunnery. Incense was then burning before the idol; while all the nuns were seated near the door, discussing the merits of a piece of work they were doing, leaving the idol to enjoy the incense with their good wishes. I commenced conversation with them, and tried to prove the idol blind, dumb and deaf, but the Abbess spoke in a very angry tone, and said he could see, hear and talk; and that he was a real Buddha. I asked her to have him talk a little, and I would believe it.—She said he could do everything else but talk, and came away about Buddha. We went out almost immediately, and saw her urging some countrymen to come down to the temple, perhaps for some evil purpose. We passed on, and were soon at the city of Hay-E. It was then after night on Saturday. We anchored in a stone's throw of the sea, and soon we were enjoying the pleasant and healthy sea breeze. O, how refreshing it was after remaining a whole year in the unhealthy place of Shanghai. Here we will spend the Sabbath, and in my next I will give you a description of the place, and how the people receive the gospel.

J. W. LAMBETH.

EUROPEAN CORRESPONDENCE.

LONDON, Aug. 12, 1860.

MR. EDITOR—We have spent another week in this vast metropolis, and while we have seen much that is deeply interesting, and some things to excite our admiration and wonder, it has been a week of hard toil, leaving both the body and the mind in a state of languor and weariness, such as we have seldom experienced while engaged in the active duties of life. "London," says the Registrar General, "now covers 121 square miles—a square of 11 miles to the side." It is equal to three Londons of 1800. It increases at the rate of about 1000 per week, half by births, (their excess over deaths), and half by immigration (its excess over emigration). It is remarkable that in London, one in six of those who leave the world dies in one of the public institutions—a workhouse, hospital, asylum, or prison. Nearly one in eleven of the deaths are in a workhouse." Such is the fascination of city life, that notwithstanding the immense competition in every branch of business, and the appalling amount of poverty, destitution, crime and misery known to exist, the people contrive to pour in from every part of the civilized world, and it is very difficult to prevail upon the struggling classes, or even the perishing poor, to leave it. Even those who know of brighter climes and far happier conditions of humanity, sometimes say with Dr. Bonar,

"Despite your earnest pity,
Despite its smoke and din,
I cling to you crowded city,
Though I shrink from its woe and sin."

Yesterday was the holy Sabbath, and soon after breakfast Dr. Drews, of the North Carolina Conference, called on us, and we accompanied him to the Surrey Chapel, Blackfriars' Road, formerly occupied by the celebrated Rowland Hill, and now by Newman Hall, LL.B., one of the most distinguished ministers in London. We found, as is often the case in the churches occupied by eminent men, that the doors were locked and a quantity of people waiting outside. A minister was standing on a bench in the Chapel yard, and preaching to the people in the street. We soon ascertained that Mr. Hall had gone to the continent, as many of the most eloquent ministers of London had, and not knowing who was to fill his place, we determined to go to Westminster Abbey. On our way we had to pass through a wide, long street on the Southwark side, the name of which I have forgotten, in which a scene was presented of fearful wickedness, and through which it was with some difficulty we could make our way. It was about half past 10 o'clock, and the bells from many steeples were sweetly pealing, and inviting the people to the houses of God; but hundreds of shops were open, in which every kind of merchandize was exposed for sale, while men and women stood at the doors inviting the multitude to come and buy. On each side of the street were stalls containing food, raiment, toys, confectionaries, books, newspapers, tobacco, &c., &c. Even the Daguereotype galleries were open, and men were standing at the doors exhibiting specimens of their art at a shilling each. Ragged men, women, boys, and girls, some of them disgustingly filthy, and beastly in their appearance, were passing to and fro, and poor emaciated male and female pedlers, if you glanced at them for a moment, besought you to buy their wares. "And this, said I, in my heart, is the metropolis of Protestant Christendom, beyond the middle of the nineteenth century! O Lord God Almighty, how long shall iniquity abound? When shall we see the fulfillment of the promise that the world shall be redeemed and filled with the glory of God?" As we hastened on, not without fears of meeting with some disaster, we noticed one of the missionaries, of whom nearly 100 are employed by the London City Missionary Society, preaching in the middle of one of the streets crossing this thoroughfare, with about a dozen people gathered around, to whom, with the New Testament in his hand, he was expatiating on the great advantage to be derived from a knowledge of the Word of God. After crossing Westminster Bridge, (now undergoing repairs and alterations) and passing by the new Houses of Parliament, it was with no ordinary feeling that we entered Westminster Abbey, that national masterpiece of architecture, exhibiting in some of its parts the very purest and most perfect Gothic style. Entering at the Poets' corner, and gazing with admiration upon the monuments of England's greatest poets, philosophers, and divines, we felt that we were on classic as well as on holy ground. We were glad to find that this venerable temple was filled with worshippers to a greater extent than seats were provided for them, and that many who were seated too far off to hear distinctly the words of the solemn service maintained a devotional appearance. But in the midst of such a multitude of monuments in marble that seemed almost to speak to us, it was not an easy task to keep the mind from being occupied with reminiscences of the past. While the tones of the minister who read the liturgy, and some of the ceremonies savored too much of Popery for our Protestant taste, the chanting of the sweet-voiced choristers, and the solemn notes of the organ reverberating through the lofty arches and aisles of the grand old Cathedral, were calculated to soothe the soul, to cause it to forget for a while the sins and miseries of earth, and to rise to the sublime and holy contemplation of another and a better state of existence. And when that great congregation rose to their feet, and joined together in a hymn of praise, it seemed as though many of the worthies who had slept in Jesus, such as Milton, Newton, Watts, Wilberforce, Handel, Addison, and a host of others, whose honored forms in living marble stood around us, joined with us in our devotions, and we were led to indulge the hope that we should meet them in the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

An excellent discourse was read by Dr. Wordsworth, one of the prebendaries of the Cathedral, on Christ weeping over Jerusalem. Although it was with great difficulty that I could hear, I managed to bring away the substance of this beautiful discourse. My wife and Dr. Deems, who were a little farther from the preacher, could not hear a word. It seems marvellous to me that in such places as these men should be employed to preach the word of God who cannot make themselves heard. If Spurgeon, or our own Dr. Wm. A. Smith had been in the pulpit, though the Cathedral is not well adapted for preaching purposes, all that were there that day would have heard the glorious Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; but as it was, hundreds had to get all their preaching either from the cathedral, its music, or its monuments. If it be true, as it has been asserted, that "there are sermons in stones," it is eminently true in Westminster Abbey, and all that congregation might have received good on that day.

It was more than a Sabbath day's journey from the Abbey to "Providence House," in Falcon-street, the place of our temporary abode, and we scarcely had time to dine before we started again to seek a place of worship, and having had to shelter some time from a heavy rain, and finding that St. Paul's was not open, we took a walk up Cheapside, and entered the first Church that we found open. This was St. Mary le Bow, or Bow Church, which is mostly hidden from the view of persons in the street by shops; it has one of Wren's most beautiful steeples, and the finest and most celebrated bells in London. "For divers accidents," says Stowe, "happening there, this Church has been made more famous than any other parish church of the whole city or suburbs." It dates from soon after the Norman conquest, but was consumed in the great fire of London, and rebuilt by Wren. "The term Cockney, (native of Cocaigne, or the land of Gastronomy) a name anciently earned by the city of London, is supposed to apply only to those born within the sound of Bow Bell." Here we found the first small congregation that we have seen in London, a bad reader of the Liturgy, and a preacher below mediocrity; but the singing and the responses by the children of the Sabbath school were good, and there was a blessing in the service. At night we went to an Independent Chapel to hear Mr. Binney, one of the most distinguished ministers of that denomination, from whom we heard an excellent discourse on the subject of "Christian Fellowship," and an application of it to the duty of giving relief to the poor. It was eminently scriptural in sentiment and in style, appealing to intelligent Christians to give relief according to their means to all who had any claim upon their charities. The parts of it loud enough to be heard. At the close, he made a calm appeal to his congregation for donations to aid the suffering Christians of Damascus and Syria, concerning whom much has recently been published in the London papers. It will not do, said he, to read in the Times the terrible accounts of the sufferings of the widows and orphans of the Christians who have been murdered by their persecutors, and then lay down the paper and do nothing for them. It may be said, he farther observed, that they are poor representatives of Christianity, but we must bear in mind that it is as Christians that they have been cruelly persecuted, and it seems to be right that we who live in this noble land, and who enjoy such great commercial prosperity, should afford them some aid. A plate collection was taken up at the door, as the congregation passed out, the amount of which I have not been able to learn.

JOHN BAYLEY.

FATHER HAYNE.

FOR years ago, I took my first ride over the beautiful hills of wood and prairie that make this the most tastefully picturesque landscape of all the Empire State of Texas. Passing into the Postoak woods, that stretch down to the Colorado, I heard the deep voice of hounds in the chase; and with the revival of a memory near twenty years buried, my heart beat quick to follow the lead of deepening bays of the pack. Nearer and nearer they seemed to come; and I halted, unconsciously, to listen and watch. A crackling in the near thicket caught my ear; and I turned my head just in time to see a noble buck bound into the road, sniff the air round him, toss back his antlers, and leap off at his leisure. The dogs were nearing, but still some distance back, when I heard a clattering of hoofs over the pebbled knolls of the wood; and close by me dashed the hunter, on his sturdy Roan, leaning forward in his stirrup, plying the spur, gun poised in his right hand. The broad white brim might have belonged to an Itinerant, but it was rolled up, and badly slouched. But the keen outline of that profile will never fade from my memory: a curved nose, a sharp chin, compressed lips, and eyes that pierced away through the thickets, already glancing into the stag ahead of him.—The few dark locks that streamed from beneath the flapping brim were slightly frosted, but would hardly tell of three score years and ten. His contour told of many years and service; but his eyes and his face proclaimed the purpose and the energy of middle years.—All this was but a moment; yet the pencil of Thorpe, in his most gifted moment, never produced a more striking hunter outline. It seemed strange he did not pursue the direction his game had gone; though he must have caught a glimpse, as he crossed the road.

The dogs followed in another moment; and without being discovered myself, I started on my way, wrapt in admiration, reflecting how much may be printed on the tableau of the mind in an instant of time, when, right in the direction the hunter had darted, two shots in quick succession made the woods resound again.

A blast of the horn, and a double clamor of the hounds, told the end of the chase and of the story.

I returned from my ride, after two or three hours, to the new home beneath the live oaks, with some hatter and eggs to help to start the domestic mill. I told my wife and boy the incident just related.

She replied that a negro boy had just brought a piece of venison to the "new neighbors," with the compliments of "Father Hayne."

* * * * * * *

We approached the Camp-ground in the shades of evening.

When a mile from the wood-land temple, the voice of praise rose sweet and clear from the deep dell away beneath us. The fires from the altars round the camp were seen glimmering through the foliage; and a cloud rose from those altar-fires, and spread from hill to hill, above the valley, like the wing of a hovering angel, brooding over the thousand souls committed to her care. And the lights below were reflected from beneath the cloud, lighting up the plumage of the angel's wings with the rainbow tints of heaven.

Before we reached the ground, the trumpet had called the host from their evening hymns at the family tabernacles to the services before the general altar. A clear manly voice was summoning the scattered rambles that always skirt a forest congregation, inviting, pleading and begging, in shrill and penetrating tones, to come forward to the area of seats, and the sacred arena.

"Listen, young friends, to the voice of one who once was as thoughtless as you, and felt just as capable of living without a God; listen to the voice of one who was licensed near half a century since, by the sainted Asbury, to bid sinners to the altar, where God had stripped me of my pride, and lifted up my prostrate heart, and pardoned my sins. Listen to one who has passed his three score years and ten, and can no longer have a motive to mislead; who has enjoyed fifty years of the ecstacies of the religion of Christ; come near, that he may prove to you that, even while here on earth, you may live the joys of heaven!"

As he leaned over the stand, in the last strain of this earnest and eloquent invitation, and poured his whole soul through those living eyes, I caught the profile and energetic picture of the hunter of the Post-oaks, the clarion-voiced FATHER HAYNE.

* * * * * * *

A Sabbath morning sun poured its vernal radiance about the glorious hills and prairies and forests of Naterville; and the shadows fell beautifully along the slopes of Mars Hill and Mount Minerva. The Institute and the Barracks gleamed white and tasteful through the foliage. The youthful soldier had passed his morning inspection, and had been marched, in dignified propriety, to his seat in the college chapel. The carriages had one by one discharged their family loads at the gate, and they had passed in to listen to the service.—The beautiful and the young had passed over from the shrine of Minerva to attend, upon the war-god's hill, the service of the living God. The praise and the prayer were past; when a single buggy, drawn by a stalwart man, drove up to the gate, and for a moment commanded all eyes through the chapel windows. Two young cadets supported the palsied and emaciated form of an aged man, and bore him within the chapel, where, with his own seat and cushions and pillows, they placed him on the right of the eloquent speaker.

Behold this contrast! Here the youthful, strong and hopeful; the beautiful, delicate and spiritual; but there the aged, the wrecked, the prostrated! But look in that deep clear eye, as the speaker rises in his theme, saying, "but a few months since these feet themselves trod the holy grounds of Mount Calvary!" See the enthusiasm and exultation of the patriarch, as he exclaims, "Blessed privilege!"

Say where do hope and life just now burn brightest? Beneath those gentle lids, beside that nest of golden curls? In the heart that beats beneath that buttoned coat, and glows with manly expectation of future fame? Or in that shrivelled breast and tottering form, but brightly beaming eye, of the venerable FATHER HAYNE?

* * * * * * *

The Lord's Supper is spread, and the "elements," with solemn impressiveness, have been served, and the last words, "rise, brethren, go in peace!" are pronounced, when "Thanks be to God! for this my last supper on earth with Jesus!" came clear and emphatic from the lips of FATHER HAYNE.

* * * * * * *

For two long years, to wrestle with disease and decrepitude, upon the same head! The long, long, weary sleepless nights! The almost endless days, wearing and wasting, and yet bringing no relief! One ever present vigil was the aged partner, the angel of his household, for more than fifty years. God gives her strength for this unceasing demand; and feebleness itself takes on vigor, and revives the energies otherwise utterly perished. Like an angel of mercy, anticipating every imaginable want, and reading the expression of that still living eye, when the last muscle ceased to respond to the will, she could translate the thought at his heart, and minister to the want of the stricken.

* * * * * * *

A son, that for seven months has stood at his side, turns him for the hundredth time to-day. "No rest, no rest, my father!" The family have been watching for the end, for several days, and neighbors came on tip-toe, and whisper when they speak; for though speechless, he is conscious and cannot bear the slightest noise.—Startling at "the voice of a bird, the grass-hopper becomes a burden, and all the daughters of music are brought low."

See! a finger moves, and the dimming eye lights up from its deep, cavernous, death-like repose. The finger beckons, and mother and son read instanter the desire to speak. A struggle for utterance, but the tongue refuses its articulation, and the voice is lost in a sigh. But the wife, with angel-ken, detects the finger's meaning, [illegible] and blood [illegible] animates the skeleton hand; sinews move, and "John Hayne, born 1786. "God approve me, and all is right!" is traced in straggling letters on the sheet. The hand relaxes its grasp, and the sinews yield, never again to renew their power. The last line upon earth has been traced. Unconsciousness and partial slumber follow for a time.

* * * * * * *

Again, the head lifts up, and the eye breaks out from its leaden torpor, and beams with the coming light of heaven. Two angels have come; so speaks the radiance of that countenance. One by one, the family embrace him; and last of all the partner of his many years of manhood, as she bends for the last adieu, the tongue makes one more strenuous effort to speak, breaks the silver cord of life, "and breathes the soul out sweetly there." The smile of beatitude rests upon the face, but the spirit is gone with the angels.

* * * * * * *

The pall is settled, and Father Hayne is straightened for the grave. He is dressed as when he knelt at "the last supper." The marked outline of those elegant, manly features is expressive as in healthful life; and the smile of heavenly serenity that played upon his countenance, as his spirit took its flight, still rests upon the lip and brow, in the calm repose of an endless sleep.

* * Slowly winds the funeral train away from the humble cottage home of twenty years. The pattering rain falls gently on the scared earth. Tears fall thick and fast from many an eye of the four score and ten the noble old patriarch could have numbered of sons and daughters and descendants. Nature seemed to weep in harmony with the joy-touched grief of the bereaved. "Home again!" was the glad thought that came to the heart of all; not to dry the tears which affection yields for the departed; but to hallow the heart's sorrow with tears of joy, that the sainted patriarch has fallen asleep from his agonies, and has awoke in the ecstacies of heaven.

Slowly on, towards the city of the dead! Halt! who comes flying towards the escort of the hearse!—Halt! See a manly form embrace the tottering angel mother. Its head is bared, and he shows the strong lineaments we have just sealed up, we thought, forever. "I have traveled far and fast to see once more the face of my father. Mother, I must see it once more, though it never again can bless me!" Behold a man of fifty, weeping like a child, as we unseal the lid and bare the face, beside the grave! See the streaming tears from the multitude gathered there, as they crowd to catch a final glance—kindred and friend—of those features they so oft had seen lit up with domestic love, with patriot zeal in the dark days of the Republic, with christian energy and rapture at the ministerial altar.

* * * * * * *

The clods rumble down in the grave, and the sorrows of that frail and aged widow reach their utmost, and break out in sobs and cries at the words, "earth to earth, ashes to ashes, and dust to dust!"

"And I heard another angel say, write from henceforth, blessed are the dead that die in the Lord; for they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY.

MR. EDITOR: Our blessed Bible says, if not in so many words, yet in spirit, those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder. When God marries two parties, let no man put them asunder. You ask, what has this to do with the Southern University? My reply is, that there is no inherent or vital connection between the inviolability of the marital relation, and that institution of learning. I introduce this sentiment because I deem it appropriate to the position I assume, that the Christian religion and the whole process of education, from its infancy to its completion, have been united of God, and therefore no man should attempt to put them asunder. Indeed, what is there in this world with which God has not associated the religion of Jesus? The hair on your head is deemed a very small, unimportant thing, (albeit when subjected to microscopical examination it is shown to be a very wonderful thing,) yet trifling as the popular tongue would have it, Christ has assured us that the Great One stoops to number it; teaching, that what we do in life, from the enterprises of great nations/ sovereignties, down to the sweeping of your office, or the arrangement of your books in your library, is seen of God, and should be done religiously. God has married religion to everything, and if any one has the temerity to gainsay it, let him pause at the 17th verse of the 5th of Colossians, and read those words: "And whatsoever ye do, in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him." Now, the words italicised throw religion around and through all things, would have the Almighty recognized and worshiped in all things, from the colossal undertakings of nations, down to the insignificant matters of individual life. How godless the world is, aye, the Church, when viewed by the light of this doctrine, will appear at once. Our pursuits are atheistic. We have complimented the great God away from them, as a Being too lofty to notice the sparrow which falleth. Now, if we are to eat and drink, and do all to the glory of God; if religion by appointment of Heaven is to accompany the smallest things our hands had to do, surely no one will dare assume that the momentous work of education should be conducted independently of its guidance and control. Who so does not eat and drink to the glory of God, does not plainly recognize the great Giver of all good in these acts, is an atheist for the time being; he tears asunder that which God has put together, and if this be true in reference to such matters, how much more guilt is incurred by sundering the religion of the cross from the great work of mental discipline and culture? A Godless institution of learning is an insult to high Heaven, and a curse to any people; for if you educate wickedness, banishing the presence of religion, you but furnish Satan with weapons wherewith to carry out his work of demolition. "Knowledge," says one, "is not sufficient. It is, indeed, power; but if unsatisfied, power for evil. Knowledge did not teach Charlemagne to sacrifice his own desires to the happiness of any living creature. It neither made Augustus respect the life of Cicero, nor the pupil of Aristotle restrain his passions. Mirabeau, the genius of the French Revolution, was a monster of depravity; and Robespierre was also a man of education. Knowledge, when undirected by virtue, is made the servant of vice, and has in all ages produced the most fearful consequences." Who does not feel the force of the truth thus eloquently expressed? I therefore affirm it as my belief, that, to look for the conservators of good morals and social order from those atheizing establishments, Godless institutions of learning, is like expecting sweet water from a bitter fountain. You anticipate, then, I doubt not, the position I take. Panoplied with the great Bible truth enunciated in the preceding

LOUIS NAPOLEON, FRANCE, AND PROTESTANTISM.

We have watched with deep interest, not unmixed with anxiety, the remarkable career of Louis Napoleon.—Though often perplexed by the secrecy of his character, the mystery with which he enshrouds himself, and the indirection by which he moves toward the accomplishment of the most important results, we have always, in the end, found it difficult to condemn his policy, or even his judgment as to the means of its prosecution. He is a man of action and not of words. The forced silence of long years of exile, as to his views and principles, seems to have developed a natural secretiveness of character to a wonderful degree. He seems also to have concluded that action and not words was his particular forte. Not that he was not a master of words, but that words were the privilege of all—that they had taken the place of action for a quarter of a century—that nothing individually great could be accomplished by them—and that he had the genius and opportunity for action in an age which presented no rivals of his own sphere and order. His actions are the announcement of his principles. His achievements are their monuments. His voluminous diplomacy is as enigmatical as the Sybilline leaves or the Delphic oracle. Having the odium of despotism, he has wisely availed himself of its advantages, and has accomplished, while republicans and constitutionalists have discussed and disagreed.

Allied with England, he has had this advantage over her. This is the secret of his superiority over her in all their joint enterprises, and is also one cause of her clamorous and undignified jealousy. The other principal cause of her jealousy has the same inspiration—the fear that he will rival her on sea as well as on land, and stop her boast of superiority altogether. The fear of an invasion is a mere bug-bear of the English press to alarm the English people, and to make Napoleon unpopular. His superior sagacity is as manifest here as any where else. After the London Times, by years of unceasing fulmination against him,—which he did not dignify with a notice—had succeeded in rousing the English people to a pitch of vindictive anti-Napoleon patriotism, he quieted the storm by a single frank and friendly letter.

To judge of his foreign and domestic policy with fairness, we must consider that he is at the head of the French nation, and of the French Catholic Church. But to have an enlightened view of his character, we must remember that he has traveled, lived, studied and observed in the United States, and in almost every country in Europe. He knows the French and the Italians, and the Germans, and the Catholic Church, well; and he views them with American sagacity, and deals with them in the spirit of English character. Despot as he is called, he is this day the tower of strength to the democratic sentiments and aspirations of Europe. The present movements for the freedom of oppressed European nationalities would never have begun, and could not be maintained for a day without him. A monarch himself, he is the life of the doctrine, in Europe, that the source of Government is the will of the people. A professed Roman Catholic, yet, that he is a Papist at heart, as the Ultramontanists understand it, or even as we understand Romanism in this country, is not for a moment to be believed. The doctrine of the temporal power of the Pope he discards, and the fact of that temporal power is one of the greatest difficulties in his way. He has supported the Pope in his nominal position, while he has suffered the Italian people to take away the realities of that position. The Pope hates him, but dare not attempt to do without him.

He is often inconsistent with the principles he has espoused, or announced by his actions, but the difficulties of his relative position will not suffer him to be otherwise. Neither is Garibaldi consistent, for he was once a republican, and is now a constitutional monarchist. If Louis Napoleon continue as wise and moderate, and as much imbued with the enlightened and progressive principles of the age, in the future, as he has been heretofore, he will prove a blessing to Europe. As great a soldier as his uncle, without his overweening love of war, and without his military arrogance; a much greater and more enlightened statesman; he gradually seeks the harmonious co-operation of the great European Powers in the unity and nationality of Italy, in the downfall of the Popish despotism, in the unity and nationality of Germany, and in the settlement of the Eastern question according to the principles of Christian civilization. If, in the accomplishment of these results, he seeks a moderate augmentation of his own territory, is the world to fall out with him because of the jealous petulance of the London Times in not finding a powerful prince utterly without human ambition? His theory of natural boundaries, we think, is perfectly harmonious with his doctrine of nationalities.

Indeed there are but few of his acts, and but little of his policy, so far, that can be justly condemned, when the circumstances are understood; not even the coup d'état of the 2*nd* December, 1852, by which he became Emperor instead of President. The Empire is more suited to the French people than the Republic, any way; and, in reserve, the alternative presented to him was, the dissolution of the Empire, or the destruction of the Republic, as well as himself, by ambitious malcontents.

He suffers great odium, also, from his abridgement of the liberty of the press; but it is only the license which accompanies that liberty which he has curtailed; nor in France no government can stand against such license—His greatest need, of all others, is a press in the English language for the defence of his policy and the promulgation of his ideas. Indeed, the English language is what France needs to make her the greatest nation in Europe. The English language would more fully leaven and educate her character, and bring her into full sympathy with Anglo-Saxon Christendom. It is true that both for the defence of his policy, and for the enlightenment of French opinion, translations bring the Napoleonic pamphlets, and the productions of the American and English press, before the readers of both languages; but this is an indirect method and a comparatively feeble process. And then, Protestantism, with all its blessings, political, religious, mental, and social, has its seed and sap in the English language.

The French are not religious; Napoleon will not increase their love of popery; the downfall of the Pope may break them off from Rome altogether; but still they will not be converted to Protestantism—far from it. Our greatest hope for the French at present, in addition to the liberalizing influence of Napoleonism, is in the confirmation of full liberty of worship, and in the success of French Protestantism and its literature. And there is hope in this direction. A remarkable work has recently appeared in Paris—La Liberte Religieuse et la Legislation Actuelle. Taking for granted the fact, that the doctrine of liberty of conscience has been established, in France since 1789, and that nobody contradicts it, the writer's object is to inquire how far the laws of France, and their present administration, conform to the admitted theory. The discussion is thorough, both in clearness in the statement of principles, accuracy of historical citation, and bold deduction of consequences. In fact he criticises the government with a freedom which seems almost to contradict his own position; but, at the same time, he does it with a delicacy and point which none but a French writer could combine with so much directness. "The French government," he says, "is penetrated by so touching a solicitude for the well-being of the people, that it spares them the trouble of holding meetings, of concerting plans in common, even of petitioning—as people do where their time is not so valuable as in France—for instance, in idle England or lazy America!" The book is valuable, not only for its discussions, but also for its facts, as it gives, in full, the laws of France with regard to freedom of conscience from the time of Louis XIV. down to Napoleon III.

Dr. McClintock writes from Paris to the New York Methodist that "the intellect of France is essentially Protestant. Political considerations have kept up the power of the Roman priesthood for three centuries; but that power has never been in France what it is in Spain or Italy, and to day it is weaker than ever. A superficial observer, traveling through France, and seeing certain churches crowded, might suppose that Romish influence was growing; and the superficial reader of ultramontane journals believing their boasting and extravagant assertions, will receive the same impression. But the real powers that move France are literary and political. The wit and learning are not with the priests; on the contrary, the sharpest writing in the daily journals, and the shrewdest bon mots in the salons of Paris, are let off at the expense of the reverend fathers. The political exigencies of the time tend the same way." He says also that there never was a more favorable time for the organization and development of Protestant agencies of evangelization, both in France and Italy.

Of the French Protestant Churches, Dr. M. says that there is at present none more hopeful than the Wesleyan Methodist Church of France. Its last Conference was held at Nismes, June 20th to 28th, and its sessions were full of interest. The whole number of preachers is twenty-nine, of whom twenty are in full connection. One of the most important acts of the Conference was the decision to organize a school for the education of ministers. In the various departments of the work the Committee whose duty it is to see that the laws allowing liberty of worship are not violated, reported but one case as occurring during the year, in which the Wesleyan churches had been molested by a prefect. In that case, too, the interference was accidental and temporary. The Wesleyans of France are law abiding people, and the government seems to understand that they may be trusted. The schools under the patronage of the Conference are prospering. Three of these are at Nismes, and others are established at Paris, Calais, and in the department of the Alps. As a necessary means of consolidating and perpetuating Methodism, the Conference has for some years been endeavoring to secure titles to their church buildings and grounds, most of which, heretofore, have been taken only on leases. The Committee on Real Estate reported a growing tendency among the people to become owners in fee of all such property—a tendency which augurs well for their confidence in the stability of Methodism. A beautiful chapel had been erected at Caylar during the year, and the debt of the chapel at Calais had been reduced by $600, contributed in the same period. Colportage has been extensively used, in subordination to the pastoral work, especially in Paris and in Curalca.

There are other Protestant organizations in France, whose zeal and success have heretofore been noticed in the American papers. Upon the whole, we strongly incline to the belief that [illegible] France as a nation, having been viewed by our people through the medium of the English press, have never had justice done them. We believe likewise that France has never been properly appreciated as a mission field by American Protestants. It should be remembered that neither France nor Louis Napoleon have ever officiously intermeddled in the domestic politics of this country, as England has.

ABD-EL-KADER.

There are good men and heroes in every clime and of every creed. The greater number are never known, but whenever needed, they are brought by the providence of God to the notice and help of the world. Abd-el-Kader, known from his heroism in fighting the French in Algiers, is now figuring in Syria. In a letter to the Birgis Barys, of Paris, he says: "Glory to God!—I have been delighted by all that you have written in the Birgis on the subject of the Mussulman States. You have in truth given good advice, and you would be heard if you had spoken to the living, but it is to the dead that you have appealed. You have based your remarks on two points. You might have mentioned a third, and said that truly Mussulman sovereigns love the conduct of honest men and follow their footsteps in the ways of justice and contempt of worldly goods, for it is on high that little ones should look for an example.—Alas! we are far enough from doing so. The present state of the Mussulman and Christian empires, everything that is taking place to-day was predicted by Muhammed in his time, and that is what gives such authority to his prophecies. He has announced the annihilation of the Chosroes, and there are no more Chosroes; he has also said that the Christian Kings should maintain themselves in power till the end of time; and that the sovereigns of his people should be abandoned of God by reason of their injustice and love of the world's goods; lastly, he has said that the world shall not end till the Christians have become the majority of the human race. And that event cannot fail to arrive, because, as Islam, the authorised interpreter of Muhammed, has said, they have, above all, four qualities which ensure their future success—clemency in victory, obstinacy in defeat, energy in retaliation, and charity to the poor, the weak and the bereaved. I will add, of myself, that they join to these gifts one still greater—viz: skill in withdrawing themselves in case of necessity from the injustice and oppression of their kings. I weep, O my God, over the annihilation of Islamism. We are from God, and to Him we return. At this moment dreadful disorder prevails among the Maronites and the Druses. The evil has deep roots everywhere. Butchery and murder are going on in all parts. God grant that things may have a better ending." For fifteen years, from 1832 to 1847, he maintained the conflict in Algiers against the French, and by a courage and skill truly extraordinary, kept his enemy at bay. By his rapid movements, and his untiring vigilance, he for a long time baffled every attempt to capture or destroy him. Defeated once, he appeared again suddenly at the head of as large a force as ever, and by his frequent forays kept the French army in constant alarm, while it slowly wasted away under the burning sun of Africa. He was only conquered at last through an alliance between Louis Phillipe and the Emperor of Morocco. Defeated and taken prisoner in 1847, he was held a captive in France as long as Louis Philippe retained the throne. By Louis Napoleon he was liberated, treated with great respect and kindness, and, only a few years ago, permitted to retire to Damascus with a pension large enough to maintain a position becoming his rank, and to retain about him his favorite Algerines. Louis Napoleon knew how to treat a noble captive, and that captive has not for a moment forgotten the homage due from the conquered to the conqueror. When the dark storm of fanaticism was sweeping across Lebanon, towards Damascus, he might have thought of the wrongs he had endured as a captive, and of the woes brought upon his country by a Christian power. Hailing the day of vengeance, he might have put himself at the head of the Moslems thirsting Christian for blood. But he listened only to the cry of bleeding humanity, and with a courage and generosity that will command the admiration of the world, he devoted himself from the outset, to the protection and rescue of the endangered. Before the outbreak at Damascus occurred—while the storm was yet approaching, his conduct is thus described: "While the authorities remain in an accountable state of inaction, the Emir Abd-el-Kader is incessant in his appeals to the Ulemas and chiefs of the various districts to prevent the evils with which the Christians are threatened. By his attitude, by his energy, and his eloquent words, it is not too much to say that the Emir has twice saved this town; for he has twice checked an impending outbreak. His conduct, in the most critical circumstances, is admirable. Day and night he watches over the general safety, and gives continual proofs of disinterestedness and devotion to the cause of which he has so nobly undertaken the defence." When the storm had actually burst over the devoted city, and thousands were perishing under the knives of the assassin, it is related that "the conduct of Abd-el-Kader was beyond all praise. He saved all the Christians who sought refuge at his house, and rescued a number out of the very hands of their opponents. He on several occasions narrowly escaped being killed himself." Under his protection ten thousand Christians are said to have found safety, who might else have been slaughtered in cold blood; and besides this, he has exerted himself to the utmost to relieve the wants of the hungry and destitute thus thrown upon his hands. A Mohammedan in creed, he has been a Christian in deeds. A hard man of war, he has shown a heart tender and true to human sympathies. A hero on the battle field, his heroism has won nobler trophies in following the instincts of a kind and generous soul. Our readers may recollect that the Emperor of the French recently appointed Abd-el-Kader a Grand Officer of the Legion of Honor, as acknowledgement of the signal services which he rendered to the Christians during the late Syrian massacres. The French papers further say that the cross is to be of diamonds, and of the value of 14,000 francs. We learn from the Courrier des Etats Unis Abd-el-Kader has written to the Emperor to thank him for his mark of distinction. He declares that he has but paid a debt contracted eleven years ago at Amboise. (He was then liberated by Louis Napoleon). A new pamphlet has appeared in Paris bearing the following title: Abd-el-Keder, the Emperor of Arabia.

A "ROUNDABOUT PAPER."

THE MECCA BEYOND THE SUNRISE.

It is quite common in these days, and no less commendable than common, to exalt the value of this mundane life, to endeavor to increase the sense of that value by contemplating its brevity, and also to guard against wasting it by apathy, negligence, mistake, and sin.—That there is great danger of wasting it, and of waking up in another world and finding that most of it was mistakenly and foolishly spent, can hardly be doubted by an honest and observant mind. One of the most insidious and imminent dangers in this regard is, that of expending the energy and enthusiasm of our precious probation in the defence and elucidation of obsolete formulas, fossil ideas, and ante-deluvian creeds and doctrines; the cast-off clothes of buried generations—the lifeless husks of the seeds of thought whose harvests are seen in the living civilization of the present—the mere letter of the law of a rude and preparatory dispensation, whose spirit has long since been developed into the fuller life of a dispensation adapted to the manhood of human thought and faith. The Jews are not the only people who have fallen into this unbelieving error. The scribes, and pharisees, and sadducees of the days of Christ were re[illegible] existing in every age; classes who of immutable truth contained in the creeds and forms of their time, but who content themselves with the forms alone, and actually array them, ultimately, against the full-grown truths they once contained. The world travels faster than we are accustomed to believe, and there is danger of our falling back out of the light of its risen sunshine, first into twilight, and then into the midnight which is the antipodes of the noon we ought to be enjoying. There are so many behind-time minds that the world would actually fall back out of mental daylight and spiritual sunshine were it not that the disciples of progress are of "another spirit," and continually lead onward to the "promised land."

These are the thoughts which naturally suggested themselves on reading what will be found below, taken from a religious contemporary. Our neighbor seems inoculated with the political virus of the times, and affects popular elections even in the settlement of those sacred questions usually referred to the arbitrament of "the law and testimony" of the word of God. The idea, however, that in these democratic days the old "alien and sedition law" of "election and reprobation" would be adopted by popular vote, is really more suggestive of retrogression into mental twilight than we were prepared for. When the doctrines of unlimited atonement, possible salvation for every man, the witness of the Spirit, and the spirit and power of revivals accompanying them, have overflowed their original ecclesiastical pale, and revolutionized every clime and communion of christendom, to say nothing of the unparalelled numerical increase and present force of professed Arminians—when, indeed, Arminianism has become the irrevocable popular creed—a man who cherishes the belief that there would be any hope for the "horrible decrees" of Calvinism in a popular election, is really more sanguine than the Pope or the King of Naples in the hope of maintaining their crumbling despotisms. But we call attention to the extract, as an antiquarian or geological curiosity:

PRESBYTERIANISM.

All christendom is for it. It is the common faith of the believing world. It is the average creed of God's people. It is the second choice of all other evangelical sects. It is the select ultimatum of all other denominations. If this day all believers were gathered together, and, by a popular vote, were to adopt some common faith, Presbyterianism would receive the election. Who doubts this?

Let the vote be taken; and, according to the republican rule, on every ballot, let that denomination receiving the least number of votes, be stricken from the list of candidates. On the first ballot, the Episcopal, being the smallest in number, would be erased. And now, the church being abolished by the popular vote, its members are good Presbyterians. On the second ballot, the Baptist church would be erased; and now, immersion being abolished by the popular vote, its advocates also are good Presbyterians. On the third ballot, Methodism would be erased; and now all its peculiar features being abolished by the popular vote, its adherents are likewise good Presbyterians. And on the last ballot, Presbyterianism would receive the unanimous vote of God's people. And thus it is declared to be, by the suffrages of all christians, the common faith of all believers.

Or put it in this form: let the doctrines of Presbyterianism be adopted seriatim. The doctrine of God's sovereignty, with its cognates, the five points comes up. The Baptists and Episcopalians always vote with Presbyterians for this: it is therefore adopted. The doctrines of affusion, infant baptism, and open communion come next. The Methodists and Episcopalians always vote with Presbyterians for these: they are therefore adopted.—The doctrine of the parity of the ministry, in opposition to diocesan Episcopacy and apostolical succession, is now put. The Methodists and Baptists always vote with the Presbyterians for this: it is therefore adopted. And thus every distinctive doctrine of the Presbyterian church is adopted by the whole church in convention. Presbyterianism has the majority-vote of all God's people, even from Dan to Beersheba. It is the average faith of christendom, the common creed of all believers, the second choice of all other orthodox persuasions.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.—We have on hand a number of communications in regard to the proposed change of the time of meeting of this Conference—some in favor of, and some opposed to it. We suggest to brethren that these communications show that there is no unanimity in this matter, and that the subject had better be dropped until their meeting, when they can confer, and take such action as may be deemed expedient. It is plain that a newspaper discussion will not settle the question. It will only confuse the Bishop.

THE BALTIMORE METHODIST CONVENTION.

The "people" are taking the "Border" question in hand. Our readers are aware that a Convention of ministers and laymen has been called to meet next March, at the same time with the Baltimore Conference, and at the same place, Staunton, Va. But recently a Convention of laymen alone has been called to meet in Baltimore in December next, preparatory to the Staunton Convention. This is considered the most important movement made as yet, in connection with the Border question. The resolutions calling the Convention are from the Quarterly meeting of Summerfield circuit, Maryland; from a large and highly respectable meeting of male members of the Church, from various parts of Virginia, the District of Columbia and Maryland, convened in the neighborhood of the London camp-meeting; and from a meeting of the male members of London circuit. The Convention will be open for delegates not only from charges in the Baltimore Conference, but also from Baltimore East Conference, and from Western Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri. Preachers are not invited to this Convention, because it is not the purpose of those who have called it to entrap preachers into premature decisions upon a subject which must ultimately come before them. Preachers are not invited to memorialize preachers. They all could not leave their work to attend—and it would be unfair to give to those in Baltimore and its vicinity, privileges, or rather throw upon them responsibilities, not possible to all.

The Baltimore Advocate says: "That the call of the Summerfield meeting will be responded to throughout Virginia, the District, and a large part of Maryland, is certain. Whatever objection may be made to the plan, the great majority of our people will act upon it. Opposition may limit the number of the delegates, and weaken the influence of the Convention, but that its decision will be ratified and carried out to complete results, by the great body of our membership, is just as sure as that it has been called. In influence and intelligence, and known loyalty to the Church, the delegates already elected are inferior to no others. Such will certainly be the character of the rest. The spirit of the Church is fully up—the spirit of its piety as well as of its intelligence. The importance of the crisis is fully felt, and the Baltimore Convention will be a body of men than whom no church can assemble one more worthy of confidence and respect. If they cannot find the right way out of our difficulty, we shall despair that it will be found at all."

A CANDID CONFESSION—A MOMENTOUS TRUTH.

EPISCOPAL UNITY.—The Southern Church-man confesses that "there is an irrepressible conflict" in the Episcopal Church, "between those who say there is no Church without a bishop, and those who say there is; between those who say that every child is regenerated by and in baptism, and those who say no; between those who say grace is conferred by sacraments, and those who say it is alone by faith even with the sacraments; between those who say salvation is by grace through faith alone, and those who say it is first begun in baptism, and increased by confirmation, and nurtured by the Lord's Supper.

"Here we have honestly set forth, what every man in the country who is well informed on religious subjects, knows, namely, that there is a strong party in the Episcopal Church of this county who have abandoned the simple saving gospel of Christ, for semi-popery, and are steadily infusing pernicious sentiments into the public mind, as far as is in their power. In many of the Southern States, this party comprises much the larger portion of the Church; this is the case especially in Alabama and Mississippi. Indeed I cannot now call to [illegible] States. Bishops Green and Cobbs, and other of these "clergy" up to the point of puseyism—"the Church," instead of Christ, "the sacraments," instead of the grace of God, are sounded forth from nearly all their pulpits. The consequences are such as might be expected, no sinners converted to God under such a ministry—no deep spirituality is secured—only a bitter and bigoted partisanship for "the Church." And no minister of that Church in these States, has the moral courage, like Bishop Mead, Bishop Davis, and Dr. Tyng, to lift up his voice for the gospel against this great heresy. In this condition of things, it is a fearful thing for the interest of a man's soul, for him to come under such an influence. Amid the strife on this subject, which is raging in every land, and many parts of this country, where is the unity of "the Church." H. J.

GOOD NEWS.

We still hear good news from the churches. Rev. Thomas E. Huston, a local preacher, writes that at a protracted meeting at Strong River church, Brandon circuit, Miss. Con., 20 souls were converted and 12 added to the Church.

Rev. N. H. Self writes from Harpersville, Ala., of two meetings—one at Pine Flat, and the other at Pleasant Hill, which resulted in about 40 conversions, the addition of 30 to the Methodist Church, and 5 to the Baptist Church. Many more, it was thought, would join the Churches.

A Local Preacher writes us in glowing style of the revival prevailing in all Brandon circuit, Miss. Con., Rev. A. B. Nicholson, pastor. Numerous meeting have been held, many converted and added to the Church—25 and 30 at a place. Local preachers laboring with zeal, and young men newly converted praying in public and exhorting. That is right. Let solemnity and sobriety temper zeal, however, that the gospel be not blamed.

Rev. J. W. Harmon writes us from Livingston, Ala., of a profitable protracted meeting in that place, in which Dr. Neely and others assisted, which resulted in 20 additions to the Church, and many powerful conversions. The work is still going on with increasing power.

Our venerable friend and brother, Dr. N. B. Powell, writes us of a glorious Camp-meeting at Channenoggee, Ala., at which 70 or 80 were converted. Such a time never was known in that region before. The effects produced were similar to those witnessed in the great revivals in the early history of the Church in this country. Our old friend, now waiting the call of his heavenly father, writes like Simeon talked at the birth of the Savior. May God continue his life for many years, and continue to bless Channenoggee.

Rev. E. B. Norton writes us from Oak Bowery, Ala., of another protracted meeting—a gracious time—resulting in 31 conversions and 26 additions to the Church. The missionary and conference collections promise well.

Rev. R. Parvin writes that the revival on Columbia circuit, La. Con., is still progressing. A recent meeting at Back Bayou church resulted in 40 conversions and 20 additions to the Church. During the year, so far, 120 have been converted and 130 added to the Church. A magnificent encampment, for the camp-meeting which is to commence on the 4th of October, is being built. Mr. Parvin hopes that all the young converts will subscribe for the Advocate, and we say, Amen!

Ashby writes us of a gracious protracted meeting, of ten days, at Rives' chapel, Miss. Con., Rev. D. A. J. Parker, pastor, assisted by the local preachers, and the Presbyterian pastor, at which the members of both churches were greatly blessed, and many souls converted and added to the number of God's people. She gives a very hopeful account of the state of religion in that region.

Rev. W. W. Hurst, local preacher, writes us from Sunflower circuit, Miss. Con., that at a recent protracted meeting 6 were converted and 7 added to the Church. Really, we begin to hope for a gracious and general work of God, notwithstanding drouth and political agitation.

ABOLITION CONSPIRACIES AGAIN.

Abolition emissaries have been tampering with the negroes, and burning villages and houses, and seeking to organize servile insurrections in other States besides Texas—in Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, Arkansas, and, we believe, in Virginia. Such enterprises are utterly mad and hopeless, but they are no less significant and representative in character. The negroes of the South, as a body, can never be corrupted, although occasional desperadoes may be found among them, as among white men, who, from revenge, for fancied or real wrongs, or from absolute wickedness, become the tools of worse villains, with white skins, and help to bring into disrepute their innocent and unoffending fellow-servants. Great caution ought to be exercised, lest, both among whites and blacks, the innocent be made to suffer with the guilty. That the doctrines of abolitionists and republicans, and their course on the slavery question, have produced these things, can no more be doubted than can the philosophy of cause and effect. There is another thing that aggravates the evil: the political divisions and the heated discussions among the people of the South. Reckless and indiscreet political brawlers in the South have done much harm as well as the abolitionists.

PACIFIC METHODISM.

In view of what is transpiring in the East, and the probabilities and possibilities of the future, it behooves Methodists on this, says the Pacific Methodist, coast to study well the providential requirements of their position, to maintain firmly those conservative views which have so rapidly gained ground for several years, and at the same time cultivate and exhibit the fullest catholicity of spirit and action compatible with the circumstances surrounding them. There is manifest a movement towards our platform by some from whom we have been separated heretofore. While we rejoice over the progress of the reaction towards the old land-marks of the church, God forbid that we should rejoice as partisans! Our rejoicing should be in the hope that the Church of Christ is being purged of error, not that this or that party is gaining ground. We have not for years wavered in the belief that the great body of Methodists on the Pacific coast would ultimately occupy the position the Pacific Conference has taken and maintained on the "vexed question," that of non-interference with it. We think the signs are more and more hopeful of such a result. Our hopes may bias our judgment in the matter. There is nothing for which we more ardently pray than to see the hindrances to Methodistic unity removed.

The Pacific Methodist College is going up, out of debt, and the endowment growing daily.

REV. MR. BRONTE.

This remarkable man, the father of the Bronte sisters, preached his last sermon at Haworth Church, (where Charlotte Bronte lies buried) on the 21st ult. He is said to have been a very effective, if not a very brilliant pulpit orator. Mr. Bryant of the New York Evening Post, heard him in his church at Haworth some two years ago, and says that the picture he presented was curious and striking. He wore a huge white cravat, completely burying his chin as well as his neck, and absolutely hiding the lower part of his face. His text was taken from various passages in the lamentation of Jeremiah, which he read from a pocket Bible, explaining them as he proceeded. A more affectingly beautiful sermon, adds Mr. Bryant, it would be difficult to hear, and the then recent afflictions to which Mr. Bronte had been subjected, in the loss of his last and most celebrated daughter, larly dwelt: "And I said, my strength and my hope [illegible] perished from the Lord; remember mine afflictions and my misery, the wormwood and the gall.—This I recall to mind; therefore have I hope. For it is of the Lord's mercies we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not."

FATHER HAYNIE.

On our first page will be found an interesting sketch of this veteran Methodist preacher who recently died in Texas. Father Haynie's labors reach from Virginia, Botetourt county, (where he was born and married) to East Tennessee, where he labored; to North Alabama, where he was long in the work; to Texas, where, from 1839 to August 1860, when he died. He lived in every species of service and vicissitude; several times, in the days of the republic, at the convention, and after annexation he served as Chaplain to the Congress and the Legislature. He was at the first annual conference ever assembled in Texas, at Rutersville, in 1839, and took service on the Indian frontier, where he was fond of laboring. During the Mexican war, at three score years, he repaired to the army, and was volunteer chaplain along the Rio Grande.

A POSTSCRIPT.—In a postscript to the letter from Europe, on first page, the writer adds: We have had a pleasant visit to Hampton Court, a princely palace, built by Cardinal Wolsey, in the reign of Henry VIII., and since occupied by several kings and Queens of England. It is situated on the north bank of the river Thames, about twelve miles from London. As we passed along the railroad through a country of exquisite beauty, we noticed that the farmers were busily engaged in reaping their crops of wheat, just now beginning to be ripe, though much of it is not yet ready for the sickle. The limits of this letter will not suffice for a description of the palace, and its gallery of more than a thousand pictures, some by the greatest masters of the art. The greatest curiosity exhibited in the palace garden was a grape vine, ninety-eight years old, 110 feet long, thirty inches in circumference at a distance of three feet from the ground, and bearing 2,500 bunches of grapes. The palace is not now used as a royal residence, but kept on exhibition, and as a place of recreation for the public.

NEW ORLEANS SCHOOL OF MEDICINE.—We call attention to the advertisement of this excellent institution, to be found in another column. It will be a matter of interest to all who contemplate attending a medical college during the coming season. We assure them they will not be disappointed in the New Orleans School of Medicine.

THE HOME CIRCLE for September, is one of the best we have seen for a long time. The likeness of Col. J. M. Chambers, of Columbus, Ga., is an excellent one. The sketch of him, as also that of Col. R. A. Baker, was written by Dr. Summers.

"SUBSCRIBER" complains of a heterodox sentiment in a certain number of the series headed "Remarkable Conversions" which have been appearing in the Advocate. "Subscriber" is right; but it is unimportant; the narrative, and not the the theology of the writer was the matter of interest. Though awakened in privacy, it cannot be claimed that the agency of the Holy Spirit was absent.

A GENTLEMAN is offended at our editorial on the "Destiny of the Irish," as he is descended from that branch of the race. Our friend will be surprised to learn, perhaps, that the writer of that article is Irish in the same sense that he is, and that he is not at all offended. There was nothing to offend an individual, not even a Papist, in a notice of the character and history of a nation. Tastes differ.

SHALL THEY SUCCEED?

MR. EDITOR: A company of liberal and enlightened gentlemen, who have essayed to inaugurate an institution worthy the age and the country, shall they succeed in developing this enterprise to its full dimensions? Shall the immediate friends, and the Board of Trustees of Centenary College succeed in paying off the incumbent debt of $25,000 on the Building, and in raising their present endowment (only $47,000) to the amount of $200,000? Certainly, the public generally, and the Church especially, do not realize the responsibilities a corporate body, as the Board of Centenary, assume for them. Without endowment, or personal aggrandizement,—for such it is, beyond question—it is no small affair for one to pledge himself, as does a Trustee, to the labor and sacrifice of building up and sustaining so vast a scheme as a College. Yet, the Board of Centenary have gratuitously and assiduously worked on, increasing their buildings, enlarging and adding to their Chairs of instruction, until the institution is now able to afford inducements and facilities for the acquisition of knowledge, unsurpassed among us.

The unusual success of the institution during its last scholastic year, warrants increased confidence. Though the patronage of Centenary has been, generally, good, rather better than most similar schools, that alone is not enough. Tuition fees will not erect buildings, nor secure endowment. Here, as everywhere, the people must give money, if they seek to have a first-class college. "Our institutions are not so good as those North," is the complaint. Why not? Because we do not give liberally to them as do others. Anything valuable money will procure, and colleges and schools are no exception. It is intended to spare no means to pay up the present debt, and raise the endowment to $200,000. Has Centenary, steadily progressive for 15 years, no claims upon the public? She has lived through many discouragements, to prove the necessity and propriety of her existence, and now asks to be placed in a condition above contingency for the years to come.

As an agent to represent these claims and solicit aid, the Board have authorized the undersigned to take horse and buggy, and traverse the land—to go up and down the large rivers, small bayous, lakes, swamps, and uplands, giving every one an opportunity to speak out materially upon this important educational measure. No small work for the Agent, think you? But with a confident heart he starts on the 1st September, on a tour through the parishes of Carroll, Madison, Tensas, and Concordia. Mississippi and Louisiana are not behind Alabama and Georgia in resources and progress; will they be in liberality? Not a whit, we believe. The people need to know our wants, and be solicited to help—they will do it! Temporarily acting in this capacity in May and June last, and under most unfavorable auspices, we met with success far beyond the most sanguine expectations—collecting $13,500. Messrs. S. W. W. Sanderson of Natchez, and G. F. Sanderson of Carroll, gave each, $5,000; Mrs. C. S. A. Miller of Waterproof $2000; and Mr. H. W. Drake of the same place, $1,000; others, in smaller sums, to the amount of $500. These donations were liberal, and cheerfully given. Are there not more who who will do likewise? Others whom we saw, promised, conditionally, to contribute this Fall—Are we too sanguine then when we believe that $200,000 can be raised for Centenary? We think not; and to the measure of this faith we intend, by every effort, to labor to bring up our works as an Agent.

Will you, Mr. Editor, ask your readers to entertain this enterprise, and while a kind Providence has granted all that influence could desire, to prepare their hearts and minds to return liberally of their cumulated blessings when the Agent shall come along? In the mean time place before the public the following propositions:

Who will give $12,500, on condition any one else will give an equal amount, to endow a Chair?

Who will give $5,000, on condition that four others will give same amount, each, to endow a Chair?

Who will give $1,000 to pay up present debt on building?

We ask for liberal donations because the people are able to give, and the College needs liberal help.

Any one who wishes to accept either of the propositions will please inform the Editor of the Advocate, or the undersigned at Ion, La.

W. H. SCALES, Agent.

TO THE LOCAL PREACHERS OF THE M. E. CHURCHES OF THE UNITED STATES.

GREETING: The Third Convention of the National Association of Local Preachers, to which you are earnestly and cordially invited, will be held in Trinity M. E. Church, Philadelphia, October 20th, 1860, at 4 o'clock P. M. We urge you, dear brethren, to have yourselves fully represented at our Convention. To do this, please give decided and animating consideration to the above call at your District or other meeting, and let this be done in time to elect delegates to the Convention, that we may appear full in numbers and strong in unity. The invitation is to all, no matter where they reside, or what their views on mooted questions. We meet for moral and religious improvement, and free expression of brotherly love only. Come all who may; come and enjoy your share of invested strength, feeling the weight of cares laid upon you by the Bishop of Souls, and enjoy with us the edification of kindred minds. We expect you to come from the East, West, North, and South; let there be no disappointment in this respect. Article Second of the Constitution reads thus:—"Each Conference Association shall be entitled to one delegate for every ten members, but no Conference Association shall be restricted to less than two delegates. Each delegate before taking his seat as a member of the National Association, shall present a certificate of his election from the Conference he represents." As it is likely that there may be brethren residing in sections where no Association has been formed, and who may desire to attend, the Constitution makes the following provision:—Article IX.—"The Association, when convened, shall have power, by a vote of two thirds of the members present, to constitute any local or traveling preacher a member thereof." The different Associations will please appoint their delegates as soon as possible, and send a correct list to Rev. John Field, No. 231 Market street, Philadelphia. A committee will be in attendance at the Conference Tract Repository, to receive delegates, and assign homes, from Thursday, Oct. 18th, at 1 o'clock P. M. until the commencement of the session.

SECESSION OF THE NAZIRITES.—This fanatical faction of the Northern Methodist Church, located principally in western New York, with some adherents in the western States, has at last seceded, under the title of the "Free Methodist Church." It is a branch of the anti-abolition party of the Northern Methodist Church, and a legitimate fruit of the anti-slavery agitation in that body. The end is not yet.

NEW ORLEANS MEDICAL AND SURGICAL JOURNAL.—We have received the number for September. We know of no abler periodical of its class. New Orleans with its great medical schools, and its unsurpassed hospitals, is the very place for a great medical journal.

REV. JEFFERSON BOND is requested to make [illegible] to the Rev. P. R. McCrary, Pleasant Hill, Dallas Co., Ala., his post-office, or come to his house.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

STATUS OF AMERICAN INVENTIONS.—It is said that the Commissioner of Patents has given his hearty concurrence in a proposition for the erection of statues to the memory of great American inventors, the expense to be defrayed by private subscription. Niches will probably be prepared in the Patent Office building for the reception of such statues.

THE NATIONAL INTELLIGENCER.—Col. Seaton, the surviving editor of the National Intelligencer, announces that Mr. James C. Welling will hereafter be associated with him in the editorial conduct of that journal. Mr. Welling is no stranger in the columns of the Intelligencer, having been in different capacities, connected with it for the last ten years.

COTTON AT MOBILE.—The Register, of the 1st inst., says: "Mobile has received this (commercial) year 811,256 bales of cotton. This does not include cottons that have gone through to New Orleans, but is the actual receipt of our market."

TRADE OF GALVESTON.—The Galveston Civilian, of the 1st inst., in its annual statement of the trade of that port, says that the total value of merchandise landed at Galveston, during the year, is not less than fifty millions of dollars.

HOUSTON, TEXAS.—The Houston Telegraph, of the 1st inst., in its annual commercial review, has some interesting statements. It says that the continued progress in the State for the past year has been good, and promises to be still better for the year to come—the whole amount of railroad now completed is 354 miles, of which 321 are in connection with Houston, and the whole amount of grain ready for the Iron is 131 miles, of which 61 is in connection with Houston; that the improvements in Houston have been rapid and extensive, and the business done in that city the past year shows a great increase over the previous year; and that the sales of groceries in Houston the last year have reached not less than two and a half millions of dollars, while the sale of merchandise has swelled the whole amount to fully six millions of dollars.

A LONG JOURNEY IN A SMALL BOAT.—Two sons of Capt. B. H. Hall, of Lexingtonville, Duchess county, N. Y., started a few days since on a journey to the Mississippi river, and perhaps to New Orleans, via the Hudson river, Erie canal and Western rivers, in a boat built by themselves. She is twelve feet long, and the material employed in the construction is composed of a light wood frame covered with zinc, the whole only weighing sixty pounds. Her weight will admit of being carried around sluices and shallows.

THE FIRST AMERICAN STEAM PACKET BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND ENGLAND.—Capt. R. R. Forbes, in a letter to the Boston Commercial Bulletin, says: Put it on record, then, ye Boston commercial historians, that the Massachusetts, fitted out by myself, for my self and seven others equally interested, was the first American steam-packet regularly plying between the United States and England."

THE PRINCE OF WALES AT NEW YORK.—The entertainments to which "Baron Renfrew" is to be treated in New York will consist of a review of the entire military of that city, a grand ball to be given by the committee of citizens, and a torchlight procession by the Fire Department. The Baron, with his suite, will take rooms at one of the up-town hotels, and pay their own way like any other travelers.

MONUMENT TO TIMOTHY BIGELOW.—Col. Timothy Bigelow, of Massachusetts, who served in the memorable expedition of Arnold to Quebec, at the commencement of the Revolutionary War, is to have a monument erected to his memory in the city of Worcester, Mass., his great grandson, Timothy Bigelow Lawrence, son of the late Abbot Lawrence, (who married Col. B.'s granddaughter,) giving the handsome sum of $15,000 for that purpose. The monument is to be of the purest Italian marble, and will be twenty-five feet high from the base.

BOSTON AND NEW ORLEANS STEAMSHIPS.—The Boston papers state that the Boston and New Orleans Steamship Company has concluded a contract with Mr. Harrison Loring, of South Boston, for the building of two iron steamships, of 2,000 tons each. They are to be screw propellers, two hundred and seventy-five feet long, and to be completed as soon as possible.

COPPIE, brother of the John Brown Coppie who was hung at Charlestown, Va., has been trying his hand at stealing negroes. He recently escorted quite a number of runaway slaves through Iowa City, on the way to Canada.

THE law of Tennessee establishing a conventional rate of interest on money loaned, not to exceed ten per cent., went into operation on the 1st inst.

MRS. Bailey, widow of the publisher of the National Era, at Washington, announces in a circular, that the journal in question is permanently suspended.

IT appears that the Catholic clergy in New York, as a body, have followed the example of Bishop Hughes, and decline to make a return of marriages.

Judge L. has been long endeared to the heart of the Southern people. But his recent noble action, in vindication of the nation's honor, will fix him still more deeply in their affections. We allude to his prompt resignation of his seat in the Statistical Congress of all Nations, at London, on account of Lord Brougham's insult to Mr. Dallas."

FOREIGN NEWS.

The news from Europe since our last issue, is full of interest, but we have space for only a very brief summary of that which is most important, and which is mainly by telegraph:

GREAT BRITAIN.—Parliament adjourned on the 28th ult. The Queen, in her speech, said that the relations of Great Britain with all foreign powers are friendly and satisfactory. She added that she trusts there is no danger of an interruption of the general peace of Europe. Previous to the adjournment Lord Palmerston, in the House of Commons, authoritatively denied that Austria had threatened to send her armies into Italy to support Naples, and said that Austria would adhere to non-intervention till her frontiers were threatened. Mr. Lindsay, member of Parliament, had been authorized to proceed to Washington, and lay before the American Government the views of the British Government relative to the navigation laws, belligerent rights, &c., and enter into negotiations for the opening of the fishing trade. Mr. Lindsay was to sail on the 8th inst. The steamship Great Eastern, from New York, via Halifax, arrived at Milford Haven on the 26th ult. It is reported that she will leave on her return to New York on the 17th inst. It is stated that the Government has decided on strengthening the fortifications at St. Helena, and adding to the strength of the troops garrisoning the island.

FRANCE.—The Emperor had made a speech at Lyons in response to the authorities. He confirmed the opinion of distrust excited abroad, and declared that nothing could make him deviate from the path of moderation and justice. His sole desire was the general interest of France, and he urged them to give themselves up with confidence to works of peace. He was determined, with all's assistance, that France should not degenerate under his dynasty. The pacific nature of this speech caused an advance on the Rentes.

THE SICILIES.—The accounts of Garibaldi's progress in Calabria shows that he is enthusiastically received by the people everywhere. He has been proclaimed Dictator. The latest report from Naples is that the military council had advised the King to leave the city; that the officers of the army and navy had tendered their resignation en masse to the King, and, that a Provisional Government had been established in one of the provinces.

THE AUSTRIAN ARMY IN VENETIA.—It is reported that the Austrian Government has in the territory of Venetia an army amounting in all to 250,000 men.

We learn from the English papers that the Rev. Patrick Bronte, father of Currer, Acton and Ellis Bell, is at length so far overcome by age and infirmity as to be compelled to cease from active duty. He preached his last sermon in Haworth Church on Sunday, the 21st of July. It is thought that the Rev. Mr. Nicoll, husband of Charlotte Bronte, will become the incumbent of Haworth.

Signor Visconti, assisted by his son, is restoring to the light of day the ancient gate of Rome, the fauniss Ostia, and has already uncovered the dock-yards, the units, where still are to be seen the earthen pots, with weights, a theatre, a beautiful temple, baths, a gymnasium, a square, a gate of the city, and above all, a most interesting "mitreo," one of the most perfect which Italy, or perhaps the world, possesses.

At Chatham, England, at noon each day, a gun is fired by electricity from the Greenwich Observatory.

THE PARISIANS AND THE POTATO.—The Parisians are just about to erect a statue to Le Jardin des Plantes to Parmentier, who coaxed the French into eating potatoes, which they would only be induced to swallow on the eve of the great revolution, being three centuries behind Ireland in discovering the nutritious qualities of that tuber.

INTERESTING DISCOVERY IN AUSTRALIA.—An interesting discovery, namely, the existence of native diamonds, has been made in Australia. The stone was discovered in the black sand of the Ovens district by an Irish miner named O'Neil.—Rubies and other gems of very small size had previously been found in the same deposit.

THE FATE OF DR. VOGEL.—A letter from Bothu states that it was decided, two days back, at the Duke of Saxe-Coburg's, to send an expedition to Africa, to ascertain with certainty the fate of Dr. Vogel, the traveler. Baron Stenglin of Wurtemberg will make the voyage. A committee has been formed, under the presidentship of the Duke, to make an appeal to the public for the funds necessary to cover the expenses of the mission, which are estimated at 10,000 thalers.

THE RAJAH OF SARAWAK.—Sir James Brooke, the Rajah of Sarawak, it appears, is determined to keep up his domination in the Eastern seas, he having, according to The North British Mail, purchased a screw steamer in Port Glasgow, with the intention of fitting her with two swivel-guns, fore and aft, as well as broadsides, to act against the piratical prahus on the coast of Borneo.

Absynth seems to be the opium of France—its ravages are evident every day, not only amongst the literary class, who indulge in its dangerous use far too much, but in every grade of society.

HUNGARIAN WINES.—Hungary, according to a late report on its commerce, is fully able to supply the whole of Great Britain with wines, now the duty has been abolished. "Not only are Hungarian wines said to be "drier than French wines, more mellow than those of the Rhine, and more pleasant than those of Spain," but the country can yield quantities of a secondary character calculated to meet any demand.

"SPEAK IN LIFE."—A correspondent of the New York Tribune, writing from Pike's Peak, says: "A former banker from Leavenworth is now in the mines, engaged in selling pies! He was deacon in one of the churches in Eastern Kansas; here he retails whisky on Sunday. Last year, on the Republican route, I encountered an ex-Cincinnati lawyer, and an actress from the New York Bowery Theater, united in bonds matrimonial and engaged in keeping a sluice station on the Great Plains, four hundred miles from civilization.

An English paper says that James Cooper, who was executioner and general attendant of the first Napoleon in St. Helena, is yet alive and in his 80th year, living at Hungstead. He has no pension and has to struggle hard "to keep the wolf from the door."

THE SACRIFICE BY THE KING OF DAHOMEY.—In the British House of Commons, on the 17th of August, in reply to Lord Fermoy, Mr. C. Fortescue said that the report of the intended sacrifice by the King of Dahomey was unfortunately only too true. The influence of England, great as it was on the coast, did not extend inland, but the King of Dahomey had been warned to expect British resentment if he persisted in his intentions.

David Weingess Johson, who committed since obtained some notoriety in New York, and whose trial in London for a libel upon Sir James Ferguson attracted considerable attention, has been sentenced to imprisonment and hard labor for twelve months.

In the British House of Commons, on the 17th ult., Lord Palmerston stated that the British Commissioner to Syria had received instructions to demand the restoration of the Christian women carried off and sold by the Druses.

MAZZINI.—A letter dated Genoa, August 10th, says: "M. Mazzini seems to be in Tuscany, if, indeed, it is ever possible to know where he is. M. Saffi, his ex-colleague in the triumvirate, who recently passed through this town, is at Forli. I have good ground for asserting you that these gentlemen are not promoting republican ideas, that they accept the monarchy of the house of Savoy; but on the other hand, they are strenuously advocating immediate action in the Roman States."

THE GUILLOTINE.—It has been generally supposed that the guillotine was invented during the French revolution. Mr. Young, of the New York Albion, writing from Nuremburg, Germany, states that on the walls of a building in that city is a fresco of 1521, delineating a guillotine in operation.

LORD PALMERSTON AND THE PROPHETESS.—The London Globe says: "The Premier and his lady occupy Lord John Russell's pew, and seem to take considerable interest in the elucidation of the Scriptures which are given by the reverend gentleman. It is said that the Premier was mostly attracted by Dr. Cumming's elucidations of the prophecies of Daniel."

The infant daughter of Prince and Princess Frederick William of Prussia has been christened. She received the names of Victoria Elizabeth Augusta Charlotte. The ceremony took place at the new palace at Potsdam.

It appears by a statement in the Gazette de St. Petersbourg that the railway from Moscow to Nijni Novgorod was to have been opened last month.

A French imperial decree authorizes the importation of raw wool through any of the custom houses of the Empire.

Since our last issue we have received the following intelligence from Canada, Mexico, and Central America:

Canada.—The papers are still occupied in chronicling the progress of the Prince. He laid the corner stone of the new Parliament House in Ottawa, on the 31st inst., and last accounts, was at Toronto.

Mexico.—It is reported that a general pronunciamiento in favor of the elevation of ex-President Comonfort, to authority in Mexico, has been planned and is on the eve of being proclaimed. At last accounts from the city of Mexico, Miramon had arrived there in his flight from Lagos, and was actively engaged in recruiting his forces and otherwise preparing to meet the Liberals, who were closely following him up. From Vera Cruz we have intelligence that the Spanish bark Maria Concepcion, in the capture of which, as a part of Marin's expedition last winter, the recent difficulty with Spain originated, had been by the courts declared a legal prize. It is stated also that the Constitutional Government had confirmed the decision. Of the action of the Spanish Commodore in the matter we hear nothing. He lay quietly at Sacrificios, awaiting dispatches from Havana. From Washington we learn that Mr. McLane has been directed to return to his post, and that he will sail from New York in the steam corvette Pawnee on the 15th inst. for Vera Cruz.

Central America.—We have intelligence of the failure of Walker's Expedition to Honduras. It appears that he had entrenched himself at Truxillo; but the commander of the British war steamer Icarus, arriving immediately after, gave him an order to abandon the town, giving twenty-four hours to decide. Walker saw no alternative but to obey, and left the town, leaving behind him eight of his wounded followers, and the greater part of his ammunition and stores. The Icarus took on board the surviving seven men. Gen. Walker left the town with only eighty men, but according to last advices his force was reduced to twenty-five by the continued attacks of his enemies, and it was reported also that he had been severely wounded in the face. His route was by the sea-side, with the intention or no doubt, of procuring a vessel to proceed to Rantan.

POLITICAL.

John L. Stewart, whom the Bell and Everett party of Illinois have nominated for Governor, is said to be a brother-in-law of Mr. Lincoln, the Republican candidate for the Presidency.

IOWA BELL AND EVERETT CONVENTION.—The friends of Bell and Everett held a convention at Iowa City on the 26th ult. About half the counties in the State were represented by one hundred and twenty-five delegates. A full electoral ticket was nominated, but it was deemed inexpedient to make nominations for State officers.

The North Carolina Douglas Convention has nominated a State Electoral ticket. The electors are instructed to vote to prevent the choice of a sectional President.

SENATOR SEWARD IN THE WEST.—A dispatch dated Detroit, Sept. 4th, says: "Senator Seward replied verbally to the Cincinnati Republican deputation, that he could not at this time determine to visit Cincinnati, that he should, after visiting Minnesota, continue his trip to Kansas—that he was already pledged to speak in Ohio, at Cleveland; also at Chicago and Pittsburg, on his return, which would bring his time well into October, and that should he find it possible to visit Cincinnati, he would communicate with the committee without farther inquiry. The grand Seward demonstration here to-day surpasses expectations at nearly all. The day was magnificent, and the turnout from city and country splendid. The march of the procession occupied over two hours. Seward was greeted with vociferous cheers whenever he moved among the throng. He spoke over an hour, but it was next to impossible to hear him for the pressure and confusion. The crowd in the depot could not have been less than 15,000. The whole number in town from abroad is about 25,000, which, from the position of Detroit, and the other Seward meetings advertised in the State, is extraordinary. Speeches were also made by Senator Wade, General Nye, Gov. Wisner, Austin Blair, &c. The grand torchlight parade of Wide-Awakes came off to-night. It was a magnificent pageant, and the whole city overflowed on to the streets and sidewalks to see it pass. All is excitement, hilarity and hope. The Michigan Republicans are very wide-awake indeed, and their joy partakes of the tremendous.

ARKANSAS ELECTION.—The Little Rock National Democrat, of the 4th inst., has the full vote for Governor at the recent Arkansas election. It shows the following result: Rector, 30,577; Johnson, 28,348—Rector's majority, 1,959.

THE OFFICIAL VOTE OF KENTUCKY.—We learn from the Louisville Journal that the Board of Examiners met on the 3d inst., to compare the returns of the late election in Kentucky and declared the following result: For Clerk Court of Appeals—Leslie Combs, 68,165; Clinton McClarty, 14,812; R. R. Rolling, 10,971; Brent Hopkins, 820; other candidates, 325. Total vote, 125,232.

THE MISSOURI REPUBLICANS.—A St. Louis dispatch says that at a meeting of the Republican State Committee on the 3d inst., the chairman was instructed to prepare an address urging them to vindicate their principles at the ensuing Presidential election, without affiliation with any other party.

ILLINOIS U. S. SENATOR.—The Cincinnati Enquirer says there is no doubt that the Republicans will lose a United States Senator in Illinois at the coming election. Judge Trumbull's term expires on the 4th of March, and it is next to certain that the Democrats will have twelve majority on joint ballot, and will thus be enabled to to choose his successor.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

A TRIBUTE TO AMERICAN MISSIONARIES.—At a recent meeting in London, the Earl of Shaftesbury paid the following tribute to the American missionaries: "I do not believe that in the whole history of missions, I do not believe that in the history of diplomacy, or in the history of negotiations carried on between man and man, we can find any thing to equal the wisdom, the sunniness and the pure evangelical truth of the body of men who constitute the American mission. I have said it twenty times before, and I will say it again, for the expression appropriately conveys my meaning—that they are a marvellous combination of common sense and piety." Everyman who comes in contact with those missionaries speaks in praise of them. Persons in authority and persons in subjection all speak in their favor; travelers speak well of them; and I know of no man who has ever been able to bring a single valid objection against that body. There they stand, tested by years, tried by their works, and exemplified by their fruits; and I believe it will be found that these American missionaries have done more toward upholding truth, and spreading the gospel of Christ in the East, than any other body of men in this or any other age."

MISSIONARY COLLEGE OF THE CHURCH IN ENGLAND.—St. Augustine's Missionary College, Canterbury, has now been twelve years in operation; and during this period fifty-two students have gone out from it as missionaries of the Gospel under the auspices of the Church of England, principally into the Colonial dioceses.

THE CATHEDRAL CHURCH OF METHODISM.—At the late conference an interesting conversation took place as to the late city road Chapel, the "Cathedral Church" of Methodism. It appears that the late Rev. John Wesley engaged the Chapel for the use of "the people called Methodists," on a lease of 99 years, from the City of London, who transferred the estate to the ecclesiastical commissioners; and the lease being about to expire (1870) it became a great question with the conference officials whether so venerable a building, in which, or in its grounds, rested the mortal remains of John Wesley, Peter Jacobs, Dr. Bunting, Richard Watson, Joseph Benson, and other great men of Methodism, should pass out of the hands of Methodists. Negotiations had been entered into, and it was likely, that City-road Chapel would be secured in perpetuity to the Methodist connection. An appeal is to be made in the whole connection on behalf of that object.—Liverpool Mercury.

LITERARY GOSSIP.

A new life of the famous Count Zinzendorf is about to be published in Paris. Count Zinzendorf was remarkably energetic in establishing missionary establishments in the West Indies and in Greenland. In the latter country there were no less than seven hundred and eighty converts. In 1737 the Count visited London, and in 1741 came to America. He preached at Germantown and Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. He also visited Connecticut. After remaining in America a year he returned to Europe. He died in the year 1760; his body being borne to the grave by thirty-two missionaries and preachers, many of whom had toiled in America. This extended life of the great Apostle will possess a deep interest, particularly with those interested in the history of missions.

CITY NEWS.

The Bell and Everett men held a mass meeting on the Place d'Armes on Tuesday evening, 4th inst., and the Breckenridge and Lane men held one on Annunciation Square, on Thursday evening, the 6th.—Both were largely attended and at both there was any amount of enthusiasm. Almost every evening there is a meeting of some political club, with the accompaniments of procession, music, etc. The Presidential canvass is conducted in the city with great spirit by Breckenridge, Douglas and Bell men, and so far nothing has occurred to mar the social harmony which should always prevail.

A terrible disaster on Lake Michigan, the loss of the steamboat Lady Elgin, has caused a great and painful sensation in the city, heightened by the fact that Col. Lumsden, one of the founders, editors and proprietors of the Picayune, his wife and only son, are among the lost. Col. Lumsden was universally known and generally beloved. His social qualities, his warm-heartedness, generosity, chivalrous character, loyalty in friendship, and frank and manly bearing had endeared him to a very extensive circle of friends.

The city still continues healthy, and the season is now so far advanced that it is almost a certainty that we shall have no yellow fever visitation this year. Our summer absentees are returning in great numbers; the city wears quite a lively aspect, and in all departments of business there is much activity for the season. Cotton comes in rapidly, the levee is once again the scene of bustle and activity, and it is evident that the business season has fairly commenced.

The contractors are making good progress in the construction of the city railroad, and they expect to finish and equip the road above Canal street, by the 1st of April next.

Mr. W. A. Dunlop, the well-known teacher of book-keeping and penmanship, was found dead in his bed yesterday (Thursday) morning, in his room, No. 11, third story of the building corner of Exchange Place and Customhouse street. A boy who went to wake him, called him and then shook him, but receiving no answer, threw open the window and saw that he was dead. He immediately notified Coroner Beach, who held inquest, and the jury rendered a verdict of death by consumption. Mr. Dunlop has been some time dying of this disease.

TERRIBLE DISASTER ON LAKE MICHIGAN.

LOSS OF THE STEAMBOAT LADY ELGIN—LIST OF THOSE KNOWN TO HAVE BEEN SAVED.—The Louisville Democrat, of the 9th inst., has the following dispatches, giving particulars of a terrible disaster on Lake Michigan:

[illegible] New York here last night, was run into, by the schooner Augusta, off Waukegan, at half-past two this morning, striking her abaft the wheel. The steamer sunk in 300 feet of water. Only seventeen persons are known to be saved, including clerk, steward and porter. There were from three hundred and fifty to four hundred persons on board, among whom were the Black Yagers and Rifles, and several fire companies from Milwaukee, who were on a visit to this city. Col. Lumsden, of the New Orleans Picayune, and family were also on board, and are supposed to be lost. At the time of the accident, the schooner was running at the rate of eleven miles per hour. The steam tug McQueen left this morning for the scene of the disaster. Further particulars are expected on her return. The names of those saved, as far as known, are as follows: H. G. Carlyle, clerk; Fred. Race, steward; Edward Westlake, porter; Robert Gone, Thomas Murphy, Thos. Cummings, Michael Conner, John E. Hobart, of Milwaukee; Tuss, Spratt, Tim O'Brien, W. A. Davis, Wilkham Mills, of Ohio; Lyman Updike, of Waupaca; H. Ingram, M. P., and a son of Mr. Ingram, proprietor of the London News, was on board, and is supposed to be lost. After the collision the steamer floated south to Waukegan, where she sunk.

CHICAGO, SEPTEMBER 8.—In addition to those reported saved this morning, are the following: Charles May, Michael McGrath, Peter Welch, George Fanbury, Wm. Elwood, John Regan, Wm. Dear, James McNamee, John Murray, Frederick Hopper, John Rope, T. Pritchard, John Everton and wife, John Doyle, Mr. Waldo, Isaac Kingsley, John Gimore, Mr. Burke and wife, John McKenley, Frederick Snyder, J. H. Willard, H. W. Gunnelson, Peter Walsh, Wm. Jenyer, F. Devarsley, Bridget Kehoe, John Rossiter, E. Debar, James Rogers, Fred Felmeyer, J. Powers, Mrs. Rivers, of Milwaukie; T. Clothers, Patrick Maher, Mrs. Simonds, George Davis, P. Meyers, Chicago; J. Cook, Faudalar; Lieutenant G. Hartsdell, of Mackinac; J. Rogers; a German woman, name unknown, J. Jacobson, New York.

The clerk makes the following statement: "The Lady Elgin left the port of Chicago at 11½ o'clock for Lake Superior.—Among the passengers were the Union Guards, of Milwaukie, composing part of some 250, evenly divided to frame that city.—About half-past two o'clock this morning the schooner Augusta, of Oswego, came into collision with the Lady Elgin which about ten miles from shore. The vessels struck the steamer at midships going in on the larboard side. The two separated instantly, and the Augusta drifted by in the darkness. At the moment of the collision there was music and dancing in the forward cabin. In an instant after the crash, all was still, and in half an hour the steamer sunk. I passed through the cabins. The ladies were pale but silent. There was not a cry nor a shriek. No sound but a rush of steam and surge of heavy seas. Whether they were not fully aware of the danger, or whether their appalling situation made them speechless, I cannot tell. The boat was lowered at once, with the design of going round upon the larboard side to resume the leak.

There were two other boats, but just at that moment some person possessed himself of one of them, and we were left powerless to manage the boat. We succeeded once in reaching the wheel, but were drifted away and thrown upon the beach at Wyneka. Only two boats left the steamer—one of them contained thirteen persons, all of whom were saved; the other bore eight, at four of whom reached the shore alive, the other four being drowned at the beach. Below I left the steamer, the engine had ceased to work, the fires having been extinguished, and within thirty minutes the Lady Elgin disappeared. The force and direction of the wind was such, that the boats and fragments of the wreck were driven up the Lake, and would reach the shore in the vicinity of Wyneka. As I stood upon the beach, helplessly looking back along the route we had drifted, I could see the gray of the morning objects floating upon the water, and sometimes, I thought, human beings struggling with the waves.

The following persons left the Tremont House last evening and took passage in the Lady Elgin: T. A. Lumsden, wife, two children and servant, New Orleans; W. Garth and wife, Misses Anna and Amanda Garth, Paris, Ky; B. F. Hall and lady, Aurora, Ill.; Mr. Fuptleham, of the firm of Smith & Fuptleham; T. C. Hanna; Mr. Pearce, of the firm of Goodman & Pearce; Mrs. Harroe, Isaac Kingsley, of Milwaukie, Joseph Cosgrow, Mr. Fitzpatrick of Kenosha, Mrs. Kitto and four children, Mrs. Rond and two children, Jas. Bellow, of Mineral Point, Wis.; A. Buckham, J. C. Polleno and lady, Milwaukie; S. Gemegan and lady, Milwaukie; H. Ingram, Esq., M. P., and a son of Mr. Ingram, proprietor of the London News, was on board, and is supposed to be lost. After the collision the steamer floated south to Waukegan, where she sunk.

The number of persons on board the steamer composing the excursion is estimated at 300. Besides the excursionists there were 50 regular passengers, and a crew of 35. The total number of saved is 98.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, September 10, 1860.

The new commercial year opens upon a moderate business in our market generally, the movement in our leading staple being checked by advancing freights and the firm pretensions of holders, while the receipts have been of a liberal character. In sugar and Molasses the transactions continue limited, but Tobacco has moved off more freely. In Western produce we have noticed an advance in the rates for Flour and Corn owing to reduced supplies, with a quiet but firm market for most descriptions of provisions. Freights have further advanced while the market for foreign exchange has been heavy.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that they have generally been very full for the better qualities, in which most of the transactions have shown an improvement of ¼ to 1 per pound, while Middling has been without any material change.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	— @ —	Good Middling	11 ¼@11⅝
Ordinary	— @ —	Middling Fair	11⅝@12
Good Ordinary	— @ —	Fair	[illegible]
Low Middling	10 @10⅛	Good Fair	do
Middling	10⅝@10⅞	Good and Fine	do

We quote for fair/prime and Refining 4½ to 5¼; Common to Good Common, 5 to 7; Fair to Fully Fair 8 to 8¼; Prime to Choice 8¾ to 9¾; Centrifugal and Clarified 9 to 9¾ cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ½ per pound.

MOLASSES.—Total receipts of the week 155 barrels. The prices obtained during the week were: Inferior to Fair, 18 to 25 cents per gallon; and Prime to Choice, 26 to 30 cents; half barrels, 26 to 30 cents per gallon.

GRAIN.—The receipts of Corn continue light. About 20,000 sacks have been sold at from $0 68 to 0 70 for ordinary, and $0 80 for good white. Oats have been in moderate request at 50 to 51 per bushel for good to prime St. Louis. Bran sells at $1 10 to $1 15 for ordinary to choice lots. Wheat sells at $1 15 per bushel for prime red.

A COMPENSATION.

Many little children die, and many tender hearts grieve, and many an honest effort at versifying such grief is unsuccessfully made. The editor has often been compelled to reject, though with sympathizing reluctance—for he too has grieved over a departed babe—these successes of the heart, but failures of the art. In some of these cases, the Legend of Little Pearl will be a compensation for these rejections. It is from "All the Year Round."

THE LEGEND OF LITTLE PEARL.

"Poor little Pearl, good little Pearl!"
Sighed every kindly neighbour;
It was so sad to see a girl
So tender, doomed to labour.

A wee bird flattered from his nest
Too soon, was that meek creature;
Just fit to rest in mother's breast,
The darling of fond Nature.

God shield poor little ones, where all
Must help to be bread-bringers!
For once a-foot, there's none too small
To ply their tiny fingers.

Poor Pearl, she had no time to play
The merry game of childhood;
From dawn to dark she worked all day,
A wooding in the wild wood.

When others played, she stole apart
In pale and shadowy quiet,
Too full of care was her child heart
For laughter running riot.

Hard lot for such a tender life,
And miserable guerdon;
But like a womanly wee wife,
She bravely bore her burden.

One wintry day they wanted wood
When need was at the sorest;
Poor Pearl, without a bit of food,
Must up and to the forest.

But there she sank down in the snow,
All over numbed and aching:
Poor little Pearl, she cried as though
Her very heart was breaking.

The blinding snow shut out the house
From little Pearl so weary;
The lonesome wind among the boughs
Moaned with its warnings eerie.

To little Pearl a Child-Christ came,
With footfall light as fairy;
He took her hand, he called her name,
His voice was sweet and airy.

His gentle eyes filled tenderly
With mystical brightness:
"And would you like to come with me,
And wear this robe of whiteness?"

He bore her bundle to the door,
Gave her a flower when going:
"My darling, I shall come once more,
When the little bud is blowing."

Home very wan came little Pearl,
But on her face strange glory:
They only thought, "What ails the girl?"
And laughed to hear her story.

Next morning mother sought her child,
And clasped it to her bosom;
Poor little Pearl, in death she smiled,
And the rose was full in blossom.

THE DEFORMED CHILD.

The following touching lines may be found applicable to many cases. One in particular we remember—the daughter of a brother minister in Texas, now in heaven:

When Summer days are long and warm, they set my little chair
Without the door, and in the sun they leave me sitting there;
Then many thoughts come to my mind, that others never know,
About myself and what I feel, and what was long ago.

There are no less than six of us, and all of them are tall
And stout as any you may see, but I was always small:
The neighbours look at me and say, I grew not with the rest;
Then Father strokes my head and says, The least are sometimes best.

But hearing I was not the same within my head one day
It came (strange thoughts that children have!) how I could change away!
And then I cried—but soon the thought brought comfort to my mind,
If I were not their own, I knew they could not be so kind.

For we are happy in our home as ever people were,
Yet sometimes Father looks as if his heart was full of care;
When things go wrong about the house, then Mother vex'd will be;
But neither of them ever spoke a cross word unto me.

And once, when all was dark, they came to kiss me in my bed,
And though they thought I slept quite sound, I heard each word they said.
"Poor little thing! to make thee well, we'd freely give our all;
But God knows best!" and on my cheek I felt a warm tear fall.

And then I long'd to sit upright, and tell them not to fret,
For that my pains were not so bad; I should be stronger yet;
But as the words came to my lips, they seem'd to die away,
And then they drew the curtain close, and left me as I lay.

And so I did not speak at all, and yet my heart was full,
And now, when I am sick and ill, for fear it makes them dull,
To see my face so pale and worn, I creep to Father's side,
And press it close against his own, and try the pain to hide.

Then upon pleasant Sundays in the long warm evening hours,
Will Father take me in his arms among the fields and flowers;
And he'll be just as pleased himself to see tha joy I'm in,
And Mother smiles and says she thinks I look not quite so thin.

But it is best within the house when nights are long and dark
And two of brothers run from school, and two come in from work;
And they are all so kind to me, the first word they will say
To Mother at the door will be, "Has Bess been well to-day?"

And though I love them all so well, one may be loved the best,
And brother John, I scarce know why, seems dearer than the rest;
But tired and cross as I may feel, when he comes in at night

When once, I know, about some work he went quite far away,
Oh! how I wished him back again and counted every day;
And when, the first of all, I heard his foot upon the stair,
Just for that once I long'd to run and leave my little chair!

Then when I look at other girls they never seem to be
So pretty as our Hannah is, or half so neat as she;
But she will soon be leaving us, to settle far away
With one she loves, and who has loved her well this many a day.

I sometimes think because I have few pleasures, and no cares,
Wherewith to please or vex myself, they like to tell me theirs;
For sister talks to me for hours, and tells me much that she Would never breathe unto a soul unless it were to me.

One night, when we were quite alone, she gave the fire a stir,
And shut the door, and showed the ring that William bought for her,
And told me all about her house, and often she has said,
That I shall come to live with them, when she and William wed.

But that I think will scarcely be, for when our Hannah goes,
What we shall do for want of her, not one among us knows;
And though there is not much in me, the place she leaves to fill;
Yet something may be always done, where there is but the will.

Then the kind doctor says, and he is very seldom wrong,
That I some day, when no one thinks, may grow both stout and strong.
And should I be, through all my life, a care unto my friends;
Yet Father says, there are worse cares than God Almighty sends!

And I will think of this, and then I never can feel dull,
But pray to God to make me good, and kind, and dutiful:
And when I think on Him that died, it makes my heart grow light,
To know that feeble things on earth are precious in His sight!

THE FATHERLESS ONE.

She was one among many, a school-girl of fifteen, growing as others grow at that interesting age. Her oval face was a clear gypsy-brown, and her shining black hair lay banded on her dimpled cheeks. A bloom like a summer rose would sometimes throw a brilliant lustre over her countenance, but it was usually thoughtful, and the occasional dropping of her long silken lashes gave a fascinating mildness to its expression. Her eyes were the softest brown, and I used to watch the big tears gather there, till they brimmed over, and rolled silently down her dark cheeks, telling, as they fell faster and more thickly, the touching tale of an orphan's woe.

A few years have gone by: she is an orphan still. The voice she missed so grievously has never sounded since. The gaze she mourned after so deeply has fallen on her no more. The lips are as silent as they were; the brow as pallid, the cheek as cold. The body she loved is crumbling; the soul,—ay, where is it? But she weeps no longer. Oh! but if a kinder voice had soothed her! If a better gaze had satisfied her! or if a mightier Father's blessing had healed her! But it was not so. There was One whose stronger love would have dried up her tide of orphan grief; but she would not. She turned away, and the chilling world has frozen it instead.

She is nearly twenty now. Woman's loveliness is in her face and the smile of pleasure plays round her mouth. She was like a drooping lily of the vale; but her head is lifted joyously in the consciousness of beauty, and the semblance is passed away. The lash falls not so closely over her dark eye as it used, and the wild satire that early girlhood fostered awhile streams out unchecked in its brilliant gaze. The soft blush of girlish modesty has forsaken her cheek, and given place to a richer bloom; the arched brow has lost its witching shade of pensiveness, and the laugh of wayward mirth sits proudly on her curling lip. She is beautiful, but it is no longer as the simple valley flower. She grows in the garden of the world, rearing her lovely blossoms among her gay peers, and opening her sunny graces in the dazzling glare of short-lived pleasure.

Is she happy? Oh! if she had a Guide in her gleesome youth! If the eye that once drooped so darkly had never more lifted its lid till it turned upward to the loving countenance of her Father in heaven: if the tear that fell in such morning fullness had never stayed till His tender hand chased it away; if her head had only ceased its throbbing upon His bosom; if her lips had only smiled when they learned to breathe the holy "Abba" of the saved! But it is not so. She would not: she turned away. Her heart beats most joyfully; but she is a Fatherless one!

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Chapter XXI.

"Yet be sure, my child,
(How'er that dream thy fancy hath beguiled,)
Some sorrow lurks to cloud thy future fate;
Thy share of tears, come early or come late,
Most still be shed; and 'twere as vain a thing
To ask of Nature one perpetual spring,
As to evade those sad autumnal hours,
Or deem thy path of life should bloom, all flowers."

While the last scene described in the preceding chapter was enacting, there might have been seen, a few miles distant, seated at an open window of a fine mansion, a pale young girl, upon whose brow the light and innocence of very childhood still lingered. Nursed in the lap of love and affluence, almost every wish gratified, care had left no lines upon the smooth forehead of Carrie Lee.—Sorrow's tears had never dimmed the lustre of her brilliant eyes; and, seated as she now was, with her gaze fixed upon the distance, sometimes with an impatient, half-anxious, expectant expression; and as often raised towards heaven with the soft twilight of gentle but faithful hope, one might read the many changes and varied emotions that ever agitates the inner life of the young girl just emerging from childhood, just realizing that she is a woman. Carrie is looking out for her friends, and as soon begins to wane, she grows more and more impatient, and something like a sigh escaped her, for she is to stand at the altar as a bride this evening, and her heart yearned for a few hours uninterrupted converse and interchange of feeling with her dear familiar friends before she should be absorbed in the deeper interests of this her last day of perfect freedom. She comprehended fully her duties and what would be required of her after marriage, and though her unlettered heart chafed at the thought of her future bonds, she has schooled her expressions into submission to her parents' wishes, for she says to herself:

"They are seeking my happiness, and I can but agree in what will give them pleasure; for if I do not love Horace Mansfield, I love none other; and I suppose I shall be content when it is all over, at least I can hope for the best, and if my parents are happy and gratified, I cannot be miserable."

Ah, poor child! a sad experience will be thine. Who but God may ever know how faithfully you struggled, or how your unmated soul yearned for sympathy and affection, and longed, with a vain longing, for the dissolution of those ties which you now are about to bind, in the delusive hope that if parents and friends are pleased, you will be so too. Time will prove how illusive, how dangerous is this belief; how unstable is this foundation for happiness in the married life. But we must not anticipate.

As the evening shadows began to lengthen, Carrie became restless, and tears of disappointment often filled her eyes. She saw not the golden sunset, the soft light of the quiet stars, or even the pale, hazy sheen of the moon; but sat gazing upon a dark object moving in the distance, before which a slight cloud of dust was perceptible. A few moments after, and a travelling carriage rolled slowly up the broad avenue leading to the dwelling, and as one by one alighted, and were ushered in, welcomed by Carrie and other members of Mr. Lee's household, the reader no doubt recognizes our little party of the old stage coach, who, after much trouble and some delay, have, however, safely arrived in time for the wedding.

An hour or two later, and Carrie was led to the altar under circumstances the most auspicious and amid splendor scarcely ever surpassed, the exciting sound of sweet music, and the smiles and congratulations of the beautiful and pure; yes, Carrie Lee stood a bride amid this scene of brilliant gaiety, with her long hair floating free in wavy curls around her innocent brow, the changeful light of her spirit's restlessness in her eye. Yes, thus she stood, this being of hope and love, about to awake from a pleasant dream, about to emerge from a trance of delight to the reality of life, with all its clouds and darkness, all its sinful changes and sad hours of grief, agony, and, perhaps, despair.

Of Horace Mansfield we have said but little, because stranger, and of foreign birth and parentage. He was a pleasing address and singularly handsome exterior, he had won the sympathy and excited the interest of all those to whom he had chosen to play the agreeable. Tall, well proportioned, in manner faultless, he truly deserved the reputation which he had gained, of being a perfect gentleman. And to those who look no deeper than the surface, he appeared eminently suited to win the heiress of Philip Leo; but to those who saw deeper, there was some thing chilling, something extremely disgusting in the bold stare of his brilliant eyes, when they were not humid with a soft twilight which they usually wore; and this becoming veil had been assumed often, and was rarely ever raised, and never voluntarily. But the most studied and habitual expression, if not natural, will at times be thrown off by circumstances over which the master has no control, and by

"Words at random sent,

And it was at such times as this that a few of the observing ones had realized that Horace Mansfield, with all his suavity of manner and perfect outward appearance, was but a whited sepulchre.

On the morning of the second day after Carrie's bridal, our heroes and heroines arrived safely at home again, and with renewed pleasure they greeted each familiar object and dear friend. Happier they were for the recreation and joyous scene in which they had participated with so much zest. But each pleasure has, in this world, its corresponding sorrow, even as one fair day is succeeded by a cloudy, dark morrow. Oh, how uncertain is life! How little these young joyous ones anticipated the scene which was next to interrupt the monotony of their quiet village life! Oh, how little they anticipated the cloud which was soon to obscure and dim the brightness of their sunny, cloudless morn! Yes, the spirit of the storm was brooding in silence over these unconscious ones. The death pall was flapping its broad wings above, like some dark night-bird, unheeding the beauty, the brightness, and living affection of all those whom it would soon envelope in each unutterable, heart-breaking anguish.

Oh, how solemn are the coffin and the shroud! How remorseless is the grave! Oh, what yearning anguish is the human heart capable of—oh, how it longs, and longs with a vain longing for the friends that are gone! And oh, who of all earth's sons and daughters but hath lost a friend? Do we not all realize every day that there indeed is—

"No union here of hearts,
That hath not here an end."

We can but shed the tear of sorrow with those that weep, and grieve to see the young stricken and oppressed by the shadows which fall around their pathway. But, oh, how much more do we sympathize with, and deplore the inevitable decree which hews the aged and lonely beneath its weight of woe! They cannot resist and struggle with grief as the young can; they have not so much to attract their minds or divert their thoughts; and when, after years of suffering, there comes days, months, and even years of quiet, uninterrupted peace and joy—when they have said unto themselves, "the storms have all past, and now in calmness, and amid the gleams of our declining sun, shall we sink to rest," to be aroused by the distant sound of an approaching tempest, to see it gathering fast above them, soon to fall with withering blight, soon to obscure every ray of light, and to sweep away with unrelenting violence the last remaining ties which binde them to earth, we mournfully realize these beautiful lines:

"That hope, when she paints her gay bow in the air,
Leaves its brilliance to fade in the night of despair,
And joy's fleeting angel ne'er sheds a glad ray,
Save the gleam of the plumage that bears him away."

And fully were they realized by Mr. and Mrs. May when, a few days after Alice returned home, she was stricken down by the disease which she had contracted some time before, and which had been silently but gradually increasing, until now there might be heard low sounds of weeping breaking upon the stillness of the midnight vigil.—In the richly decorated apartment which had been the sanctuary of youth and innocence, were now gathered an awe-stricken group, upon whom fear and gloom had fallen, for the soft rays of the shaded lamp fell upon the fair spiritueile face of Alice May, who was last passing away from all earth's glories, its false, yet fair, fleeting vanities. But serene and peaceful were her last hours. As her eyes wandered around the tearful group, resting upon those who had been parents tender and true, she murmured,

"Father, mother, this parting is not forever; and when I am gone, remember that you shielded and protected me, guided me by your wisdom, and gladdened my otherwise lonely life by your sweet counsel and affection; and, oh, weep not thus, for your vain earthly yearning weakens my heavenly hope," and then, as her gaze turned upon Percy, a fatal blush mantled her pale cheek, and her quivering lip and faltering tongue told the last weakness of her heart, as she pointed above and murmured, "the home of love is there."

Yes, there for her and you, Percy, for with these words her eye grew dim, and soon her pale, beautiful clay was covered by the death-veil; and oh, when had life possessed or death destroyed so fair a flower, or one sweet spirit around which more bright hopes had clustered? And though transient may be the sorrow of those young friends—for however sad it is to think that they will cease to grieve for one they loved so well, it is nevertheless so, for their buoyant spirits will recover their usual elasticity, and the joy which awaits them in the future will prevail over their regret. But to those aged parents will come no bright days; they have no hope that will beguile their sorrow; naught that will ever fill the void in their hearts or home. In lonely and cheerless solitude must they sink to the grave, and there will be no mourner to plant the summer flowers around their last resting-place, or "soothe their parted spirit lingering near."

SEED WORDS.

'Twas nothing—a mere idle word,
From careless lips that fell,
Forgot, perhaps, as soon as said,
And purposeless as well.

But yet, as on the passing wind
Is borne the little seed,
Which blooms unheeded, as a flower,
Or as a noisome weed,—

So often will a single word,
Unknown, its end fulfill,
And bear, in seed, the flower and fruit
Of actions good or ill.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

THE GONE-BEFORE.

Alas! we are prone to say:
We have fallen on evil hours,
When a tripped spirit floats away
Like the breath of the fading flowers,
And a seed, on the wings of a dying day,
Is borne to the heavenly bowers!

Yet toil has a right to rest,
And the wearied a right to go,
And Love has a right to save the best
From the weight of the coming blow.
We gaze on the joys of the purified blessed
Through the tears of a selfish woe.

'Tis blood, not tears, should fall
O'er the brave who breathe no more,
For empty the breach in the crumbling wall
Which they manned in the days of yore,
And who shall respond to the trumpet call
To rescue the banner they bore?

Can the warrior now survey
How the distant combat wears?
Let him learn to wait—nor rashly say
That the valiant have left no heirs—
Till he watch the deeds of the changing day
From a crowning height like theirs;

Till the smoke of the fray
Shall have rolled away
On the breath of their answered prayers.

Tribute of Respect.

Whereas, it has pleased the Great Architect of the Universe to strike down in our midst our beloved brother, EDWARD W. KING, a member of this Lodge, who departed this life at his residence, in Perry county, Ala., August 10th, 1860, in the midst of his usefulness: and, whereas, we deem it our duty, in our capacity as a Lodge, to bear testimony to his purity of life, nobility of character, and sterling worth, therefore, Resolved, That in the life and character of our deceased brother, we recognize all the virtues of a sincere christian, true mason, honorable man and gentleman, and that we recommend him as a model of imitation to all those who aspire to those noble virtues.

Resolved, That we deeply and sincerely sympathize with his stricken and bereaved widow and children, and invoke upon them the blessings of Him who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, and point them to his heavenly promise in their behalf.

Resolved, That the furniture of this Lodge be clothed in mourning for one year, and that the members wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

PRISCILLA D., daughter of the late Willis Atkins, was born in Montgomery county, Ala., May 2d, 1828, where she lived until her marriage with William A. Tharp, April 8, 1847. Brother Tharp brought her immediately to her home in De Soto parish, La., where it pleased the good Lord to take her to her home in heaven July 27, 1860. She joined the Methodist Church in 1852. Her conversion seemed to be a regular growth in grace, neither enthusiastic or lukewarm, but pre-eminently gifted with the ability of making others happy. She was gifted by nature with a good mind, blessed with a liberal education, and with accomplishments not of the mind alone, but of the heart—benevolent, amiable and courteous. The most striking trait of her character was devotion to and confidence in those she loved.—She delighted in speaking of her absent friends, not of their faults, but of their merits. Forgetful of self, she was an affectionate daughter, a devoted wife, a kind, though firm mother, a faithful, trusting christian, whose hope of eternal life was firmly fixed on redeeming love. When Bro. Tharp asked her if she felt resigned to death, she replied, "I have no fears, though I have long hoped to live with you, my husband, and assist in the training of our dear little children; but if it is the will of my Heavenly Father that I should go, I am quite resigned. I would not resist His will. And now, my dear husband, while I am in my senses and have my speech, let me tell of I desire to say, and bid you all farewell." Press on in the discharge of your duty, be faithful to your trust, teach our sweet children to live for God, and we shall all meet soon again in heaven." She then embraced them all, husband, children and sisters; and as she took her only brother by the hand, asked him now to give his heart to God. She then called the servants, thanked them for those kind attentions, bade them be faithful to God, and charged prepare for death, and all to meet her

NEW ORLEANS, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1860.

THE THAMES BELOW LONDON BRIDGE.

LONDON, Aug. 20, 1860.

After waiting mero than n week for a day of clear sunshine, on which to take n steamboat excursion down the river, that we might have a fair view of the stream and the notable things on its shores, one is reminded of the saying of a gifted American author, that to wait for a fair day in London is to wait for the millennium, and we start at n venture, on a cloudy morning, with some bright gleams of sunlight. Not wishing to be encumbered with an over-coat as well as an umbrella in August, we start without one, for which we had to pay dearly in the loss of comfort before the close of the day.—Starting from the pier at London Bridge, in the "Doris," a narrow, contracted, dingy-looking concern, which is one of the "dimond line of packsts," with very inferior accommodations even to passengers who pay for first-class seats, we found ourselves in company with n crowd of strangers, glad like us to escape for n few hours from the smoke and din and contaminated nir of the crowded metropolis. Our first-class tickets secured for us the poor privilege of sitting aft on the deek on a hard bench, with nothing overhead to protect us from the inclemency of the weather, and even that seat could only be kept by remaining on it all tho time, as there was not room enough for all to be sented. Baskets well filled with provisions, hottles of milk and of nle were freely patronized by the passengers soon after we started, there being no pleasure for John Bull even in a short excursion without a plentiful supply of meat and drink. For tho accommodation of those who have not been economical enough to provide for themselves, one of the waiters perambulated the deck, fore and aft, crying out in the most musical cockney tones, "any orders for 'um or beef sandwiches, lemonade, ginger beer, porter, or stont," while a band of meadicant musicians made the air vocal with their lively strains. A shower of rain begins to deseend, and we go below into the best cabin, but finding it a dismal contracted place and already too full for comfort, we return to the deck, heist an umbrella and stand almost shivering in the cold wind, and sigh for, not one of our floating palnces on the Hudson, the James River, or the Mississippi, but for one of our American ferry hoats.—After n while there is a suspension of the rain, and the sunbeams begin to struggle through the clouds, and a jolly, rosy-faced Englishwoman, with n smile of antisfnction exclaims, "O, it's n very fine dny now!" and we begin to look with some satisfaction on the scenery around us.

We are leaving the great commercial emporium of the world behind us, and as our little steamer glides rapidly down the stream we have on each side of us a black forest of shipping, containing a vast variety of steam and sailing vessels, which have congregnted here, laden with commodities from all parts of the earth. To one accustomed to the broad rivers of America the river divested of its shipping would appear small, but passing through the narrow channel left by the ships on each side, it appears less than it really is, and we cannot help smiling at the epithet applied to it by the anthor of the Seasons,

"Majestic king of floods!"

What more could he have said if he had seen the Father of Waters, or Niagara's tremendous cataract?

The enterprising merchants of London have, however, for the narrowness of the river by constructing magnificent docks on both its sides. It is a singular sight to the stranger, when he views those great collections of vessels scarcely floating in the midst of a densely populated district surrounded by lofty and commodious watehenses, and with the most admirable conveniencies for loading nnd unloading goods. Thus from twenty to twenty-five thousand vessels which annually sail up the Thames can he accomodnted. Some idea of the extent of these docks may be formed, when we say that Saint Katherine's Docks, the most recently constructed, occupy 24 nores within onter wall of un aren once occupied by the hospital of St. Katherine and 1250 other houses, in which lived a population of nearly 12,000 persons! We can only got a glimpse of this great work as we pass down the river; it would take several hours to walk around it and examine it in detail; and this is only the first of more than a dozen that are within a point-blank range on the Isle of Dogs, and which is only made an Island by cutting a ship canal across a narrow peninsula, one of the passengers points to the ship yard on our left where the Great Eastern was built, and entertains us with a long account of the building of that mammoth vessel. To our right, on the south bunk of the river, four miles below London Bridge, is Greenwich Hospital, originally commenced as a royal palace by the luxurious Stuarts, but belog left by them in an unfinished State, it was converted into an hospital for seamen by William and Mary in 1694, and enlarged and beautified by suceeeding sovereigns. It is composed of four collossal piles of buildings, forming an architectural group which the critics affirm to be unparalcled for beauty in modern England. In the rear of the hospital, beautifully situated on o hill, is the National Observatory, in which many most valuable astronomical discoveries have been made. Those places would amply repay a visit, and afford instruction as well as amusement to the intelligent traveller. But we are passing down the stream, which, as it flows, gradually becomes wider and clearer, until wo bogin to see some reason for the poetical epithet, "silvery Thames," so often applied to this river, and to look with admiration upon the scene before us.

Eight miles from London Bridge wo pass by Woolwich, in the county of Kent, one of the most interesting and important places within the port of London for the maritime and military operations of Great Britain; possessing a commodious dookyard and arsenal, barracks for troops, depots for all the appointments of war-purposes, for the defence of the country, and a Royal Military Academy. One who sees this place from the deck of a steamboat can form little idea of the vast quantity of materials for warlike purposos now contained in this place, which was once a small and peaceful village of fishermen. Any one interested in theso things may here see machines at work running down conical bullets for Minie rifles, at the rate of 200,000 n day, n thousand children using their little hands in the manufacture of cartridges nnd percussion caps, and a whole regiment of artizans who spend the best part of their time in fabricating the most horrible engines of destruction. These grim facts of seen here nnd elsewhere on this crowded island, show conclusively that the reign of the Prince of Peace has not yet been established even in so-called Christian lands.

Our attention is attracted hy a pleasant-looking group of houses situated on a rising ground on the Essex side of the river, and we are told by a stalwart Kentishman with whom we have scraped an acquaintance, that Purfleet is before is, and that the name is a corruption of "Poor Fleet," a phrase used by Queen Elizabeth when she sat there and saw her fleet going, as she feared, to be destroyed by the Spanish Armada. But, as the event shewed, the fortunes of war are very uncertain, and there is a God who "rides upon the whirlwind and directs the storm," and who can, by an exercise of his omnipotence, disconcert the schemes of the proudest invader, even when they style their armaments "invincible." This naturally led us to talk about the schemes of Napoleon III, and the project now under discussion in the British Parliament for the fortification of the principal places in the British Islands. We soon found that our Kentish friend held the whole scheme in contempt; believing, as he said, in no fortifications except the wooden walls of England and the bravo hearts and strong arms of her sons. "Give us," said he, with enthusiasm, "fortifications of flesh and blood! What should we do doing while they were landing an army? They know better than to try it!"

The river here is about half a mile wide, and there are two rows of stakes on the Essex side to prevent the washing of the stream from making inroads on the land. Large powder magazines are kept in floating vessels near the shore with red flags floating from them to warn the steamers from approaching too near. As we approach the wharf of a beautiful town on the south bank, swarming with people, we see with pleasure something of a more peaceful character, and in large capitals on a signboard we read,

ROSHERVILLE,
The Queen of Gardens!
KENT,
The Garden of England!
ROSHERVILLE,
The Garden of Kent!

Breathe its pure air, denoted by exquisite flowers and numerous birds."

Here, for the moderate sum of sixpence, the sons of toil are admitted into an earthly paradise, if we may believe the placards that meet the eye in various parts of the streets of London. One of them speaks in this wise:

"If you want a treat, go there and spend a happy day. Go and see and be astonished!

"Throw physic to the dogs,
If health, the choicest gift of Heaven, be dear,
Those who have lost it may find it here."

Time would not allow us to accept this pressing invitation, as we wished to walk about Gravesend, a small town and port of entry, about 30 miles below London Bridge, a place whose chief interest lay in its being the burial place of Pocahontas, the peerless Indian princess, who saved the life of Capt. Smith, and who was the first of her race to be baptized in the Christian faith. Passing through the narrow streets of this singular looking old town, and escaping as soon as we could from the crowd of servants exceedingly anxious to lead us to the best hotels, coffee-houses, etc., we soon found our way to the parish Church of Gravesend, where we wandered for some time among the tombs, seeking in vain for the one we desired to see. Time's effacing fingers make sad work with the memorials of the dead in these old English church-yards. We found here, as elsewhere, that we can seldom read an inscription more than two hundred years old. We sat down on a tomb opposite the steeple door, and mused for a while on the solemn scene. It is a brick church and steeple presenting no attractions as a work of art, and we knew nothing of the multitudes who once worshipped within it, and whose bones were mouldering in the earth around us; but as we read on a square block inserted in the wall of the church, the other figures being obliterated, there was no eloquence in the simple record that made an indelible impression on the heart with regard to the vanity of earthly things and the importance of looking higher than this transitory scene for permanent happiness.

After writing awhile, we were glad to see a gentleman approach with the keys of the church, and we went in with him, but could find no trace of Pocahontas, nor could we find any one in town who had any knowledge of her or of the place of her burial. Thinking perhaps we were in error with regard to the place, we visited several other churches, but found them all closed, and had to give up the search. We were, however, well paid for the fatigue of our walk about the town and its vicinity by the many things that presented themselves quite interesting to American eyes and ears, but which would make this communication too long if we were to notice them. One thing must be noticed before we return to London. As we sat at the table of a restaurant at Gravesend enjoying our dinner, our attention was attracted by a handbill, headed as follows:—

"REV. WM MITCHELL,

Colored minister of the fugitive slaves, Toronto, C. W., will deliver a lecture on their moral and religious condition. Many interesting details will be given as to the escape of slaves from the United States to the British Territory, in which he was engaged for 12 years and among whom he has been a missionary in Canada for five years."

The placard goes on to state that the Rev. gentleman comes well recommended by Rev. Drs. Candlish, Alexander Bonar, Hamilton, Baptist W. Noel, and others, and that a collection for building chapels and Sabbath schools for the fugitives in Canada, will be taken up.

It is really amazing that these reverend divines should be so ignorant of the true state of things in America as to suppose it to be their duty to lend their influence to this "underground railroad" system, and to making contributions in England to support a set of unprincipled idlers in Canada, while they have such a fearful amount of unrelieved misery at home. Again, it is remarkable that it should be necessary for these lecturers to come to England to raise money while there is so much sympathy expressed for their cause in our Northern and Eastern States. If they would make some provision for the poor creatures who have been persuaded to leave their Southern homes, instead of leaving them to perish, or to become mendicants on the face of the earth, we should have more confidence in their professions love to the negro.

We returned from Gravesend to London Bridge in another packet of the "Diamond Line," which was still more crowded than the other and with people who either had more liquor in them or less politeness. Each of us [illegible] near them until they were compelled to leave their seats; others were eating shrimps and throwing the skins on the deck, when they might easily have thrown them into the river. The weather was extremely cold; and when we went down into the wretched place below, which did not deserve the name of cabin or saloon, we found it so crowded with people feasting on "ham and beef sandwiches, ginger beer, porter, stout, shrimps," etc., etc., that we were driven to the deck again, where, by standing in a wind from which we could find no shelter, the writer caught a severe cold, and had to keep his bed all the next day, fully satisfied that as far as river steamboats are concerned, John Bull is far behind Brother Jonathan, and that any one in feeble health, who tries to benefit himself by such a trip, makes a woeful mistake.

JOHN BAYLEY.

A CORNISH GIANT.

Nothing is perfected in a moment. It was only Cadmus who could raise a crop of full-grown men, ready armed and prepared for action, without the proface of nurses and pedagogues; but Cadmus was as exceptional as his corps of Dragon's-teeth Volunteers. Elsewhere, we find men and things with long periods of infancy and immaturity—wherein dwells the law of their growth; and steam and railroads have had their times of gradual development like the rest. They have not sprung up in a night, nor grown to their perfection in a generation. It is so long ago as 1602 that Mr. Beaumont, of Newcastle, first laid down wooden rails for carriage traffic: an invention improved by Mr. John Curr, in 1776, into a cast-iron railway, nailed to wooden sleepers, for the benefit of the Duke of Newcastle's colliery at Sheffield. For this piece of interference with the vested rights of ponderous labor, Mr. John Curr was forced to fly, and hide himself in a wood four days, in fear of his life, which the colliers thought was better in their keeping than in his. Steam has been still longer in coming to its maturity. Steam was one of the Century of Inventions published by the Marquis of Worcester, generations ago; hints of even earlier discoveries of the dangerous properties of that elastic vapor, lie, ball hidden, half revealed, among the dust and mildew of the past. Thus, steam and railroads have had a longer term of existence than we generally give them credit for, and have not risen all at once to their present full-blown condition of vitality.

The railroad came to its majority first. While tramroads were almost as good as they are now, the carriages that ran on them were of barbarous inequality. From the depths of his inner consciousness, however, Leupold, a German philosopher, did, in 1723, fashion out the idea of a high-pressure steam-engine, which idea he set down in good sound German letters in the Theatrum Machinarum. The idea obtained various supporters, conscious and unconscious. Some projectors, certainly, wanted to propel their railway carriages Chinese fashion, by huge sails; but most of them proposed steam power on the high-pressure system: mixing this up, however, with an earlier and still more favorite project—that of traction by steam on common roads, without the aid of rails. This was Savery's great dream; and Watt—who knew nothing of Leupold's notion but who abhorred the high-pressure principle—included this traction-engine in the specification of his patent of 1769, almost at the same time as when Moore, the London linendraper, took out his patent of moving carriages by steam. Yet the first actual steam-carriage was made by the Frenchman Cugnot; but his model proved unruly, and threw itself in a headlong manner over a wall, wherefore it was considered dangerous, and was suppressed accordingly. Then, in 1772, Oliver Evans, an American, made a steam-carriage for common roads; so did William Symington, one of the inventors of steam-boats; but neither creation came to any good. Symington's, indeed, was exhibited in Edinburgh; but the roads were so bad that it could not be used or brought into any practical use. Two years before this, in 1784, William Murdoch, assistant of James Watt, made one on the high-pressure principle, which went on three wheels, was a foot high, and was worked by means of a spirit-lamp. But the Lilliputian ran away one night, and frightened the parish rector out of his wits; he, being officially more versed in demonology than in mechanics, taking it for a fiery imp of Satan, that had escaped, roaring, from his master. Finally Trevithick, a valiant Cornish man, with whom we have specially to do in this paper, took the matter in hand.

Trevithick was a pupil of Murdoch's and though ignorant of Leupold, was nevertheless as favourable to the high-pressure principle as Watt was averse to it. He made a steam-carriage for common roads, set it in motion, and away went the creature, tearing like mad along the road to Plymouth, breaking down walls, rushing into the gardens of sober-minded gentlemen intent only on their roses and their peaches, careering through toll-gates flung open free of pay by terrified tollmen—who thought that this, too, was an invention and a device of Satan; perhaps his ordinary chariot, with himself inside, sitting among the live embers. As Trevithick and one Vivian were steaming along the road, the latter caught sight of a closed toll-bar, just as they had turn down the front rails of a gentleman's garden. "Captain" Vivian called to his partner to slacken speed, which he did, and came dead up to the gate, which was opened like lightning by the toll-keeper.

"What have us got to pay?" asked Captain Vivian, careful as to honesty if reckless as to grammar.

"Nu—on—un—nul" stammered the poor man, trembling in every limb, with his teeth chattering as if he had got the ague.

"What have us got to pay, I ask?"

"No—nóth—nothing to pay! My de—dear Mr. Devil, do drive on as fast as ever you can! Nothing to pay!" This story rests on the authority of Coleridge; and, "if not true, is too well found," as the Italians say, to be overlooked.

Trevithick's wonderful engine, after performing such exploits, and generally choosing to upset its passengers in a hedge, or over a stone wall, midway to their destination, was exhibited in London. Its owner and originator showing it off, with wonderful effects, in Lord's Cricket-ground: carrying it along the New-road and Gray's Inn-lane, down to that coach-builder's who had supplied the phaeton that ran with it. The next day it was exhibited in a cattle's shop, and the machinery worked for the pleasure of all comers; then it was run on a temporary tramroad laid down on the spot now called Eustonsquare, and thrown open to the public as an ordinary sight of the time. But on the second day Trevithick, "in one of his usual freaks," closed the exhibition, and left hundreds waiting round the ground in a state of great wrath. The engine was about the size of an orchestra drum, and could be attached to a phaeton or other carriage.

But a more useful triumph over difficulties was the railway locomotive, which Trevithick was the first to make; and which was used for the Merthyr Tydvil Railway in 1804. This was an engine of an eight-inch cylinder, placed horizontally, as at present, with a four feet six inch stroke, and which "drew after it upon the railroad as many carriages as carried ten tons of bar iron, from a distance of nine miles, which it performed without any supply of water to that contained in the boiler at the time of setting out, travelling at the rate of five miles an hour." This was considered a great triumph at the time; but Trevithick, like all the earlier locomotive projectors, was retarded and much troubled by the false idea that smooth wheels on a smooth rail would have no bite, and that, when dragging a heavy weight, they would just slip round and round, and do nothing else. Consequently, he put sundry rough projections on his wheels, much on the same plan as "roughing" a horseshoe; and even we may well wonder at the five miles an hour, with ten tons of bar iron, under all these disadvantages. Trevithick made another engine for the Wylam waggon-way, which at first could not be get to move at all, and, when it did, it flew all to pieces, as its best exposition of the laws of motion. Near this Wylam waggon-way George Stephenson lived, whom all other men's railway failures and short-comings set thinking and planning how he could make things work more easily together. And the result was an engine "which included the following important improvements on all previous attempts—namely, simple and direct communication between the cylinder and the wheels rolling upon the rails; joint adhesion of all the wheels attained by the use of connecting rods; and, finally, a beautiful method of exciting the combustion of the fuel by employing the waste steam, which had formerly been allowed uselessly to escape into the air."

This was in 1815; but, we have no business with such a date yet, and must go back to the time of Trevithick's traction-engine and Lord's Cricket-ground.

Shortly after the creation of that "chariot of the Devil," which ran streaming and shrieking along the road from Camborne to Plymouth, Trevithick and Vivian took out a patent for the application of high pressure to steam-engines, and erected many high-pressure engines in Wales and elsewhere; which, however, were of less value than they might have been, owing to that fallacy of the rough wheels. For though Trevithick was undoubtedly in advance of his age, and saw the coming of much that neither he was a man of vast genius and grand ideas; yet he could not look to everything, and it was reserved for another and a more practical man to disencumber the wheels of locomotives, and take them out of leading strings. But Trevithick was very vast, very universal, in his science. In the Catalogue of the South Kensington Museum he is described as "inventor and constructor of the first high pressure steam-engine, and of the first steam-carriage used in England; constructor of a tunnel beneath the Thames, which he completed to within a hundred feet of the proposed terminus, and was then compelled to abandon the undertaking; inventor and constructor of steam-engines and machinery for the mines of Peru (capable of being transported in mountainous districts), by which he succeeded in restoring the Peruvian mines to prosperity; also of coining-machinery for the Peruvian Mint, and of furnaces for purifying silver ore by fusion; also inventor of other improvements in steam-engines, impelling carriages, hydraulic-engines, propelling and towing vessels, discharging and stowing ships' cargoes, floating docks, construction of vessels, iron buoys, steam-boilers, corking, obtaining fresh water, heating apartments," &c. Surely a sufficiently wide range for one mind to travel over! It was he also who conceived the first idea of the screw-propeller; for nothing seemed to come amiss to him, and his science had a kind of prescient prophetic character only found when there is genius as well as knowledge.

That tunnelling under the Thames was a strange affair. It was the second time the thing had been tried, Ralph Dodd being the first of the unsuccessful borers. In 1809, Trevithick raised a large sum by subscription, and began his work at Rotherhithe. Of course he kept too near the bottom of the river: his object in this, being to save both labor and expense; but he met with no harm until he was nine hundred and thirty feet under the river, when he got into a hole at the muddy bottom; and once, a piece of uncooked beef which had fallen from one of the ships, drifted into the works. He stopped the hole and set to work again, always under greater difficulties, both pecuniary and engineering, than any which his successful successor, Brunel, had to encounter. He made from four to ten feet of excavation a day, and soon got to a thousand feet. And now Mr. Hyde Clarke shall tell the rest:

"On arriving at this distance, according to a previous arrangement with the committee, Trevithick was to receive a hundred guineas, which, after the verification of the work by a surveyor, were paid to him. According to a contemporary—and the end of which seems to be in perfect keeping with Trevithick's character—the surveyor reported to the subscribers confirming the measurement, but asserting that the line had been run a foot or so on one side. This statement, which, if well founded, was not material, Trevithick took in high dudgeon, and chose to consider as a severe reflexion on his engineering. His Cornish blood was excited; and, with his usual impetuosity, he set to work to disprove the assertion without any regard to his own interests or those of the subscribers. He is said to have adopted the absurd contrivance of making a hole in the roof of the tunnel at low water, and pushing up a series of joint rods, which were to be received by a joint party in a boat, and then observed from the shore. On the prosecution of this scheme Trevithick was engaged below, and as delays ensued in fitting together the rods, the gulley formed by the opening in the roof at length admitted so much water as to make retreat necessary. With an inborn courage, worthy of a better cause, he refused to move first, but sent the men before, and very nearly fell a sacrifice to his devotion. It has been already observed that the driftway was parallel to the bed of the river, and therefore curved. It necessarily happened that the water would lodge, as in a syphon, at the bottom of a curve, at which part, on Trevithick's arrival, he found so much water as hardly to enable him to escape; and as he got up the slope on the other side, and climbed the ladder, the water rose with him at his neck. The work thus ended, after having reached 1011 feet, being within 100 feet of its proposed terminus, and is a melancholy monument at once of his folly and his skill."

Many great schemes and notable creations came after this practical failure and scientific success of the Thames Tunnel; but the chief part of what was done went to the advancement and better working of the Cornish mines, the increased prosperity of which is principally due to Richard Trevithick and his engines. "To the use of high-pressure steam, in conjunction with the cylindrical boiler, also invented by Mr. Trevithick," says Mr. Williams, one of the principal mine-owners in Cornwall, "I have no hesitation in saying that the greatly increased duty of our Cornish pumping-engines since the time of Watt is mainly owing." The working power now attained doubles and trebles that of the old Boulton and Watt engine, the cylindrical boiler saving at least one-third in the quantity of coal previously consumed. Certainly the man who first put the fire in the boiler instead of under it, who introduced the system of high-pressure steam, made the first locomotive, trebled the working power of engines, and saved one-third of coal in the working, did great things for the world of steam.

Now we come to the most romantic and stirring period of Trevithick's career. In 1811 M. Uville, a Swiss gentleman, living in Lima, came to England to see what could be done for the silver mines in the Peruvian mountains, which had been abandoned from the impossibility of getting machinery out there which could clear them of water. But M. Uville did not meet with much encouragement. The difficulty of transporting cumbrous machinery on the backs of feeble llamas over the Cordilleras, and the difficulty of working the engines even if they could be get there, seemed imperative.—Watt and the rest gave no hope, and Uville was in despair. On the eve of departing from England with the conviction that the water in the Peruvian mines must stay there till the day of judgment, the Swiss gentleman chanced to see a small working model of Trevithick's engine in a shop window near Fitzroy square. This model he carried out with him, and saw it working successfully on the high mountain ridge of the Sierra de Pasco. Flushed with hope and busy with projects, Uville returned to England, having obtained from the viceroy the privilege of working some of the abandoned mines. On his way hither he was speaking with a fellow-traveler of his plans, his model, and his desire to discover the maker of that model; whereon, his fellow-passengor, Mr. Teague, said quietly that he was a relation of Trevithick, and could bring them together within a few hours of their arrival. The result of that bringing together was, that in September, 1814, three engineers and nine of Trevithick's engineers—Watt and Boulton would not touch the enterprise, and laughed the whole thing to scorn—embarked for Lima and the rich silver mines of Peru. Uville and his charge landed under a royal salute, expectation being raised to its highest, and in due time the engines, which had been "simplified to their greatest extent, so divided as to form adequate loads for the weakly llama, and the beams and boilers made in several pieces, were transported over precipices where a stone may be thrown for a league."

The engine was erected at Lauriecocha, in the province of Tarma, and the first shaft of the Santa Rosa mine was drained to perfection. In 1817, Trevithick, hearing of this success, gave up family and fortune, home, wife, and children, and embarked for South America. The whole of Lima was in a ferment. When he landed he was received with the highest honors; his arrival was officially announced in the Government Gazette; the viceroy met him with enthusiasm, and the Lord Warden of the Mines was ordered to escort him with a guard of honor to the "sent of his future labors." When the people found that his engines cleared the mines of water, that the mines yielded double produce, and that the coining-machinery was increased six-fold, they were beside themselves with joy. Trevithick was created a marquis and grandee of old Spain, and the Lord Warden of the Mines proposed to raise a silver statue in honor of this commercial Las Casas, this Columbus of the Cordilleras, this greatest of all living engineers, this most valiant of Cornishmen, Don Ricardo Trevithick.

Everything looked bright until the revolution began, and the Cornish engineer found himself in a sufficiently disagreeable position between the two parties. The patriots kept him in the mountains, a kind of honorable captivity, holding him as the Plutus of the war; while the royalists, holding him as precisely the same thing, "as the great means where by the patriots obtained the sinews of war, ruined his property wherever they could, and mutilated his engines." They sold his shares, and alienated his mines; Trevithick, never very patient, soon determined to put an end to this kind of thraldom, and so made his escape by stealth, ran many dangers, but finally cleared himself and his liberty from the oppressive love and veneration of the mountain patriots. On the 9th of October, 1827, he returned to England, bringing a pair of spurs as the sole remnant of the colossal fortune made—but not realized—in the Peruvian mines. But before he returned he spent four years in Costa Rica, in the countries now so well known as the route of the Nicaraguan transit, and the scene of General Walker's filibuster warfare. Here, he mined and projected mines, had magnificent designs, and forges to pass; but terial immense permanent good for himself out of anything—not though he had an estate with a mountain of copper ore on it, from which he proposed to lay down a railroad to the sea, that so the working of it might be profitable.

After this return from South America, we hear but little of Trevithick. All we know is, that he prepared a petition to Parliament, wherein, after distinctly stating his claims on his country by reason of the superiority of his machinery, he asks for some grant or remuneration. The saving to the Cornish mines alone, by the use of his engines, he calculates to be 100,000*l.* per annum: adding that but for his invention many of these mines, which produce 2,000,000*l.* per annum, must have been abandoned. Before presenting this petition, Trevithick met with a moneyed partner, who supplied him with the means of perfecting his "never-ceasing inventions." And, as this was all he wanted, the petition was laid on one side, and never taken up again. In 1833 he died, at Deptford, in Kent, and since then his name has almost died out too. Mr. Hyde Clarke is the only man who has attempted a sustained biography of him, and his biography is not longer than this notice. Though the Institution of Civil Engineers offered a reward for a full and sufficient biography of one of our greatest of the craft, no one has yet come forward to claim it. The reputation of Trevithick has suffered, as often happens, because more practical men took up his ideas, and worked them into greater notice. It is well said by one of his friends and greatest admirers, "his reputation has been purposely kept back by the partisans of Watt, on account of the high-pressure engine; of Stephenson, on account of the locomotive; and of Brunel, on account of the Thames Tunnel. But as he was clearly the inventor, not only of the high-pressure steam-engine and the steam-carriage, but also of that boiler without which (or a modification of which) no steamboat could have ventured to cross the Atlantic, he has undoubtedly contributed more to the physical progress of mankind than any other individual of the present century." The first part of this statement may be questioned; the Stephensons and Brunels having been leading members of the institution when it offered a prize for Trevithick's memories. Thanks to Mr. Hyde Clarke, Mr. Edmonds, Mr. Neville Burnard, and, some others, we may hope for the fuller recognition of his merits in days to come, and the application to them of that famous old motto, the best of its kind, "Let him who has deserved it, bear the palm!"

Trevithick was born in 1771, in the parish of Sellogap, in Penwith, the most western hundred of Cornwall. His father was a purser of the mines, and one day was not a little amazed when his son Richard, not yet twenty-one, and by no means learned, was made engineer to several mines—rather a more responsible situation than the one the father himself held. It is said that he remonstrated with the gentleman-proposers, but they had their own ideas, and Richard was appointed. The lad was not well educated in common things: that is certain. He could not speak good English; he could never write a good hand; he was backward in figures, and he knew but little save his own special subject. But he was sufficiently colossal there. In person he was tall and finely made; six feet high, and broad in proportion. His muscular strength was remarkable, for he could lift two blocks of tin, placed one above the other, and weighing seven hundred-weight. His manners were blunt but unassuming, and his dress was somewhat peculiar for the time and mode: a dress-coat with the skirts very broad, broad trousers: all his clothes made loose. In this small matter, as in larger matters, he went before public opinion and the time. He married and had children, as became a good citizen; had his picture painted by Linnell (now in the South Kensington Museum), and his bust done in marble by Neville Barnard; but he has had no statue, no monument, no biography, and his name is hardly known even by vague report, to people to whom Watt, Stephenson, and Brunnel are household words.—This is not just; not a meet division of that golden ore of fame which all brave men and gallant souls have the right to demand from posterity and their own generation alike, where they have done their work well, and have borne the heat of the day without flinching. When will Trevithick have done for him what Stephenson, and Watt, and Crompton, and Arkwright, have had done for them, that so the world may know what manner of man he was, and may learn the guise under which his spirit lived, while his body dwelt upon the earth? His history is a good subject for a biographer; that South American time alone is, in itself, a romance, and his sons, who are still alive, could possibly furnish material for a pleasant volume.—All the Year Round.

Rev. J. Chundor Gangooly, a Brahmin convert, recently delivered a lecture in London. In the course of his address, the rev. gentleman corrected some popular errors concerning the Car of Juggernaut. It was no part of the worship for a devotee to cast himself under the wheels of the car. Accidents sometimes happened, and people were killed in the crush; but Juggernaut demanded no human sacrifice. He was the Brahmin God of love, peace and mercy.

ISOLATION: OR ALONE WITH GOD.

BY LUTHA FONTELLE.

Miss Harper opened her portfolio and taking out a paper said, "Here is a stray leaf that will open to you one phase of that isolated life, not wholly sad as you might suppose." And she placed it in my hands. "Do not allow it to grieve your gentle heart, for I learned by degrees, first resignation, and then a quiet happiness that circumstances had no power to disturb."

I glanced over it. There were traces of tears that would fall as she wrote. My own eyes grew dim, and though Miss Harper's face was radiant with the quiet happiness of the present, I went, to my room to read it there, and to indulge freely my awakened sympathies.—It was a brief page from the inner leaves of the heart, but it clearly revealed the tenderness and faith that pervaded her being, and invested her with an etherial robe of spiritual beauty. When I had looked it over, I called it—

ALONE WITH GOD.

"My spirit is lonely and sad in its desolation. Thorn seems a gathered fountain of irrepressible thoughts and feelings which I strive to bury deep in my being, but not a touch of memory or a glance of the imagination, the flood-gates are burst open and a stream of feeling deluges the soul. Ever when not engaged in active duty, does this fountain overflow; it will not be restrained, and my whole nature weeps its loneliness. As I bowed before its power on entering my room to-night, the not now thought would rise, why, why am I gifted with such an appreciation, such a yearning for companionship, not of the many, but of the genial few that is here wholly denied to me. Alas! I have no beauty to interest, no grace, no powers to win it from strangers. It seems necessary to a healthful flow of thought and emotion, and I suffer in its absence.

"If I read, such a crowd of images and emotions excite me, that not able to impart, and thus relieve and subdue them, the intensity agonizes and I fly the author to escape them. If I walk or ride, such beauty everywhere in nature fills my soul, that the desire to share it with one who feels equally unsatisfied, so long saddens me inexpressibly, and with full eyes, and a fuller heart, I stretch my arms to the lake and to the sky, and exclaim, O nature, take me to thy bosom, let me commune with thy spirit, let its beauty and sublimity satisfy me, let me talk to thee as to a friend. And I gaze into the lake, and it breathes a quiet spirit, deep and calm, mirroring in its purity, reflecting by its placidity, all things in the earth and sky; yet untainted by the one when mirrored and brightened by the other.

I receive the lesson and grow thoughtful with a grave thankfulness. I glance involuntarily upward, and a thousand eyes look with searching kindness into my soul and speak of holiness and infinity. Their clear purity shining out from the far other, and nature's voice of blended harmonies calm the high waves of feeling, and move the fountain to its depths. They elevate and enlarge the thought until the soul, laid bare before its maker, humble and grateful, asks no more of earth but to fulfill its duties, gladly and wisely, but pleads with trusting earnestness that will not be denied, for, unless with the Father-spirit, communo full and clear. Thus nature leads us through her various channels up to God, and there alone the soul is satisfied."

Reading it, I understood more clearly the dreary influence of that uncongenial situation, in which her heart had need of heavenly love and strength to prevent it from withering or becoming coldly insensible. At first, but for her love of nature and upward-tending thought, she might have become morbidly sensitive. But as a Christian, her living, loving faith sustained her heart under the pressure of untoward circumstances, so that instead of overpowering her energies, they developed inner strength.

I can not deny myself the pleasure of giving you another page from this loving, faithful heart. It is a few passages from a letter written by a distinguished clergyman:

"I have just come in from the prayer-meeting, a holy place, for God was there, and the newly redeemed spoke in the beautiful language of our Father's kingdom, an unknown tongue to the multitude. How ready is God to bless us; to encourage every sincere desire, every earnest effort to obey Him. Let us draw ever nearer to Him. He is gracious and will fit us to enjoy His presence by assimilating at last our souls to His pure spirit. Then we should be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is. I pant for greater activity in His service. Who can call that a sacrifice which God requires, that will draw us to Him and render us more like our great exemplar. O no, that is a sacrifice which removes us from His presence, which veils the blissful light of His recounted countenance. His "first love," how sweet it is, how truthful, how submissive. It is like a streamlet which has wandered darkly in subterranean channels, shunning the pure light, but won at last, glides timidly into the warm sunbeams, and pure and vivified mirrors in its clear bosom the blue sky that bends all lovingly over it, with no shade on its face save when the clouds obscure the sun, or waving trees link close their loving arms above, and shut out thus the heavenly vision; and flowing on, and on it deeper grows, and higher skies are imaged in its calmer depths, and gathering fresh power, it onward rolls, checked by no barrier slight, no luring shades, until majestic, yet obedient still, it conquers all and loses itself joyfully in the great ocean of unclouded love.

When shall I see again thy rapt eye kindling with heatific visions. Shall I hear once more thy voice in close communion with our Father-God? I would my spirit's pulse might often thus be quickened. O, in our Father's mansion, our proper home, we may with all we love, hymn "sinless praise to the sinless one." Shall we count any toil too great, or any self denial too severe, that our forgiving Lord requires at our weak hands?—O no, for we are His, and ransomed at a price that heaven counts dear, redeemed from bondage, no rebels sought. Infinite Love! O, how should we adore that grace that pitied while we madly slumbered. Why are we not as "burning lights" in the thick world gloom—parts of that Loving Flame that bathes our home in one clear flood of life, and light, and joy! Thou art my brother. Help me trim the flickering light that it may shine with steadfast ray, and humbly glorify the light above.

"Trials are blessings in disguise." Thus thinkest thou amidst so many trials? Thy arm is weak when the strong spirit panteth for the battle field. And fell disease, a heartless fiend, steals to my very hearth stone, and with envenomed finger points where he may readiest crush thy heart-joys. I pray that strength to thee be given, health to her who shares, and sharing heightens all thy joys and gladdens all thy toils. And those dear little ones, that they repay, like sunbeams, thy sweet cares for them, and be in the large home above, the brightest jewels in the coronal of thy rejoicing.

Affection is the richest boon to mortals given, sent down to win our thoughts to upward flights; to give us here some faint perception of the bliss reserved in heaven; a quick incentive to the higher work of minds immortal, that the heart so treasured here, may, storms escaped and trials passed, be gathered in that heaven of the heart—Love Infinite."

DE WETTE AND HIS GHOST.

The readers of the Advocate will conclude from the above that we are about to regale them with a ghost-story; and so we are. It is taken from a paper in the Atlantic Monthly. It is constantly urged, among other objections to the credibility of supernatural apparitions, that the names of the witnesses have singularly and suspiciously disappeared—that you find them, upon investigation, substantiated thus: A very worthy gentleman, who told a very intelligent lady, who told somebody else, who told the individual who finally communicated the incident to the world. There are, however, as just intimated, instances in which such ambiguity is altogether wanting. Among these is one so well authenticated by well-known witnesses of undoubted veracity, that, having never before been published, I venture to relate it here.

"My informant was Prof. Tholuck, of Halle University, the most eminent living theologian in Germany, and the principal ecclesiarch of the Prussian church. He prefaced the account by assuring me that it was received from the lips of De Wette himself, immediately after the occurrence—that De Wette was an intimate personal friend, a plain, practical man, of remarkably clear and vigorous intellect, with no more poetry and imagination in his nature than just sufficient to keep him alive—in a word, that he would rely upon his coolness of judgment and accuracy of observation, under any possible combination of circumstances, as confidently as upon those of any man in the world.

"Dr. De Wette, the famous German biblical critic, returning home one evening between nine and ten o'clock, was surprised, upon arriving opposite the house in which he resided, to see a bright light burning in his study.—In fact, he was rather more than surprised; for he distinctly remembered to have extinguished the candles when he went out, an hour or two previously, locked the door, and put the key in his pocket, which, after feeling for it, was still there. Pausing a moment to wonder for what means and for what purpose any one could have entered the room, he perceived the shadow of a person apparently occupied about something in a remote corner. Supposing it to be a burglar employed in filling the trunk, he was upon the point of alarming the police, when the man advanced to the window, drew back the curtains, as if for the purpose of looking out into the street—was De Wette himself!—the scholar, author, professor—his height, size, figure, stoop—his head, his face, his features, eyes, mouth, nose, chin, every one of them—his steady gown, neck-tie, all, everything; there was no mistaking him, no deception whatever. There stood De Wette in his own library, and he out in the street—why, he must be somebody else! The Doctor instinctively grasped his body with his hands, and tried to satisfy himself, doubtful, if he could believe his senses and black were not white, that he longer existed the former self, and stood, perplexed, bewildered, and confounded, gazing at his other likeness looking out of the window. Upon the person's retiring from the window, which occurred in a few moments, De Wette resolved not to dispute the poss

SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY.

For the benefit of the public, and at the request of one of the Trustees, we give the following information respecting this institution, located at Greensboro', Ala.:

For admission into a class in any school of the University, the applicant must be at least fifteen years of age, and must produce satisfactory evidence to the Professor of his ability to profit by the instruction given in the class. Every applicant who is a member of any other institution must present a certificate of honorable dismission. Each Student must enter at least three Schools, unless sufficient reasons the Faculty may, in special cases, dispense with the requirement.

The branches taught in the University are distributed into nine Independent Schools, namely: Moral Philosophy, Latin Language and Literature, Greek Language and Literature, Modern Languages, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, Biblical Literature, and Law. The Law School will not be open for the present.

The School of Moral Philosophy (Prof. Wadsworth) embraces two Classes: The Junior Class studies History, Logic, Belles Lettres, and Political Economy. The Senior Class studies Mental and Moral Philosophy, Evidences of Christianity, and Constitutional Law. The books used for study and reference are Hickok's Psychology and Moral Science; Cousin, Havens; Butler's Analogy; Watson's Institutes, 1st Part; Story and Bayard on the Constitution of the United States; Hedges and Whately's Logic; Blair's Lectures; Quackenbos's Course of Composition and Rhetoric; Wayland's and Say's Political Economy; Weber's History. The Method of Instruction comprises lectures, recitations, examinations, and written exercises.

In the School of Latin Language and Literature (Prof. Taylor Cosby) instruction is given by lectures and recitations in such portions of the Classic authors as may be assigned. Special attention is given to the principles of syntax and to the idiomatic differences between the Latin and English Languages; hence, written translations, especially from English into Latin, are frequently required of each Student. As much time will be devoted to literature and antiquities as can be spared from the study of the principles of the language. Books of reference: Kemp's Latin Grammar; Arnold's Latin Prose Composition; Leverett's or Andrew's Lexicon; Anthon's Classical Dictionary; Smith's Greek and Roman Antiquities, and Fiedler's Atlas. Text Books: In the Junior Class, Livy and Horace's Odes. In the Intermediate Class, Thucydides, Sallust and Epistles, and Tacitus. In the Senior Class, Juvenal and Cicero. Besides the foregoing authors, the Professor will feel at liberty to examine all applicants for degrees on Cæsar, Virgil, and Cicero's Orations.

The subjects taught in the School of the Greek Language (Prof. Cosby, assisted by Prof. Reubelt,) are the Greek Language, and Greek Literature and History.—The method of instruction embraces lectures, examinations, and written exercises. The School is divided into three Classes: Junior, Intermediate, and Senior. Books of Reference: Kühner's Greek Grammar; Arnold's Greek Prose Composition; Liddell and Scott's Greek-English Lexicon; Smith's Classical Dictionary; Fisk's Manual of Classical Literature. Text Books: In the Junior Class, Herodotus and Homer. In the Intermediate Class, Demosthenes, Euripides, and Sophocles. In the Senior Class, Plato, Thucydides, Æschylus. Applicants for degrees may be examined at the option of the Professor, on Xenophon's Anabasis or Cyropædia.

In the School of Modern Languages (Prof. Reubelt) will be taught French, German, Spanish, and Italian. Special attention will be directed to the idiom and literature, as well as the pronunciation, of each of these languages. Instruction will be afforded in comparative philology and the science of language.

The School of Mathematics (Prof. Wills; T. A. Gatch, Assistant) embraces four classes. The Junior Class studies Algebra to the Theory of Equations, Synthetical Geometry, Plane Trigonometry, Spherical Trigonometry, and Mensuration. The Intermediate Class studies Surveying, Navigation, Nautical Astronomy, Descriptive Geometry, Shades, Shadows, and Perspective, and Analytical Geometry. The Senior Class studies the Theory of Equations, Differential and Integral Calculus, and the Philosophy of Mathematics. The Class in Mixed Mathematics studies the applications of the higher Mathematics to the discussion of the laws of Force and Motion, and to the investigation of Natural Phenomena. This Class is designed for the benefit of those Students who may have accomplished the course of Pure Mathematics, and desire to pursue the subject further than they are required to do in order to receive any of the degrees. The subjects taught in this Class are Mechanics, Acoustics, and Optics. Instruction in this school is imparted by the use of text-books and lectures. The ingenuity and skill of the Students are exercised regularly, by means of original propositions. The text-books used are Davies' Bourdon's Algebra; Davies' Legendre, Geometry, Trigonometry, and Mensuration; Davies' Surveying and Navigation; Davies' Descriptive Geometry; Davies' Shades, Shadows, and Perspective; Davies' Analytical Geometry; Courtenay's Differential and Integral Calculus; Comte's Philosophy of Mathematics; Bartlett's Analytical Mechanics; Bartlett's Acoustics and Optics.

In the School of Natural Philosophy (Professors Wills and Lapham) will be taught, in the Junior Class, the Properties of Matter, Laws of Equilibrium and Motion; Hydrostatics, Optics, Statical and Dynamical Electricity and Magnetism. In the Senior Class, Mechanical Philosophy and Astronomy. Geology and Mineralogy will be taught in this School to such Students as may wish to pursue these subjects, with the aid of a well-selected cabinet of minerals. Instruction will be given chiefly by lectures. Books of Reference: In Natural Philosophy, Lardner's Hand Books, Muller's Physics, and Chilton's Natural Philosophy; in Astronomy, Norton, old Herschel; in Geology, Hitchcock and Lyell; in Mineralogy, Dana.

In the Silliman School of Chemistry (Prof. Lupton) will be taught Chemistry and its applications to Medicine, the Arts, Manufactures, etc. The Laws of Light, Heat, and Electricity are discussed, so far as a knowledge of them is necessary for a proper understanding of Chemical phenomena. The general principles of Chemical Philosophy, with the history, properties, and compounds of the non-metallic and metallic elements are then considered, all the proper classes with the main facts and principles of Organic Chemistry. A complete and excellent apparatus, recently selected in Europe by the Professor, enables him to present the whole subject in the most attractive form. Instruction is communicated by lectures, which the Student is required to write out in full, and on which he is subjected to a daily examination. Particular attention is given to Agricultural Chemistry, upon which subject a course of lectures, with experimental illustrations, is given during the last term. The Laboratory, which is exceedingly believed, has no superior in the South, is open daily for the accommodation of those who may wish to become familiar with the practical operations of Chemistry. Complete Qualitative and Quantitative analyses of Soils, Manures, Minerals, Mineral-Waters, Drugs, etc., will be furnished on moderate terms by the Professor, when desired. Text-books: Fowne's Manual of Chemistry and Johnson and Leibeg in Agricultural Chemistry; Will, Fresenius, Bunnsen and Plattner, in Analytical Chemistry.

The School of Biblical Literature (Prof. Wightman) embraces two departments, and a course completed in two years. Instruction is given chiefly by lectures; and exercises in extemporaneous speaking before the School are regularly allotted to the Senior Class. The Junior Class studies Biblical Literature: 1. New Testament Greek, and the Hebrew Language, with textual criticism. 2. Exegesis, with Sacred Geography, Chronology, Archæology, and Introduction to New Testament. 3. Homiletics. Senior Class studies Theology: 1. Systematic Divinity; 2. Ecclesiastical History; 3. Church Polity and Pastoral Duties.

There are three kinds of examinations; namely, daily, semi-annual, and examinations for graduation. The daily examinations are upon the lectures and such portions of the text-books as the Professor may assign. The semi-annual examinations, occurring at the close of each term, are upon the subjects studied during the term. The examinations for graduation, occurring near the close of the session, are upon such subjects as are required for graduation to the different degrees conferred by the University. The semi-annual examinations and those for graduation are conducted in writing, or are partly oral and partly in writing, at the option of the Professor. Those students who, at their semi-annual examinations, attain to a degree of excellence equivalent to 75 per cent, are marked in their circulars distinguished, and their names are announced publicly at commencement. Those who reach from 60 to 75 per cent are marked, good.

The degrees conferred by the University are: 1. Graduate in a School; 2. Bachelor in Philosophy; 3. Bachelor of Arts; 4. Master of Arts; 5. Bachelor of Divinity; 6. Bachelor of Law. To obtain the degree of Graduate in a School the applicant must stand an approved examination upon all the studies of the School, at the time of the application for this degree, except Mixed Mathematics and Civil Engineering, in the School of Mathematics; Geology and Mineralogy, in the School of Natural Philosophy; Analytical Chemistry, in the School of Chemistry; and any two languages, in the School of Modern Languages. The degree of Graduate is also conferred in each of the Modern Languages separately, and in Mixed Mathematics. To obtain the degree of Bachelor of Philosophy, the applicant must become a Graduate in the School of Moral Philosophy, Natural Philosophy, and Chemistry; and must pass an approved examination on the studies embraced in the Junior and Intermediate Classes in Mathematics. To obtain the degree of Bachelor of Arts, the applicant must become a Graduate in the School of Moral Philosophy, Natural Philosophy, and Chemistry, and must pass an approved examination upon the studies embraced in the Junior and Intermediate Classes in the Schools of Latin, Greek, and Mathematics. To obtain the degree of Master of Arts, the applicant must become a Graduate in all the Academic Schools. To obtain the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, the applicant must graduate in the Schools of Moral Philosophy, Greek, and Biblical Literature. To obtain the degree of Bachelor of Law, the applicant must graduate in the School of Law. Before any of the foregoing degrees will be conferred, the applicant must give evidence to the Faculty of his thorough acquaintance with the Orthography and Syntax of the English Language, and must present a well-written essay on some literary or scientific subject, and may be required to deliver an oration on commencement day, at the option of the Faculty.

GENERAL STATISTICS OF METHODISM.

We find in the Irish Evangelist, says the Methodist, a general statistical view of Methodism, correcting somewhat late American statements of the kind, so far as they relate to British Methodism, but also erring respecting American Methodism. With such corrections as we can give, the following tabular outlines are probably correct:

I.—1739. PARENT WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH.

Total number of Church Members in England, Wales, and Scotland, at the Conference of 1859,	202,795
Increase in ditto this year,	15,469
1747. In Ireland, 1859,	19,731
Increase this year	3,060
1769. Foreign missions in 1859	63,405
1851. French Conference,	1,436
1854. Australian Conference,	28,138
Canada Conference,	45,295
Eastern British American Conf.,	14,816
Members on Trial in 1859,	42,295
Total under the care of the Parent Conferences,	528,441
Total number of Ministers,	2,455
	528,896

Including about 15,000 Lay Preachers.

II. The following are offshoots from the Parent Stock. They all hold Methodistic doctrine and usages, but differ from it in matters of Church Government:—

1797. Methodist New Connection, say,	28,000
1819. Primitive Methodist,	123,863
1857. United Free Church Methodists,	43,000
1849. Wesleyan Reformers	12,000
1818. Bible Christian Methodists,	19,068
1817. Primitive Wesleyans, in Ireland	14,000
Ministers in all these in 1859,	239,931 1,163
	241,094

Including about 15,000 Lay Preachers.

Total number of Methodists of all branches in Great Britain & Ireland	766,362
Total number of Methodist Ministers,	3,618
	769,980

Including about 30,000 Lay Preachers, and probably about 60,000 Leaders.

III. AMERICAN METHODISM.

Methodist Episcopal Church (North),	971,495
Methodist Episcopal Church (South),	700,000
Methodist Episcopal Church, Canada,	16,575
American Wesleyan Methodists,	26,000
Methodist Protestant Church,	90,000
African Methodist Episcopal Church,	20,000
African Methodist Episcopal Zion Ch.	6,203
Albright Methodists,	40,000
Total number of Methodist Church Members in America,	1,808,204
Total number of Ministers in America,	13,209
	1,821,413
Add British Methodism, as above,	769,980
	2,591,393

This does not include the increase in several of the Methodist branches for the present year, or nearly thirty thousand members on trial in England, nor the increase in Mission Stations, or in Australia or Canada; nor the increase in the Methodist Episcopal Church, North and and South, for the year. We are satisfied that the aggregate is 100,000, or more, below the true figure, when we estimate the Church-membership of Methodism throughout the world as TWO MILLIONS, SEVEN HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND PERSONS. According to this time it shall be said, What hath God wrought? "Surely, there is no enchantment against Jacob, or divination against Israel."

QUESTIONS TO THE EDITOR.—A correspondent writing from Fayetteville, Ala., asks us a number of questions which he ought to have propounded to his Presiding Elder. Most of them relate to the intention of the Conference fund. If he will procure a copy of the Minutes of the Alabama Conference, he will find a better answer than we are able to give him. He also asks if the Methodist Church requires baptism before communion. We answer, yes. He asks if a person can be received from one society into another on the certificate of a class-leader. In the absence of the pastor of the removing member—yes.

HEART-LIFE.

The heart is the seat of empire in human character. Resist its decrees, and overturn its sovereignty as we may, it can never be finally dethroned. It will ultimately assert its divine right to royal supremacy, either for weal or woe—either in reward for our obedience or punishment for our treason. He who sins against the carnal and tender affections and impulses of the heart,—against those out-flowings of "natural affection" always existing before we become sophisticated and politic—truly "sins against his own soul." Proud intellect and arrogant self-will, may choose the path of expediency and interest, over that of conviction and feeling, for a time, and, during health, strength, and prosperity, may seem to prosper in the rebellion; but the time of their weakness, and of the obvious falseness of their leaders, will surely come, and the heart will assert its right power at last—though too late, perhaps, for its reign to be fruitful of happiness. Every violation of truthful conviction and unsophisticated feeling is certain of commensurate punishment. Every such transgression adds to the already sufficiently heavy burden of the heart in this life, doubles the weight of increasing years, becloads the sunset of life, and makes the dying bed a bed of thorns. Remorse, much of it, is simply the sweetness of the heart, arising from obedience to natural affection, turned into gall by remembered disobedience.

It is surprising that, universally dependent as we are upon the heart, we should so universally deny its claims and its virtues. All economies, of every sort, social commercial, political, ignore the existence of the heart, and strive to educate the world into forgetfulness of it. Economies monopolize the thought and action of mankind. Elections which absorb a nation turn upon them; great congresses legislate for them; "chambers" and "associations" are instituted for their benefit; education is for the training of their disciples; society provides their uniforms and parade-grounds, and reviews. Economical thoughts are current coin in the conversation and literature of the world. But the heart is soft, and he who acknowledges the possession of such an element of humanity is voted "soft" in head also. Heart-thoughts are considered unfit for the conversation and literature of this world. Romantic lovers, and writers of fiction, and rash wives and husbands, and religious enthusiasts, are thought to be the only people who have any use for the heart. Men are ashamed of heart manifestations—ashamed of being accused of being in love, to be found shedding tears of sympathy, or to be thought under religious influences. But, nevertheless, God, though forgotten, exists, and so does the heart; and the time of God's power, and the time of the power of the heart, will ultimately come, and both of them together. The times of man's weakness, and of God's power, are always heartful times. God would put the heart of childhood into the strength of manhood, the glory of intellect, and the pride of prosperity. Man would exclude it from all but helplessness, and sorrow, and death. God's kingdom is a heart-kingdom.

SEED-WHEAT.

Have you any thoughts? So it is to be hoped. Otherwise you are a mental waste—mentally, a barren fig-tree. Have you any original, living, earnest ideas? It matters not that others may have had, or may have now the same, or similar ones. If they are true to you, or earnest within you, they are original in the best sense.—Good seed is not always new seed. Have you endeavored to winnow the chaff of error, prejudice and passion from this mental seed-wheat of years? Have you scrutinized this seed in the light of divine truth and human duty? Is it the fruit of the good seed of the kingdom planted in your own heart, which will make good bread for the mental and spiritual sustenance of the world? Have you planted it? Have you uttered your thoughts, in modesty and humility? Have you embodied them in action, as providential opportunity may have permitted? Or have you been indolent, selfish, timid, cowardly?—Have you shrunk from the opposition of the unbelieving, the ridicule of the unthinking, the arrogance of the dogmatic, the contempt of the bigotted? Have you been afraid of making mistakes, and of incurring derision?—It is better to make mistakes and correct them, than to do nothing, and better to incur derision, and learn to bear it, and be strengthened by it, than to shrink into nothingness in fear of it. Have you endeavored, by continual planting and harvesting, to increase the store and quality of your thoughts? The world is poor, and much of it in mental starvation. It needs the share of mental wealth you are able to contribute. As to commerce, in making the world wealthy, you grow wealthy yourself. Consider! Your time is short. The Master cometh.—He will take account of his servants. Read the parable of the talents.

A TIMELY WORK.

Rev. Nathan Scarritt, of the Kansas Conference, has recently published a pamphlet of sixty pages, of which we have a copy, entitled, "Position of the Methodist E. Church, South, on the subject of Slavery." It is divided into two parts; in the first he defines and defends the position of the Southern Church; in the second he answers the various questions relative to that position.—The pamphlet is timely, and its arguments pertinent and unanswerable. The position of the Southern Church he defines to be, "that the civil relation of master and slave is not a proper subject for ecclesiastical legislation; but that the Church may and ought to enforce the duties growing out of that relation." He proves that this position is scriptural, not only by quotations from the Scriptures themselves, but by the expositions of such men as Albert Barnes, Dr. Bangs, Dr. Clarke, Bishop Emory, Bishop Hedding, Dr. Fisk, Prof. Stuart, Dr. Bond, Dr. Elliott. He also supports it by the published opinions and actual practice of the Methodist fathers—Wesley, Watson, Clarke, Coke, Benson, Asbury, Fisk, Hedding, Bangs. He further proves that it is sustained by the official acts of the General Conference and Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church previous to the "Division" in 1844. His proofs on all these points are absolutely overwhelming. He then proves that the M. E. Church is not a secession; that it is not pro-slavery; that it is the friend of the slave; and that it is fulfilling the "great commission."

TUSKEGEE METHODIST CHURCH.—The Methodists of Tuskegee have commenced the erection of a new church, which is to cost about $20,000, and will no doubt be a beautiful one. They have long needed it. Near their beautiful Female College, on the same side of the same street, nearer the centre of the town, it will be an auxiliary and ornament to both the place and the Institution.

AN INTELLIGENT CORRESPONDENT, among other remarks highly complimentary to the Advocate, speaks in high praise of Rev. J. G. Jones' Sketches of Early Protestantism in Mississippi and the Southwest. An old citizen himself, he is able to verify much that Mr. Jones has published, and thinks he ought to complete and publish an entire history. We think so too.

THE BROOKS HOUSE.—As many of our friends from the interior patronize our friend, Capt. Brooks, we take occasion to inform them that he, in connection with Mr. Schneider, the owner of the building, is adding two new stories to it, making it five stories high, with broad and beautiful verandahs to each story, overlooking La Fayette Square. It will be one of the handsomest boarding houses in the city.

FOOTPRINTS ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

NUMBER XIII.

San Francisco—Its wonderful progress and characteristics—The country—General impressions.

MR. EDITOR: In my last letter I promised, after a night's repose, to resume my narrative. Several days and nights have passed since I dropped you a line, but now having a respite from the chills, I redeem my pledge.

San Francisco is a great city—marvellous in its growth, and wonderful in its prospects. As we rode along the streets by moonlight on the night of our arrival, I more than realized my conceptions of its size, its peculiar population, and its extraordinary activity. After midnight, as it was, the streets were alive with people, and men, women, and little children were up and in motion. Glad as we were to reach the end of our journey—excited by the novelty of our position—we nevertheless slept soundly till breakfast, and rose vigorous and refreshed. Our friends expected to find us travel-worn, broken down, utterly exhausted; and when they saw us fresh, strong, and ready for work, would hardly believe that we came the Overland Route. Never before did I fully appreciate the luxury of a bath and clean clothes. In my peculiar traveling suit, covered with the dust of two thousand miles, I felt unfit for society. There was a loss of self-respect, a sliding backwards to barbarism. There is a strong affinity between dirt and degradation. Soap is unquestionably a great civilizer. Outward purity is intimately allied with taste, honor, and all lofty aspirations. Water is the symbol of grace, and both are necessary to the perfection of human nature. Gross slovenliness is absolutely incompatible with the delicacy and refinement of Christian character. There cannot be a high civilization without baths—an abundance of water. If the world could once be washed clean, there would be a powerful upward impulse. Verily, the virtues of pure cold water have never been written, sung, or spoken.

The history of the world furnishes no parallel to San Francisco as a city. Only ten years old, it now rivalls in population, in public and private buildings, many of the oldest cities of the Atlantic coast. When the trade of the East shall be fairly opened, and the great Pacific road shall be in operation, New York may tremble for her supremacy. The future of this great centre of world-wide commerce, of irrepressible enterprise, of unequalled activity, will be developed without precedent or example on the map of nations. Utterly consumed by fire two or three times, she has risen from the ashes improved and enlarged every time. With capital, talent, Anglo-Saxon energy compounded and intensified, her progress knows no interruption. With her steam-paddles she digs down hills, and empties them into the bay, and forms new squares, and lays out new streets, where but yesterday ships rode at anchor. And as if this were too slow an operation, piers, bridges, wooden wharves, stretch far over the water to make room for her merchandize. In the stir and bustle of her streets every nation and tribe is represented; her language is a Babel of sounds and tongues, and every man moves, whether he rides, or walks, or runs, as though the last dollar in fortune's wheel was about to roll out, and the struggle was, who shall get it. The gold, the climate, the agricultural capacity of California, the chances of sudden fortune, the extraordinary stimulants to trade and speculation, have attracted and concentrated, from all lands, intellect, enterprise, adventure, and made up a population comprising many of the noblest, grandest elements of human nature.

Being invited to preach in his church by Dr. Scott, (to whom I am indebted for many courtesies,) at the conclusion of the service, the Doctor remarked to me, as the immense audience were retiring, "You may have long; but you never addressed more mind than you did to-day." After acquaintance with the people satisfied me that the remark was just and true.

California differs from all other new countries on the American continent. Her people are not the wild, rough, untutored set some people think; but in her mines and fields, as well as in her cities, you will find the educated and the refined—numerous specimens of the best classes from the oldest societies. Of course there are some renegades, desperadoes—men and women—who have fallen from virtue and honor; human wrecks afloat upon this once turbid, raging sea of life; but extensive travel and close observation, over a large portion of the State, satisfied me that society, in town and country, would compare favorably with that of the oldest States of the East. Life and property are as secure; hospitality as generous; benevolence as open-handed there, and enterprise more vigorous than anywhere else that I have wandered. The cities which have been built, the mines explored, the mountains tunnelled, the aqueducts, the churches, schools, colleges,—all representing labor and capital—surpass all calculation, and well-nigh confound belief.

In the mining region, millions upon millions have been expended in turning rivers, digging ditches, and conveying water to wash gold—now running along the side of a mountain, and then in a flume two hundred feet in the air. I have seen a river boxed up, and its old channel laid bare and dry, as if a young earthquake had been sporting in its bosom. If a mountain gets in the way, with a hydraulic ram they wash it down. Nothing is considered physically impossible. Count Richelieu's famous saying to the young man about to undertake some difficult task, "there is no such word as fail," seems to be the motto of the country.

The climate is peculiar, but fine everywhere. It is variable according to the relation of any place to the sea and the mountains. The air pure, fresh, and current. In San Francisco, and in some of the valleys, the wind is often too strong and cold for comfort. The general temperature, however, is balmy and delightful. There is a vitality, and elasticity in the atmosphere, which braces and cheers, and enables one to perform more labor with less fatigue, than in any region I have visited. With the thermometer at 110 deg. in the shade, there is no lassitude. The nights are cool, and sleep a luxury.

I shall not attempt a description of the country. Others have done it before me, and yet scarce any one has a true idea of it, except those who have seen it. It is very unique in its physical features, wholly unlike any other in this broad Union. The Bible reader will be reminded perpetually of Palestine. Its mountains, valleys, climate, and productions, all resemble the heritage of Israel. All fruits, except the tropical, grow there in surpassing luxuriance. At the State fair at Sacramento, among other wonders, were a hundred peaches which weighed one hundred pounds. In size, all vegetables and fruits exceed; but the most of them I thought inferior in flavor to our Eastern products. The sole reason for this, I think, is in excessive irrigation. By the way, the mode of irrigation is a curiosity, a singular feature of the country. Wells are dug and bored, a pump inserted, and by a very simple machinery, turned by windmills, the water is brought up, and conveyed by little branches, or leaden pipes with small jets, to the gardens and orchards. There is always breeze enough to turn these circular fans, and thus wind and water work day and night, unwearied agents in the service of man.

While on this subject, I may as well say that procuring water in some places in California is the easiest job imaginable. This is particularly true about Stockton. The whole operation of boring and putting in the pump does not consume more than an hour. At the Calaveras camp-meeting, I was among the first upon the ground. The weather was warm, and I was thirsty, and soon asked for water. It was answered, "There is none, except the very muddy water in some holes in the creek channel, too foul to drink."

"What," said I, "hold a camp-meeting without water?"

"O, no, we will have some directly," they replied.

How this could be I did not then know, and I went into the preacher's tent, rather downcast with the prospect before me. In an hour or less, a friend handed me a glass of good, fresh, cool water.

"How is this?" cried I.

"Oh, you are in California. This is a fast country. It does not take us a week or a day to dig a well or fix a pump, like the fogies in the East."

I went out to see the arrangement, and, sure enough, they had bored about eight feet, found water, put down a tube an inch and a half in diameter, and bright, sparkling water responded to the pump-handle. A common auger, of larger size, with a long shank, is the instrument used for boring.

I shall not detail my movements in California. Suffice it to say, that I traveled two thousand miles, preached almost every day or night, sometimes both, for four months, saw many awakened, converted, and added to the Church, held Conference, and left with strong effections for the preachers and the people.

I admire the country, think it very desirable as a place of residence, and have wished myself back many a time. As a field of usefulness, I know none so promising. In my next, I will write of what more especially concerns our Church—her position, wants, and prospects.

O. F. PIERCE.

A PASTORAL VISIT REWARDED.

In visiting the sick, the faithful pastor often enjoys a precious reflected benefit. In the early part of this year, while traveling in Coosa county, Ala., I visited a mother in Israel who was in the last stage of consumption, which has proven a greater blessing to me than all the preaching I have heard since. I refer to a visit made Mrs. E. Patterson, consort of James Patterson, who died May 17, 1860.

I had learned before my visit that she was a faithful, devoted christian, and that she had "lived religion" from her youth. When I was introduced to her as the circuit preacher, she thanked God with such fervor as convinced me at once of the genuineness of her piety. Her face expressed more than words could tell. I asked her as to the state of her mind in regard to death. She assured me that all was well, stating that she had found some difficulty in becoming reconciled to leaving her two little daughters in the world, to be raised without a mother. But, said she, "I now feel that I can leave them in the hands of God and the Church."

She spoke, at length of the operations of her mind during her protracted illness, and of her faith and hope in regard to the future. She seemed to see the hand of the Lord in all her afflictions, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Her affliction was sanctified, not only to her good, but to the good of all those who visited her. I asked her how long she had been in the Church. She replied, "I am now nearly fifty-one years old, and I embraced religion and joined the Methodist Church at the age of twelve years."

When I told her my time was short, and proposed prayers, she turned to her little daughter, and then said "bring me the old family Bible." When it was present ed she said, "I can't remember when that Bible was new. It was my father's Bible. From it I have received lessons of comfort and wisdom from my childhood." The prayer ended, she spent a few moments in praising God. As her voice grew faint and weak in repeating, "glory, glory, glory!" her words were like swift echoes from the "spirit land." After a short respite, she resumed the conversation, and spoke of her approaching exit as calmly and peacefully as if it were a pleasant journey for which she had long been preparing. "Forward, I shall be off before your return. Meet me in heaven. Preach Jesus! You are young, and a large field of usefulness lies before you; you may have trials and sufferings, but heaven will reward you. "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy."

I went away with my faith largely increased, determined to devote myself more fully to the work of the Lord. I felt that in my visit I was the benificiary, rather than she. Even now, as my mind recurs to that time and place, it radiates with celestial brightness.

Sister P. went to her reward a short time afterwards, her last words being, "I am going home." "Jesus is my friend." She was the last of three sisters, who have died with the same disease—all similarly triumphant. They were daughters of the late Richard and Martha Knight, formerly of South Carolina. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."

R. S. WOODWARD.

DR. WOLFF OF BOKHARA.

In Chambers's Journal we find a very readable resume of the "Travels and Adventures of Dr. Wolff," which will be interesting to the readers of the New Orleans Christian Advocate. Only the first volume of this strange and exciting biography has appeared, and the narrative closes with his arrival at Bokhara. We had something to say recently, in this paper, about another great Jewish traveler, Benjamin of Moldavia. Afterward we had the pleasure of an interview with him.—He, however, remains a steadfast Jew; Dr. Wolff became a Christian!

In spite of Mr. Disraeli's assertions, the Jews are not the very first people on the face of the earth, although some of them have made a great deal of money. When a Jew distinguishes himself in other fashion, the world is pretty certain to hear of and to be astonished proportionally.

"Heaven have mercy upon us," quoth Rabbi David of Wurtemberg, "our son will not remain a Jew! He is continually walking about and thinking, which is not natural." And Rabbi David, so far at least as his son Wolff was concerned, was right. At eleven years of age or so, the lad declares, "my mind is made up; I will become a Christian, and be a Jesuit; and I will preach the gospel in foreign lands like Francis Xavier."—Whereupon his cousin and temporary guardian observes laughingly: "You are an enthusiast;" but the cousin's wife "grew very angry, and threw a poker at him, and cursed him, and turned him out of the house."—From that moment, Dr. Wolff of Bokhara, as we English have learned subsequently to know him, had to make his own very singular way in the world. He goes to Frankfort-on-the-Maine and Halle; then to the Benedictine monastery at Molk, where he learns Latin, gets ten florins a week and his food, in exchange for teaching Hebrew; and afterwards to the college of Solure.—Here, sleeping in the same room at a lodging-house with a certain fellow-student, he asks one night, "And who do you think, Biederman, I am?" "Why, to tell you the truth," replies the other, "I have always suspected you of being a Berner (Protestant), for you behave so strangely at church. You sit when others stand; you kneel when others sit." Wolff replied; "Now I will tell you who I am." Biederman said: "Who are you?" Wolff replied: "I am a Jew." Biederman was so frightened that he screamed, and leaped out of the bed; the noise of which roused the landlord and landlady, who came robeless into the room, and said: "What's the matter? Is the devil here among you?" Biederman exclaimed: "Worse than that; Wolff is a Jew!"—Wolff was, however, soon afterwards baptized at Prague, receiving the name of Joseph, whereupon he removes to Vienna. He gives a curious description of the state of religious parties there (in 1813), and particularly of the Mystical Party, or Peschelites, as they were called from their leader. 'Peschel was an interpreter of the Revelation of St. John; and he taught that people ought to be so inflamed by the love of Christ, that they might desire with St. Paul to "know the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death." Peschel's followers took up this idea further, and insisted that Christians should continue the atonement among themselves; with which view they assembled on a Good Friday in a certain house, and cast lots for one to be crucified; and he on whom the lot fell was to be crucified; the lot fell, on the first occasion, upon a poor butcher's maid-servant, who actually submitted to her fate, and suffered with great fortitude and patience.—But the next time it fell on a fat Roman Catholic priest, who did not relish the thought at all; and so he gave notice to the police, who took the mystics into custody, and Wolff himself saw Peschel in prison.' Wolff, who had now become a great linguist, and a convert of some considerable mark, is sent to Rome to the College of the Propaganda, where, whatever he learned, it does not appear to have been a modest humility. 'On the day of Epiphany, the pupils gave an "academin" in forty-two languages. It was in the evening. All the ambassadors were present, and all the cardinals, and the German artists, and French priests. Wolff spoke in five languages, and chanted so that the hall rang; and all the auditors were in raptures, and applauded him; and the Italian collegians of the different colleges present kept saying: "Look at him—look at him, what tremendous eyes he makes!" (Guardateli, guardateli, gli cavi, gli fa!) After the whole was over, the servants of the cardinals, together with their masters, slapped his back, and said: "Per Bacco, per Bacco! che voce! che occhi! che occhi!"

Wolff has likewise the honor of an interview with Pope Pius VII., whom he pats on the shoulder gently and caressingly; but the discipline of the church does not altogether take his fancy, nevertheless. 'Every Friday evening, they assembled in a dark room, put out the candles, and then every one flagellated himself. Wolff attempted to join in this self-discipline; but he gave himself only one stroke, and then administered all the other blows to his leather trousers, which were pushed down to his knees, and it made a loud sound. The others observing this device, laughed very heartily, and several of them afterwards followed Wolff's example—especially one who stood near the wall, and gave it also the benefit of the lash.

Finally Wolff concludes that he is not adapted for a monastic life, and departs for England, to his friend, the late Mr. Henry Drummond, who had invited him to do so long before. According to the doctor's account almost everybody was in raptures with him about this time, and indeed this is more or less the case throughout the biography. As he stops on his way to London at Geneva, three old acquaintances chance to meet him, and immediately express their satisfaction in this singular manner. They all exclaimed at once: 'Cher Wolff! Chr Wolff! Enfante de la Nature! Enfante de la Providence! Enfant de Jesus Christ!' Robert Haldane accompanied him from Paris to Mr. Drummond's, through whom he is introduced to Mr. Lewis Way, a gentleman whose history is extraordinary. 'He was a barrister of small fortune, when one day, as he was walking in a street in London, he met by chance with an old gentleman, with whom he entered into conversation, whose name also was Lewis Way. They became friends; and soon afterwards that old man died, and left to the barrister £380,000, with the condition that he should employ it for the glory of God. Lewis Way immediately took holy orders in the Church of England; and his design was to devote his life to the conversion of the Jewish nation, and the promotion of their welfare, temporal and spiritual.' This gentleman, hearing of the existence of a Society, composed of churchmen and dissenters, for the promotion of Christianity among the Jews, already, pays its debts (amounting to £20,000), upon the condition that the dissenters should retire, and leave the whole management to churchmen. 'They accepted his terms, and he took sixteen Jews into his house, and baptized them all; but soon after their baptism, they stole his silver spoons, and one of them was transported to Australia for having forged Mr. Way's signature.' Poor Mr. Way suffers much at the hands of Dr. Wolff's fellow-countrymen; his pet Jew, 'one Nehemiah Solomon, a young man of great talents, whose beard he had shaved off,' getting ordained a priest only to run off with £300 of the Society's money. 'Nothing, however, disturbed Lewis Way, and soon after he went to Palestine; but there he was shamefully deceived by a Mount Lebanon Christian, and was so distressed by the circumstance, that it made him burst into tears; yet he continued his operations among the Jews with the same earnestness as ever. But neither his charity, even by his own confession, was always well-timed; he was chafed by the indifference and ingratitude of common men; and at last the dear man died at Leamington, broken-hearted.'

Wolff himself is sent to Cambridge, at the expense of the Society already mentioned, and is eventually appointed its missionary among his own people in Palestine.—The simplicity and even puerilanimity exhibited by our author in little matters, curiously contrasts with his proved common sense and dauntless courage in affairs of life and death. At Cairo, Santini, an Italian, 'was not a nice man; he cheated Wolff by making him believe that the best present one can give to a Bedouin chief is a small bottle of caster-oil. So Wolff bought from him some hundred bottles for £10, which made all the English people laugh from Cairo to England.' Wolff also seems to have been a good deal imposed upon by his own servants, for we read in another portion of this remarkable biography: 'Wolff hired four camels, upon which he loaded those Bibles which had been sent to him from Bombay for distribution on the journey; and he hired two Persian servants, both of them tremendous rogues; for Wolff never had the good-fortune to meet with a good servant, except on his second journey to Bokhara. In the year 1843, when he took a Russian with him from Constantinople to Tabreez, who actually behaved very well the whole journey. But when they arrived at Tabreez, he became so drunk that he thrashed his master, and would have most seriously injured him, if Mr. Bonham had not knocked him down. Wolff, however, would still have taken him on to Bokhara, after he became sober, if he would have promised not to get drunk again. But he said he never would promise any such a thing, as he was determined to get drunk whenever the feast of the Holy Virgin Mary was celebrated. So Wolff dismissed him.' He was dependent upon servants to an extraordinary degree for so self-helpful a man, in the matter of shaving: he could not even use the razor-strop, and narrates how Irving the preacher shaved him every morning while he stayed with him; and how that he found no barber at the archbishop's palace at Tuam, but was shaved there by an old woman, who demanded two shillings and sixpence for the job.

At Jerusalem, Wolff fell in with many interesting legends concerning his own people, who received him with very various feelings. Here is an affecting incident said to have occurred soon after the destruction of that city by Titus. 'Two heathen merchants met together in an inn in the Desert. "I have a male slave," said one to the other, "the like to whose beauty is not to be seen in the whole world." And the other said: "I have a female slave, the like of whose beauty is not to be seen in the whole world." Then they agreed to marry these two together, and to divide the children between them; and in the evening both the slaves were brought into a room. One stood in one corner, and the other in the other corner, and the male slave said: "I, a priest, and the son of a high-priest, should I marry a slave!" and the female said in the other corner of the room: "I, a priestess, the daughter of a high-priest, should I marry a slave?" and when the morning approached, they discovered that they were brother and sister. They fell upon each other's necks, and wept, and wept, and wept, until the souls of both departed. And it is on account of this that Jeremiah said: "Over these I weep, I weep; mine eye, mine eye runs down with water."'

The following Jewish account of Solomon, intended, perhaps, to do away with the scandals attaching to that monarch's

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Solomon granted his request, and Ashmeday gave him such a kick that he was flung many thousand miles to all the countries of the earth. During his absence, Ashmeday reigned in Jerusalem, and sat upon Solomon's throne, in the very figure and shape of Solomon. And it was not Solomon who had one thousand wives, but Ashmeday, in the figure of Solomon; and it was not Solomon who committed idolatry, but Ashmeday, in the figure of Solomon; and it was not Solomon who oppressed the people, but Ashmeday, in the figure of Solomon.

At last, after many years, Solomon returned from his wanderings, when he found Ashmeday sitting upon throne, in his very figure. Then he said: "I am Solomon, and thou art a deceiver!" And Ashmeday said: "I am Solomon, and thou art a deceiver!"

They appealed to the great Sanhedrim. The Sanhedrim decided that como one should examine the feet of both; and it was found out that Solomon the exile had the feet of a man, but Ashmeday the feet of a cock.—So they expelled Ashmeday from the throno by the ineffable name, and he was again put in chains by the authentic Solomon.'

It must not be supposed, however, that the subject of this biography is always meeting with humorous adventures, or listening to romantic legends. The work he was set to do was no child's play. The Subcans, for example, must have been an unsatisfactory tribe to attempt the conversion of, unless Wolff was more successful than his predecessor in that endeavor, Father Agnd-tangelus, the Roman Catholic missionary. That gentleman nominally baptized the whole body of them.—But on the Sunday following, he relates that he sent spies to that river, and all of them were being baptized again in their own way. He asked: "Why they had been baptized again?" They replied: "We like water." He asked: "Are ye not Roman Catholics?" They replied: "We will be, on the following conditions: First, the pope must write to the sultan for us to be relieved from tribute; secondly, the pope must give us a pension; thirdly, at the hour of death, no Roman Catholic priest must come near ne; fourthly, we must be allowed to retain our own religion unmolested!"

Horace White, a well known citizen of Syracuse, N. Y., vice President of the Bank of Syracuse, and one of the Directors of the New York Central Railroad Company, died at his residence on that city on the 5th inst.

MARSHFIELD.—A correspondent of the New York Journal of Commerce states that Marshfield, Mass., the residence of the late Daniel Webster, has become so much of a watering-place, that two hotels have been opened and a third is needed. Crowds of visitors are daily examining the mansion and grounds of the deceased statesman.

There were 30 deaths in Charleston during the week ending on the 1st inst., including two of yellow fever.

THE JAPANESE IN NEW YORK.—The proprietors of the Metropolitan Hotel, New York, have made a statement ridiculing the idea that $10,000 was sufficient to pay them for entertaining the Japanese last end of $95,000. They allege that they paid a market bill of $11,000 in one week; that while the "Japs" were there the hotel furnished dinners daily to over a hundred waiters employed, and with the policemen, the house had to board seven hundred and fifty men. THE LADY ELGIN DISASTER.—The Western papers are filled with the particulars of the loss of the steamboat "Lady Elgin," on Lake Michigan, (an account of which appeared in our last issue) lists of the drowned, saved, &c. We have no room for one of the melancholy and affecting recitals. Many of the bodies of the drowned have been recovered, but at last accounts, the bodies of Col. Lumsden, his wife and son, had not been found. Most of the drowned were residents of Milwaukee, and that city, we are assured, is indeed a place of grief and lamentation.

THE UNITED STATES, CHINA AND JAPAN.—A Washington dispatch says: "It appears from our treaty of amity and commerce with China, just officially promulgated, that the United States will extend her good offices in case any other nation should act unjustly or offensively against that empire, to bring about a satisfactory arrangement of the question; thus showing their friendly feeling. The latest project of the people of Chicago is one to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of the Gulf of Mexico by an uninterrupted channel for steamboat navigation.

CALIFORNIA.—Late accounts state that business at San Francisco was steady but less animated than it had been. The merchandise exports of California, mostly in staple products, since January last, amount in value to $4,500,000, against $2,800,000 for the corresponding period of 1859. Political meetings are held with remarkable frequency in the interior towns.

OREGON.—We have late accounts from Oregon. The Secretary of State had refused to issue the certificate of election to Shiel, lately elected to Congress as successor to Stout, on account of the election being premature and unauthorized by law. Rich gold mines have been discovered at Walla. Considerable excitement prevails at Portland on the subject, and a rush had commenced towards the new diggings. The farmers were cutting by far the largest and best crop wheat ever grown in the State. Douglas, Republican, and Breckinridge clubs were organizing in all the principal towns, and each party claimed to be the strongest, without any data to form a plausible estimate upon.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Our summary of the news from Europe is made up at the last moment before going to press, in order to include the latest announcements by Telegraph, and the amount of space at our disposal being very limited, the summary is necessarily as brief as we can make it. Every arrival from Europe brings us accounts of the successful progress of Garibaldi in Southern Italy. At last advices he was reported to have arrived at Salerno, some thirty miles distant from Naples, at which city his arrival was anxiously looked for by all but the parasites and supporters of the Bourbon dynasty. The King, it is said had embarked all his valuables on board a Spanish frigate which was about to sail for Gaeta. In all probability the next arrival will bring us intelligence of the departure of the Bourbon, and the arrival of Garibaldi. Then—what next? From other parts of Europe the news is not of particular importance. Queen Victoria was still in Scotland; the French Emperor and Empress were in Savoy, and the Russian Emperor had invited the Prince Regent of Prussia to a hunting party at Warsaw, about the middle of this month. Of course there are many surmises as to the course the great powers will take in respect to the new state of things in Italy, &c., &c., but we have no room for further reference to them here.

THE HOME TRIP OF THE GREAT EASTERN.—The Great Eastern arrived at Milford Haven on the 16th ult. Allowing five hours for difference in time, and sixteen and a half hours' detention at Halifax, her run from New York was accomplished in nine days and four hours.

Mr. Wm. Cubitt, M. P., it is understood, will be the new Lord Mayor of London. The election takes place on the 29th inst.

The Englishwoman's Journal, a periodical issued in London, the object of which is to promote the industrial pursuits of women, is printed entirely by them. It appears that there is already in that city a newspaper, the compositors engaged on which are women.

ENLISTMENTS IN ENGLAND FOR GARIBALDI.—Captain Slyfe, an agent of Garibaldi in London, recently, in the company of a large number of gentlemen, said that in three days he had collected 500 volunteers, many of them of the highest respectability, some of independent means. His object was to raise a battalion of at least eighteen hundred men; but he did not wish to take them empty-handed. All the money and ammunition which general Garibaldi had at his command he required for the troops he had there. He wanted, therefore, to collect sufficient to equip the English battalion, and when he reached Garibaldi, to say, "Here we are ready to fight."

CORONATION OF THE KING AND QUEEN OF NORWAY.—The King and Queen of Norway were crowned at Dontheim on the 5th of August. The ceremony, according to the requirements of the constitution, was performed in the ancient Cathedral of that city. The Royal procession walked to the Cathedral preceded by the Heralds and Kings Court Marshal. The King walked under a canopy held by his principal officers, and the Queen under one held by Court ladies dressed in white. The procession was received at the Cathedral doors by the bishops and clergy. The Bishop of Christiana pronounced a blessing upon his Majesty. "God bless the King in his going out and his coming in from this time and forever." The King took his seat upon the Throne to the right of the choir, the Throne for the Queen being opposite on the left. The Bishops of Bergen and Christiana received the Queen; and when all the procession were seated in order, the King and Queen knelt down and the services began. After portions of scripture, prayers and singing, the Bishop of Bergin preached from Psalm lxxxv., 6, 12. After the sermon the King went up to the altar, and the crown was placed upon his head by the Minister of State and the Bishop, the latter having annointed his Majesty upon his forehead, temples, breast and wrist. The herald announced to the Assembly, "Now is Carl XV, crowned King of Norway; he and no other." A salute of 112 guns was immediately fired. The Queen went through the same ceremony, the Bishop only anointing her forehead and wrist. The herald announced, "Now is Wilhelmine Frederikke Alexandra Anna Louisa crowned Queen of Norway; she and no other;" and the guns gave another saluto of 112 guns. A grand chorus from the oration, composed for the occasion by C. Arnold, with the words by Professor A. Munch, concluded the ceremony, and the procession returned to the Palace amid the cheers of the people.

A crown of gold, worth 5000 plastres, and represented as of great artistic merit, has been offered to the Spanish Duke de Tetuan (O'Donnell) by the province of Alicant, as an acknowledgement of his political and military services.

The Minister of War in Austria has just ordered that Protestant soldiers shall only be interred in cemeteries in a part separated from the Catholic portion by a hedge or inclosure. Some of the Austrian journals complain of the measure as being exceedingly illiberal, and only called forth by the imminence of the Corwood statue of the late Sir John Franklin is to be erected at Spilsby, Lincolnshire, England, the birth-place of the Artic explorer.

MONUMENT TO ALLEN RAMSAY.—An unprecedentedly large block of Carrara marble has just been landed at Leith, and will be transported to Edinburgh, and along Queen street to its present destination at Mr. Steell's studio. This great mass of stone weighs fully eighteen tons, and measure thirteen feet long by some four or more in diameter, is of remarkably fine quality, and is probably the largest and purest piece of marble ever imported into Scotland. It is intended for the statue of Allen Ramsay, which the late Lord Murray, a collateral descendant of the poet's, meant to have placed on the terrace in front of Ramsay Garden, which gave way and fell some months ago. Lady Murray, in fulfilment, as far as possible, of the design of her lamented husband, purposes, we believe, applying for a site for the statue at the north-east corner of West Prince street Gardens, where it will correspond very well with the statue of Professor Wilson by the same eminent sculptor, which will be placed at the north-western corner of the Eastern Gardens. The model for the statue of Ramsay has long been completed, and indicates that the work will be one of the most spirited and characteristic which has ever been fashioned by Mr. Steell's classic chisel.—Scotsman.

The Nouvelliste of Rouen says that a very curious coin was recently found at Canville, near Havre, being a gold piece struck in 1418, when Henry V. of England, after the battle of Agincourt, assumed the title of King of France, on his marriage with Catherine, daughter of Charles VI; it bears the following inscription: "Henri, par grace de Dieu, roi d'Angleterre it de France."

The London Gazette announces the appointment of Major Gen. R. P. Douglas, to be Lieut. Governor of the Island of Jersey, in the room of Major General Mundy, deceased; also of Sir C. J. M'Carthy, Knight, to be Governor and Commander-in-Chief in and over the Island of Ceylon and its dependencies.

THE PANAMA ROUTE TO AUSTRALIA.—In the British House of Commons, on the 24th ult., Mr. Laing said there was no intention on the part of the Government of calling for tenders for a monthly steam communication with Australia via Panama, in addition to the service via Suez.

ORDERS FOR GRAIN.—The London Times, of August 24, in its City Article, says: "The orders for grain transmitted to America and the Continent since Friday last have been extraordinarily large. By the Cunard steamer on Saturday they are believed to have been heavier than by any previous packet, in consequence, not merely of the state of the London market, but of the rather discouraging character of the accounts from various parts of Europe!"

ROBERT BARCLAY, THE LEARNED QUAKER.—The English papers report that the estate once occupied by Robert Barclay has recently changed hands, and the new owner has pulled down the very room in the mansion in which Barclay wrote his famous Apology for Quakers. For nearly two centuries the place has been an object of much interest. Barclay was a contemporary of Geo. Fox and Wm. Penn, and was one of the few good men who were on terms of intimacy with King Charles II.

The official journal of Rome announces that the sum received in the Papal exchequer from the contributions of the faithful to the present necessities of Pius IX. amounts to $1,100,000.

The Cathedral of Notre Dame, Paris, was recently robbed of gorgeous vestments, crosses, taper holders, croziers, etc., of massive gold, adorned with the most precious stones, in all valued at $160,000.

RESTORATION OF OLD EDIFICES IN ENGLAND.—Several of the old cathedrals, and other edifices in England, which have been crumbling to ruin for two or more centuries, are undergoing a restoration. Among them is Netley Abbey, which has been in ruin several centuries. The lovers of the picturesque, and the venerators of old things, are quite shocked at the proposed restoration of this Abbey, and consider it a "desecration" to restore an edifice which has been crumbling to ruin for so long a time. "The glories of the edifice," it is said, "will be destroyed by restoring it."

THE LATE LORD ELPHINSTONE.—There is a romantic phase in the career of the late Lord Elphinstone, of whose death we recently had intelligence, not very generally known, and which, it is rumored, accounts for his living and dying a bachelor.—Some twenty-five years ago, says the gossip of court, he was smitten with the charms of a young girl of the highest rank, who also evinced a predilection for him. It was for this and to get him out of the way, that Elphinstone was honored with a high official position in India, for it was thought best that Victoria, the young Queen of England, should have a Prince Consort from Germany, rather than the old traditions should be infringed upon, and a British monarch marry one of her own subjects.

MANUFACTURE OF RIFLES IN ENGLAND.—In the House of Commons, on the 20th ult., in reply to a question, Mr. Hebert, the Secretary of War, said that 90,727 rifles had been made at Enfield during the year ending the 30th June last. The weekly average was then about 1700, but it was now 1900, and would be raised to 2000 as soon as additional machinery was brought into operation. 30,000 rifles had been received from contractors, and 9000 more were still to be sent in from them.

THE FINE ARTS IN GREAT BRITAIN.—No nation in the world is so liberal in its appropriations for the advancement of the fine arts as the English. Among the civil service estimates for the year we find the following items: £2000 for the British Historical Gallery; £2300 for purchasing for the British Muse em drawings by the old masters, formerly in the Lawrence collection; £5000 for a National Gallery in Dublin; £5000 for an Industrial Museum at Edinburgh; £15,000 for increasing the accommodation in the National Gallery of London, etc., etc. The total amount expended last year from the public funds, upon national collections, is stated, in the official reports, to have been £230,-448, (or about $1,152,500.) This included the British Museum, National Gallery, Museum of Practical Geology, Historical Portrait Gallery, and grants to the Royal and Geographical Societies.

A MONUMENT TO THE HEROES OF THE CRIMEA.—A monument is in course of erection in Waterloo Place, Pall Mall, London, in honor of the guards who fell in the Crimea. Upon a pedestal of granite, with the motto, Tria juncta in uno, is erected a group of three, in the costumes of the Coldstream, Grenadier and Fusilier Guards. The figures are between eight and nine feet high, and of bronze. Behind them is a trophy of real guns from Sebastopol, with shot and shell.

MANIFESTO FROM NAPOLEON.—It is reported that the imminence of the approaching crisis has led the Emperor of France to prepare a manifesto upon the affairs of Europe, with special reference to Italy, and that it will shortly appear in the Moniteur. All Europe is anxiously waiting the exposition.

Since our last issue we have received the following intelligence from Canada, Mexico, and Central America:

Canada.—The Toronto Globe says that Sir Fenwick Williams will temporarily succeed Sir Edmund Head as Governor General of Canada in October. Sir George Simpson, Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company, died at Lachine, near Montreal, on the 7th inst. The Prince of Wales, after leaving Ottawa, visited Toronto, Coburg, and other places, and at last accounts was at Niagara Falls. There were some difficulties at Toronto and Kingston, created by the acts of the Orangemen, but happily they appear to have died out.

THE PRINCE DOES THE CLEVER THING.—A letter dated Montreal, Aug. 30th, says: "While the Prince was at Sorbrooke to-day, a very affecting incident occured. John Felton, commonly called "Old Squire Felton" in his own district, was Signal Midshipman on Nelson's flag-ship,—the Victory,—at the battle of Trafalgar. He was also at the battle of Copenhagen, and wears medals for bravery in both these actions. At the blockade of Guadeloupe, West Indies, in 1809, he was the officer of the watch on board the Curieux sloop-of-war when she struck on a rock and was wrecked. On the court martial, which was of course subsequently held, there were some enemies of young Felton, and, perhaps owing to their personal hostility—perhaps to the fact that court martials were not held in these days with so much care for the ends of justice as now—he owed it that, although the wreck was caused by circumstances beyond his control,—he laboring under the misfortune of defective vision,—he was dismissed the service. His prospects were at once destroyed, and he finally emigrated to this country, where for four-and-thirty years he has lived respected. His Royal Highness having been made aware of the hardship of Mr. Felton's case—not by him, for he suffered incomplaining, but probably through Mr. Gnlt—chose this day for the occasion for exercising the prerogative delegated by her Majesty to him, and when the old man presented himself at the reception, not only received him with the greatest cordiality, speaking to him kindly words, but intimated that from that moment he was restored to the position he had lost. This caused a great ebullition of feeling on the part of his brother sailor, Capt. Moore, and immense cheering on that of the crowd. The act was in itself thoroughly appreciated. Everybody looked delighted. Mr. Felton could not conceal his pleasure, though he tried to look unmoved, and Mrs. Felton, good soul, looked at her husband with more than usual pride, as he and she were receiving the congratulations of the people."

Mexico.—At last accounts, it was reported that an army of fourteen thousand Liberals was marching rapidly in the direction of the city of Mexico; and that Gen. Miramon, at the head of an army of seven thousand men, was in the city making ready for an attack. It is said that Miramon, after his return to the capital, resigned the presidency, but was subsequently re-elected by the State Council by 23 against 19 votes. There is a report from Washington that our Government has resolved to co-operate with England, France, Prussia and Spain in their proposed mediation between the contending parties in Mexico, for the purpose of bringing the civil war to a close. This, we think, is somewhat doubtful.

Central America.—Accounts via Havana represent that on the 2d inst., an expedition was fitted out from Truxillo for the capture of Walker and his men. This expedition consisted of the British steam sloop-of-war Icarus, Commander Salmon, and a smaller vessel, presumed to have been a Honduran coaster. Both had on board Honduran troops, under the command of Gen. Alvarez, of the department in which Truxillo is situated, the same who took possession of the city after Walker had abandoned it. This expedition, proceeded down the coast to the mouth of the Rio Negro, on or near which Walker and his men were encamped; the troops entered that river in the boats of the Icarus, and there captured Walker, Rudler, and 70 other persons—among them many sick—all being in a deplorable condition. These persons were taken to Truxillo, with their arms and baggage, and there placed by the commandant of the Icarus, at the disposition of Gen. Alvarez, under condition that Walker and Rudler should be treated according to law, and that their seventy followers, officers and privates, should be permitted to return to the United States, taking an oath not to serve in any expedition against Central America—and the American Commercial Agent defraying the expense of their passage. General Alvarez accordingly took charge of the prisoners, and placed them in the Castle. It was believed that the two chiefs would be immediately executed.

POLITICAL.

NEW YORK POLITICS.—It appears by a despatch from New York to the Louisville Democrat, that in the negotations for a fusion of parties opposed to Lincoln, the Breckinridge Committee claimed ten names on the Electoral ticket, and the Douglas Committee offered six. By despatches received in this city, it appears that the Breckinridge Committee, declining to fuse on such terms, adjourned; and then the Douglas Committee concluded to accept the Breckinridge proposition. At least such is our interpretation of the somewhat vague telegraphic announcements. If this be correct, the anti-Lincoln men of New York will move in mass at the Presidential election, and with a fair prospect of success.

MAINE ELECTION.—This Election took place on Monday, 10th inst. A despatch dated Portland, September 11th, says: "The returns, thus far, indicate the election of the Black-Republican candidate for Governor, and a full ticket, by a large majority.—It is very probable that the next Black Republican candidates for Congress will be elected." We do not place much reliance on this, in its full extent.

VERMONT ELECTION.—This Election took place on the 4th inst., and resulted in the success of the Republican candidate (Fairbanks) for Governor, all the Republican candidates for Congress by increased majorities, and the choice of a Republican Senate, and a large Republican majority in the House.

Mr. Breckinridge addressed a large audience at Lexington, Ky., on the 5th inst., in defence of his withdrawal from the Presidential contest. His speech was published and is attracting great attention.

Mr. Douglas is still making stump speeches. Having gone through the Eastern and middle States, Virginia and North Carolina, he is now going to the West, and is announced to speak at Cincinnati, Indianapolis and other points.

Many of the leading citizens of New York are making arrangements for a monster mass meeting, to be held in that city, of all those opposed to the election of Lincoln and Hamlin, and it will undoubtedly be a most imposing affair.

ARKANSAS ELECTION.—We find in the Camden Eagle the vote for Congressman at the recent election in Arkansas: First District—Thomas C. Hindman received 20,051; Jesse N. Cypert received 9,995; majority for Hindman, 10,352. Second District—Edward W. Gantt received 15,569; Charles B. Mitchell received 13,007; James A. Jones received 891; Gantt's majority over Mitchell, 2,592.

CALIFORNIA AND IOWA.—The State election in California was not to be held this year on the 5th of September, as has been generally announced, but is to be held on the 6th of November, the same day as the Presidential election is held, the State election takes place in September. A number of papers have fallen into a similar error in regard to Iowa, in which the State election, this year, does not take place until the 6th of November.

MAINE ELECTION.—This Election took place on the 10th inst., and resulted in the choice of the Republican candidate (Washburn) for Governor, and all the six Republican candidates for Congress, by an increased majority—so the telegraph reports.

CONNECTICUT BRECKINRIDGE CONVENTION.—This Convention met in New Haven on the 12th, and nominated an Electoral ticket, with instructions to vote for Breckinridge, if he can be elected; otherwise, for any national man who can defeat Lincoln.

MASSACHUSETTS DOUGLAS CONVENTION.—This Convention met at Springfield on the 12th, and nominated Erasmus D. Beech, of that place, for Governor.

MASSACHUSETTS BRECKINRIDGE CONVENTION.—This Convention met in Boston on the 12th, and nominated the Hon. B. F. Butler for Governor.

THE FUSION IN NEW YORK REJECTED.—A New York despatch says that the Douglas State Committee has rejected the proposition for a fusion with the Breckinridge party on an electoral ticket.

The Oregon Democratic State Committee has divided nearly equally into Douglas and Breckinridge wings, the former calling a State Convention at Eugene on the 19th inst., and the latter on the 18th.

A Bell and Douglas Union Electoral ticket has been formed in Texas, as follows: For the State at large—Hon. B. H. Epperson, of Red River; Geo. Paschal, of Travis. For the First District—Hon. Wm. Steadman, of Rusk. For the Second District—Jno. H. Robson, of Colorado.

A meeting of the Union Executive Committee of Pensylvania is to be held at Harrisburg on the 27th inst., for the purpose of completing the Electoral ticket and selecting a candidate for Governor.

CITY NEWS.

The factory of the Louisiana Oil Company situated on the new Shell Road, near the first toll-gate, was entirely destroyed by fire, with its contents, on the evening of the 11th inst. The loss, which falls entirely upon the company, there being no insurance, is estimated at $150,000.

Mrs. Isabella McKee, of the Fourth District, died on the 7th inst., in Covington, St. Tammany parish. It will be remembered she was one of the victims of the Lemley poisoning affair and her death is said to have resulted from the poison so innocently taken on that melancholy occasion.

The city continues remarkably healthy. The number of deaths last week was 160—only one from yellow fever reported. Since the storm on the 15th we have been enjoying fine, clear, pleasant, and bracing weather. The Summer tourists are daily returning in crowds, the "floating population" begins to come in, business is getting under fair headway, and our rapid dy improving City is again a scene of bustling activity.

ANOTHER TERRIBLE STORM, WITH LOSS OF LIFE AND GREAT DESTRUCTION OF PROPERTY.—This part of the country was again visited with a very heavy and destructive gale on Saturday, 15th inst. We have no room to enter into details, but we may state briefly that in this city there has been no damage done beyond the blowing down of trees, fences, etc. At Milneberg, the Lake terminus of the Panchartrain railroad, the lice new wharf, is almost an entire wreck. Along the Lake coast, many wharves, bath-houses and out-buildings were swept away. Biloxi, we learn, was reduced to a heap of ruins and the long wharf was covered by nine feet of water. The Mobile mail boats and other Lake craft had a terribly rough time, but weathered the storm in safety. One man was killed at Biloxi by the falling of Brown's Hotel. At the Balize nearly every house was blown down, and several lives were lost. At Pass a l'Outre the only buildings left standing are the Pilot Boat Association house, Riley Knight's house, and the telegraph station. Two ships, the Shuffield and Galena, outward bound, a brig, and several schooners, were blown ashore, and a small schooner sank. Several towboats were also blown ashore. At Mobile, the damage done by the storm is estimated at $500,000. All the wharves were under water and Dauphine and Water streets were flooded. Several buildings were blown down, several steamboats blown ashore, and much cotton—several thousand bales—badly damaged. To add to the horrors of the day, a fire broke out on Government street, near Royal by which the ware-houses of Pomeroy and Marshall, and Goodman were destroyed. In the latter about 3800 bales of Cotton were burnt. Fortunately, not much damage was done to the shipping in the lower bay. We fear that the accounts from seaward will be disastrous as many vessels are now expected, especially from Northern parts. The loss of life, so far as we have heard, has happily been much less than was expected.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, September 10, 1860.

The movement in our market generally has been without much animation since the date of our last report and in Cotton the operations have been of only a moderate character, though prices have tended in favor of buyers throughout the week. In Tobacco the transactions have been on a limited scale, the stock being light and full prices claimed, and the business in Sugar and Molasses is still confined to the local trade with reduced supplies offering. The demand for western Produce has been checked by the want of freight room to neighboring ports, but with only moderate receipt prices for most descriptions have been very well maintained, and in Flour and Corn most of the transactions have been at an advance. Freights have been dull with a tendency in favor of shippers, and in Exchange we have noticed some little variation, though the rates, especially for domestic bills still maintain a pretty high range.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that they have generally been very full for the better qualities, in which most of the transactions have shewn an improvement of ⅛ to ¼ per pound, while Middling has been without any material change.

New Orleans Classification:

The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ½ de per pound.

MOLASSES.—Total receipts of the week 155 barrels. The prices obtained during the week were: Inferior to Fair, 18 to 25 cents per gallon; and Prime to Choice, 26 to 30 cents; half barrels, 26 to 30 cents per gallon.

HOME EDUCATION.

BY LETHA FONTELLE.

The children of Terre d'Amour were not perfect, naturally or habitually. They were moved by nameless whims, little caprices, varying impulses, like other children. But unlike the mass, they were early initiated into the mysteries of self-control. They were not forced to it by the stern, unscrupulous, Spartan-like discipline, but indicted by the spirit of loving obedience.

Grandpa was accustomed to say, "obedience is a child's religion." Let a child be trained to listen to the still small voice, to obey promptly and cheerfully the call of duty, and you will find the early promise fulfilled in his integrity as a man, in his fidelity as a Christian. Obedience was then the law at Terre d'Amour, enforced by parental authority and crowned by loving approval.

It is beautiful, said an old lady of the neighborhood to Grandma, "it is truly charming to see your children, from the little Belle to Mrs. Truebeart, all moving instantly to attend to the lightest expression of your wishes. And I never hear any scolding on your part, any complaint on theirs. Now I may talk to my children all day, and they will not remember what I said the next. But with your family obedience appears to be a plant of spontaneous growth. And it is the same in the church. When they take the name of Christian, they assume its duties, cares and responsibilities. They live to Christ, and their faces shine by the reflection of their ever-present Savior. They obey His voice with alacrity, as if their pleasure instead of self-denial was involved. They attend not only to the letter of the law, but imbibe its spirit also. Yours is a remarkable family."

But this was not effected by single or necessional efforts. It was the result of a wise guidance, of the judicious exercise of God-given authority, supported by steady firmness, and brightened by love. There was much owing also to the dignity of manner, to the tone of mild conscious power, to the expectent glance. They implied no weakness, no vacillation, no fear of the result. Obedience began with the dawning reason of the infant. Neither petulance nor disobedience, though half playful, half wilful, was encouraged and prnised as naive, charming, irresistible, until it became a habit, and then punished as disgreeable. But the whole manner spnraved the ready obedience, and affection shone brightly on the child that yielded with unselfish love its claims to another. Thus they learned by degrees to study not their own gratification, but the pleasure of those around them, and thus the happiness of the whole was secured.

When Miss Harper came to them she was received as one of the household faculty, to be associated with them in their ceaseless efforts to form the character of their charges on true principles, and openly honored as an efficient co-worker in the glorious labor of educating immortal souls. They spoke of her only with esteem and kindness. They were unfamiliar with that emptiness spirit that sees no excellence unless it is modelled after themselves—with that self-sufficiency that depreciates all worth in another. On the contrary, they rejoiced in goodness under any form, they encouraged talent, they gladly honored superiority; they prompt the children to offer her those graceful attentions that are so charming to all, so precious to the stranger. Nor did they relax them after a few days, for they found in their friendly efforts, and in her pleased reception of them, a new source of joy. They were never officious; they were too well bred to be so, but they were mindful of her wishes and considerate of her comfort or pleasure.

Had she taken charge of the children under less favorable auspices, their strong will, great difference in temperament, and the ardor of their native impulses, if directed by prejudice, would have occasioned her much painful annoyance, and half neutralized her instructions. But in each of the older members she found a co-operator, and in Aunt Margaret an unfailing support. They were soon comparing modes of education, and consulting together about the best interests of the children, as if they had been equally their mothers. The constant endeavor to render her duties pleasing, and to prevent any chance to her, won her heart and bound her to their [illegible] daily duties every day, but with a depressing consciousness of unappreciation, of ensueless cavilling, of her unaided and consequently half useless efforts, that chills her tenderness and unnerves her otherwise powerful energies. There are those so weakly, regardless of their children's best interests, as to speak depreciatingly and with habitual scorn of a teacher known to be efficient, who deride her little peculiarities, harmless as they may be, and laugh at the wilful disobedience and impertinence of their children. They teach her lessons of patience, of endurance, of skill in control under difficulties, but they injure the pupils irreparably.

At Terre d'Amour the work of improvement moved steadily onward. It was not confined to mental culture and a few graceful accomplishments, as is too often the case at boarding-schools. The heart unfolded healthfully in the pure home atmosphere, and received daily lessons of strength, of purity; of love. The soil was well prepared, so that the seed planted therein should take deep and abiding root, should spring up duly, bear fragrant and perennial flowers, and yield a hundred fold return of precious fruit.

Abundant and regular exercise developed the muscular energies, and gave a natural grace to their movements. Excellent food, simply prepared for the children, and a succession of choice ripe fruit, gave roundness to their lithe, active figures. But their health was never affected by undue indulgence, or dullness evoked by stupidity. The girls managed their spirited steeds with the skill and ease of Englishwomen. Their light pirogues flew down the bayou or over the lake as if the slender oar had been held by the sure hand of a Creole. And the varied, tastefully arranged gardens, were evidence of their familiarity with horticultnre. The boys were versed in all manly sports and duties, and delighted in leading their stronger arms to the aid of their sisters. There was a gentle deference to the wishes of the latter, a protective care in their intercourse that was charming to the beholder. Their daily association with the wise, the good, the refined, prevented all awkwardness, and gave a courteous ease to their manners. It did more—it elevated their thoughts, it enlarged their views, it ennobled their aims. They learned to converse well and opportunely. The school boy's vulgarities, the school-girl's simplicity, were alike unknown to them. The atmosphere of true refinement which they breathed quickened the delicacy of their perceptions, and they would have shrunk from meanness in any form.

They were by no means devoid of curiosity. The inquisitive mind, when it leads to researches in science or in literature, is a grand, a noble mind; but when it is degraded from its high office to pry into the affairs of others, it becomes despicable. It is subversive of all true refinement, for it tarnishes or destroys the dignity and purity of the soul; it degrades and narrows the intellect; it demoralizes the heart. I have seen so many youths mar the promise of a noble character, lose the esteem their talents had won, and betray the trust reposed in them, under the influence of undue curiosity, that I cannot find words to express how utterly I loathe it, with what anxiety I observe its growth.

Some children are unhappy if they do not see everything in the house, or listen to every conversation. They soon learn to exercise their memory in repeating everything they hear, until they acquire the unenviable appellation of the "busy-bodies" of the neighborhood. Parents too frequently encourage their children in their idle exaggerated reports of the little events of the school-room, of the trifling incidents in a visit to a neighbor, until they forget the promptings of innate honor, and stoop to gratify a base curiosity by peeping through key-holes, or by becoming spies and eavesdroppers. Such a child involves its parents in difficulties with their friends, and well deserves the name given by the French—"Le terrible enfant."

The indulgence of vulgar curiosity was not practicable at Terre d'Amour. The common food of gossip was not served up in that true home, and every endeavor to import it was unanimously discouraged. Idle reports were prohibited a hearing, and the character of the most polished spy regarded as despicable. Instead of prying into the affairs and secrets of others, they were encouraged to pry into the habits and secrets of birds, insects, and flowers; to learn their names, and become familiar with their characters. And instead of making mischief among friends by distorted representations, or by repeating those fragments of conversation that may be so erroneously construed, they were instructed to find boundless resources for interesting others in their varied discoveries in nature and in the charming phenomena they learned from books. Busy-bodies they were, not mischievous gossips, but busy-bodies, familiar with noble deeds, quaint piquant fancies, and the rare, beautiful thoughts that bud and blossom only in those souls that "look through nature up to nature's God."

The Touchearts possessed in an eminent degree that choice discernment and conversational talent which generates thought in others, so that every one conversed freely in their presence. But they never abused their gift by artfully drawing out information on private matters, or the sentiments one might not desire to express. A wide range of thought, noble integrity of purpose, and a delicate regard for others' feelings, placed them above the temptations of that narrow, inquisitive spirit which finds its greatest joy in unveiling individual secrets, its choicest food in uncovering a family skeleton. And this was the basis of their noble characters—they loved God supremely, and their neighbors as themselves.

THE CHRISTIANS AND PAGANS OF THE LEBANON.

When the Emperor Constantine demolished the temple and overthrew the altars of Venus on Mount Lebanon, he did not thereby Christianize its mountaineers; that merit is said to belong to the famous Christian fakir, St. Simeon, the Stylite. How the Syrian Christians of the hills came to be called Maronites, has been variously explained. Nairon, Dandini, and other Maronite theologians, anxious to free their sect from all association with heresy, ascribe the foundation of the community to the Abbott Maron, who lived in the fourth century, and whom Theodoret and Chrysostom have mentioned in their works. Mosheim gives a very different account of its origin. According to him, the Lebanon was peopled by a rabble of escaped slaves, rebels, and vagabonds, known as the Mardiates. Soon after the council of Constantinople had, in 680, condemned the Monthelitic doctrine, that after the union of the divine and human natures in the person of Christ, there was but one operation or will—the divine, in which the humna was merged—the Mardiates embraced it, asserted their independence of Rome, made John Maro their bishop, under the title of "Patriarch of Antinch," and called themselves from him, Maronites. Volney, again, says the sect took its name from Maroun, or Maron, a hermit living on the banks of the Orontes, and dying there in the odour of sanctity.—After his death several miracles were wrought by his bones, over which a tomb and chapel were erected at Hamah by the believers in the saintly ascetic. When the contest between the Greek and Roman churches was at its height, and each was striving to increase its strength, the partisans of the Pope despatched one John the Maronite, a powerful preacher, to Syria, as bishop of Dgebail. Such was the influence he obtained over the Syrian Christians, that after defeating the Melkites—the friends of the Greek Church—in battle, he established an independent society, of which he was of course the head, and gradually extended his rule over the mountains, nearly as far as Jerusalem itself.

One thing is certain: about the year 1215, the Maronites effected a reunion with Rome, by abandoning the Monthelitic doctrine, and acknowledging the titular supremacy of the pope. They retained the right of electing their patriarch and using their own ritual, as well as the privelege of clerical connubiality. Rome, on its part, assisted them with means of supporting their clergy and churches, and provided gratuitous instruction for any Maronite youths who chose to visit Rome for theological purposes. At this time, they could assemble forty thousand men capable of bearing arms.

From time to time, the Ottoman sultans made vain attempts to subdue the Maronites. Amurath III. proved more fortunate than his predecessors; his general, Ibrahim, reduced them to submission, and enforced the payment of an annual tribute to the pachalic of Tripoli, from the vineyards and mulberry-groves of Kesrouan; a tribute payable, we believe, to the present day.

The Maronites now occupy the valleys and fastnesses of the principal Lebanon ridge east of Beyrout and Tripoli, extending inland to the Bekaa, the plain between Libanus and Anti-Libanus. They number—or rather, did number before the late massacres—some 220,000 people. They are described as a fine-looking, high-spirited, hospitable, frugal, honest race, spending their lives in the cultivation of the soil. The plantations of cotton and olives, the fields of corn, the mulberry grounds and vineyards, that cover the fertile lands of Kesrouan, bear testimony to their industry and its reward. Each village is governed by its shiek, from whose decision an appeal can be made to the bishops. The latter elect the patriarch, the election being confirmed by the Sultan or Porte upon his consecration, and resides at the monastery of Kannobin; he never interferes with its secular interests, which are cared for by two chief-deacons. The bishops are divided into two classes—one having regular episcopal charges, the other being simple abbots without the care of souls; there are Maronite bishops at Aleppo, Damascus, and Cyprus. The general clergy are permitted to marry once, before ordination, but neither the patriarch nor the bishops enjoy that privelege. It is no difficult matter to attain the latter dignity—the same person may be ordained in a few hours to the several offices of lector, exorcist, acolyte, subdeacon, deacon, presbyter, archpresbyter, and bishop; the entire transition from a layman into a bishop being effected in the course of a single day! Candidates for holy orders are received for four years at a college at Ain-el-Warka; the Syrine grammar, the church offices, general learning, and practical theology making up the course of study. Each village has its chapel, and each chapel its bell—an abomination to Moslem ears. The priests subsist upon the bounty of their flocks, and the produce of their own labor. In 1827 there were no less than eighty convents in the Lebanon, of which 66 belonged to the Maronite monks. They dress in a brown woollen garb, and never taste animal food.

In performing divine service, several priests are engaged together, standing around the altar; they burn a great deal of incense. Formerly the communion was taken in both kinds, by both laymen and clergy, but since 1736 the Romish fashion has been practised. To the same source they are indebted for confirmation and auricular confession. They consecrate the baptismal water by prayer, the candidate is then plunged in it three times, but the formula is only said once, after which the baptized person is annointed upon the head and breast. Their minor services are nocturns, held at midnight; lauds at daylight; tierce, shortly before mass; sexts, at midday; nones at three o'clock; vespers at sunset; and complins after supper. Each office consists of a preface and two or three prayers and hymns. The services are performed in Old Syrine, the gospel alone being read in the vernacular Arabic. During Lent, they do not eat until two or three hours before sunset; they also fast twenty days before the Nativity, and on every Wednesday and Friday throughout the year, abstaining from food until the afternoon. The Maronites dwelling in the neighborhood of the sacred cedars, celebrate the transfiguration with a religious service under the shadow of the vesereble trees—the seven giants of Mount Lebanon.

The Druses, the most compact and united sectarians in Asia, occupy the whole of the southern range of the Lebanon chain, the western slope of Anti-Lebanon, and Gibl-Sheikh, where they hold exclusive possession of upwards of forty towns and villages, and share two hundred with the Maronites; while about eighty villages in other parts of Anti-Lebanon are peopled with them.—They owe their origin to a Persian, Mohammed Ben-Ismail ed-Derozy, who settled in Egypt in 1037, and became such a fanatical disciple of that monster or madman, the Calif Aakem, that he was driven from the country, and obliged to take refuge in the valley of Wady-el-Tiem. Here he propagated his dogmas, which were afterwards modified by Hamza, whom the Druses venerate as their actual founder. This singular community believe in the unity of God and his manifestation of himself to men in the persons of seven individuals, the last of whom was Hakem, of infamous memory. They also believe in the existence of five spiritual ministers of Heaven, who have from time to time appeared on earth, the chief of these being Jesus Christ and Hamza. According to them, all the souls that have been created in the world were numbered from the beginning, have never increased or diminished, and will so remain to all eternity; all the stars, suns, moons in sight of the earth having been created for their sole use and good. They believe in the transmigration of souls—not allowing, however, that the souls of men ever pass into the lower animals—and look forward to the period when Hakem shall be undisputed lord of the earth. They have rejected the seven points of Islamism, substituting for them seven others—1. Veracity (to each other only); 2. Mutual protection and assistance; 3. Renunciation of all other religions; 4. Profession of the unity of Hakem as God; 5. Contentment with his works; 6. Submission to his will; 7. Separation from those in error, and from demons.

They are divided into two classes—Akals, or those initiated into the Druse mysteries; and Djahils, or the uninitiated. This distinction is one irrespective of sex, rank, or wealth; and any one may, after probation, pass from the lower to the higher class by making certain declarations, and renouncing certain indulgences. The Djahils are free from all religious duties, although cognizant of the leading features of the faith and the secret signs of recognition; they can eat, drink, dress as they please. The Akals, on the contrary, are subject to many restrictions. They must not wear gold, silk, embroidered or fanciful apparel. Wine, spirits, tobacco, and snuff are forbidden luxuries. If rich, they must not have more than four sons born to them—if poor, half that number must suffice; and a female Akal is excluded from entering the temple for two years if she marries one of the uninitiated. An Akal never swears or utters obscene language, or tells a lie; and so fearful is he of receiving money that has been improperly acquired, that upon being paid any sum, he invariably employs a third party to exchange the coins, so that the cash he pockets may not be directly connected with the original donor. The Akals are treated with great respect and reverence by their less self-denying brethren; but should they break any of their vows in the slightest degree, they become outcasts from that time. As soon as one of them dies, a meeting is held, and every circumstance of his life rigidly criticised; if his reputation comes unscathed from the ordeal, they say: "May God be merciful to him!" if otherwise, no prayer is offered, as they believe it would be inefficacious.

The Druse temples are all built in secluded situations; in these the Akals meet on Fridays after dusk, the men being separated from the women by a wooden railing. The proceedings begin with a general conversation on politics, in which they each relate any news they may have heard, likely to affect the community. Passages are then read from religious books, and all join in the Druse war hymn, describing the coming of the tribe from Cbinn, the destruction of the unbelievers, and the conquest of the world by the followers of Hakem. Food is then distributed; and the principal Akals are left to concert any measures they may consider necessary for the general welfare; intelligence of a more private nature is now communicated without reserve, but anything requiring profound secrecy is discussed by a chosen committee of three. A Druse can commit no crime greater than that of betraying a national secret; the traiter is looked upon as an apostate from the faith, and meets with no mercy at the hands of the fraternity.

To enable the nation, upon occasion, acting as one man, intelligence is conveyed through the scattered people by means as simple as they are certain. The elder of each village temple represents his district at a town temple, the elders of the town-temples communicate with the chief-priest at Bahleen, hear the central news in return, and retail it to the village elders, who in turn communicate what concerns the entire community to the Akals of their respective districts, and what is secret to the select few. The principle of co-operation is carried out thoroughly; and if a Druse hardly appears to act in opposition to the general policy, it is to serve a purpose, and with the full consent and approbation of the leaders of the nation. To gain their ends they will assume the forms of any religion; many, seized in Damascus, have professed Islamism to save themselves, and been decapitated immediately by their captors, that they might die in the true faith.

The Druse women are all taught to read and write.—Polygamy is unknown among them. Divorce takes place by mutual agreement; where that is wanting, an "assembly of verification" is held, consisting of the relatives of both parties; and whichever is considered to be in the wrong, has to give up to the other one-half of his or her property. If the news is spread abroad that a man has divorced his wife, divorce her he must, however unfounded the report; and once a woman is divorced, her quondam husband must never look upon her face again.—Should a female be detected in wrong-doing, no one will intermarry with her family until the offender has been put to death by her nearest male relative, who thus wipes out the disgrace, the authorities never troubling the murderer, who is considered to have done no harm. The birth of a child is an occasion of extravagant rejoicing; and the little stranger is serenaded the first night of his arrival—a species of welcome, considering the sort of music in vogue in the mountains, enough to frighten him out of his little life. A Druse mother would never forgive any one who rocked her child's cradle when its little owner was out of it, as she firmly believes evil spirits are ever on the watch for such an opportunity of taking possession—they only do so it seems, when the cradle is swinging—which if they once obtain, they never quit till they have killed the infant.

The male Druses are hardy, robust, and long-lived; and every one of them at need, a warrior. Corn is but little cultivated by them, preferring the staple product of the country. They employ the mule and ass as beasts of burden, their mountains being impassable for the Arab camels, and the roads rendered purposely difficult for horses, in order to impede the progress of troops. They eat three times a day; the morning meal consists of bread, cheese, and grapes; at mid-day, they dine on kibby—chopped meat and corn made into balls and fried—rice rolled in boiled vine-leaves, pilaff, and curdled milk, salads and omelets; the richer among them sitting down to soup, fowls, and mutton, stewed with vegetables; but beef and pork are never eaten.

The government is in the hands of the grand emir, who pronounces sentence in criminal cases, decides civil causes, and settles all differences between his subjects. Not that they often appeal to him to do so; such matters are usually settled by the sheiks, who govern the seven districts into which the Druses are divided. They also collect the taxes—no onerous duty, as they are willingly paid; and after deducting a per centage for themselves, remit the balance to the emir. The Chief of the Stars is a great man among this strange people, and no enterprise of moment is ever undertaken without consulting him.

The early history of the Druse nation is lost in obscurity. They occupied the Lebanon prior to the invasion of Syria by the Crusaders. The Ottoman sultans made vigorous attempts to subdue them, but in vain, until Amurath III., after a fierce contest, compelled the mountain warriors to succumb, and put an end to the anarchy then existing among them, by placing them under one head, responsible to the Porte. From this time their annals are records of continual strife; they revenged the loss of their independence by losing no opportunity of practising predatory warfare upon their nominal masters. In the beginning of the seventeenth century, when Fakireddeen was emir, they obtained a victory over the Turkish forces which left them free for a time. Unfortunately the emir, carried away by his success, joined the Rebel pacha of Aleppo in sacking Damascus. The sultan unsavored this audacious act by sending an army of 15,000 picked men into the Lebanon. At this critical moment, internecine feuds broke out among the Druses; and when Fakereddeen assembled his forces on the banks of the Damour, he found himself, from the defection of several chiefs, too weak to contend with the enemy, and leaving his army he fled to Europe, and for nine years found an asylum at the court of the Medici. During his absence, the Druses, commanded by his brother and son, made head against the Turks, and aided by the Maronites drove them from the plains of the Bekaa, following up the success soon afterwards by a brilliant victory in a valley near Sidon, when 1200 Druses proved more than a match for 20,000 Turks. When Fakereddeen returned to his people, however, he found them beleaguered by a host of enemies. This was in 1622, during one of the severest winters ever known in the Lebanon. The emir resolved upon sallying forth upon the foe, and, axe in hand, hew the way; his daring plan succeeded, and the Turks were glad to come to terms. Four years afterwards, Fakereddeen was invested by the sultan with the government of the mountain district from Jerusalem to Tripoli, a country inhabited by predatory hordes, who acknowledged no authority whatever; yet this troublesome dignity involved him in difficulties with the Damascene pacha, who paid for his interference by being well beaten. The Druses had now attained the height of their power, when their great captain and all his family were suddenly removed by the bowstring, after which the power of the Druse emir was gradually reduced, till it became a mere shadow of what it had been.

In 1768, a Druse chief, named Daher, assumed the title of sheik of Acre, Nazareth, Tiberius, Safat, and Galilee, and routed all the Ottoman armies sent against him. In 1772, a revolution was effected in Egypt, many of the Druses seduced to join the Porte, and Sidon was besieged by the Turks and their new allies. Daher galloped to Acre, found there some Russian vessels of war, struck a bargain, and returned to wage a fierce contest with his foes. His Russian friends bombarded the Turkish towns; the Druses soon fell off from the Moslems, and Daher's star was once more in the ascendant. In 1775, Jaffa fell before the Egyptian troops, but the death of their commander stopped the progress of the victorious army. The Ottoman government still professed peace and friendship towards Daher, but suddenly bombarded Sidon with their fleet. The gallant chief, unprepared for this, was seeking present safety in flight, when he was shot dead by a peasant. Djezzar appointed the Emir Bechier Shehaub governor of the Lebanon, but it was long before the Druses would consent to acknowledge his authority, and not until their leader, Shiek Beshier Djunblout, had been decapitated at Acre.

In 1840, a peasant, whether Druse or Maronite is not known, emptied a basket of rubbish over his neighbor's wall, to the detriment of his neatly trimmed garden.—The injured party was not inclined to put up quietly with such an affront from one who was of another faith; the personal quarrel expanded, each sought for champions, and so the feud grew day by day, till it assumed the shape of civil war. Still further to embitter the relation between the two sects, the Maronites sided with Mehemet Ali in his dispute with the Porte, while the Druses espoused the cause of the sultan, and suffered accordingly—Ibrahim Pacha leaving nothing but ruins wherever he carried the Egyptian forces. Since that time, the Maronites and Druses have been constantly breaking the peace. In 1845, a terrible war was carried on between them, both sides vying with each other in cruelty; above one hundred villages were utterly destroyed, two-thirds of which belonged to the Maronites.

Europeans are naturally inclined to side with the Maronites, but they are far from being the innocent suckling doves their French sympathisers would have the world believe. The Druses are denounced as living incarnations of relentless intolerance, although they have, ere this, been held up as examples worthy of imitation by nations boasting of civilisation for the gentle spirit which guides them,' while, but fifteen years ago, the Maronite patriarch shewed his idea of toleration by launching an anathema at certain Protestant missionaries laboring among the Druses; forbidding any man to admit his fellow-Christians into his house, to visit them, to sell to them, to eat with them, or serve them in any way, under pain of incurring the curse of God, St. Peter and St. Paul, and fire and brimstone! The Druses have once him upon English sympathy, which one French neighbors cannot be expected to appreciate: when a refugee from any land sets foot on Druse soil, he is free from pursuit and persecution; the Druse never surrenders a guest, whatever his faith may be; and the nation would rise as one man against any attempt to seize a refugee who had claimed their hospitality. Nothing, of course, can palliate the shocking massacres which have horrified Christendom; but it should be remembered, that a people numbering some 80,000 have fallen upon a nation counting 220,000 souls, to the male portion of which the musket and dagger are every-day articles of wear; and that the Maronites have provoked the strife by interfering at Constantinople for the destruction of their rivals, relying, probably, if matters went against them, upon the intervention of the great Christian powers to save them from the consequences of their own acts.

A PAINTER'S TABLE-TALK.

"We have biographers enough and to spare in the present day, but we have by no means too many good ones. So soon as any one dies who has the least pretensions to greatness, his 'Remains' are wrangled for by a whole tribe of posthumous editors, and rechauffed in half-a-dozen forms for the library table. When the subject is of itself noteworthy, the interest is often beaten out to gold-leaf thinness, for the purpose of spreading over those two volumes, which are the orthodox number for biography, as are three for fiction. When, on the other hand, the original materials are scanty, the result is meagre indeed, and has commonly to be eked out by the introduction of the hero's god-fathers and god-mothers, or by an appendix with his genuine autograph, and half-a-dozen letters to his wine-merchant. To meet with readable 'Recollections' of even the most eminent man is therefore rare, while to be presented with such respecting one whose feet have kept the cool sequestered vales, or at most have climbed the hills of Life, and not the mountains, is almost unexampled.' Mr. Tom Taylor is one of the few who has succeeded in editing both kinds of autobiography. He shewed not only appreciation of his subject, but judgment in pruning and suppressing, when he gave us that memorable book, the life of Haydon; his present labor of love has been expended upon a less known painter, the execution of whose works was more equal to his conception of what they should have been. Robert Leslie seldom—scarcely ever—painted 'out of his own head;' he suffered the old poets, satirists, and story-tellers to supply his subjects, and contented himself with embodying their creations more satisfactorily and strikingly than perhaps any other artist.—His name, therefore, is not so familiar to the public as are his works; and thousands have seen and admired his 'Sir Roger de Coverley going to Church,' his 'Uncle Toby and the Widow Wadman,' grateful to Addison, and Sterne, and Cervantes, rather than to himself, for the treat he set before them. His own life was prosperous, as it deserved to be, and proportionally uneventful, nor is that one of the two volumes which treats solely of himself and his own doings by any means the more interesting. The whole work is modestly but accurately entitled Autobiographical Recollections, and forms one of the most charming examples of table-talk we ever read. Not seldom have we sat tete-a-tete with some retired Lion or Lioness of Art or Literature, and listened to their discourse upon what they have heard or seen in bygone times; what great ones they have met under this and the other circumstance, and what good thing was said, which the greedy public had as yet not fastened upon. When a monologist of this sort is judicious of selection, and not too egotistical, we know no more pleasant companion; and just such a one do we find in the book before us, with the additional advantage that we can shut it up (which is difficult to be done with the Lion), when we have had a sufficiency of anecdote, and walk away.

Leslie sailed to America in 1799, in a ship carrying twenty-four guns, and was attacked by a French privateer, greatly superior in force. 'The temper of the English, young and old, towards France at that bellicose period was curiously exemplified in the course of the action. 'A wad from one of the Frenchman's 32-pound carronades struck the starboard quarter-rail, and flew back, spinning round with great velocity. The captain instantly attempted to jump on it and stop it, almost pushing me down to get it. Then tearing and cutting it to pieces, he charged the larboard 6-pounder several times, and, stuffing the fragments of the wad into it, fired it back again at the Frenchman, swearing bitterly at the whole nation all the time. Two boys, from thirteen to fifteen years of age, got a stroke or two from the first officer for dancing hornpipes on the main-deck during the heaviest part of both ships' fire. Another boy, in carrying forward a 24-pound cartridge, had it shot away from his hands. "There," said he, with an oath directed to the Frenchman, "you———, now I must go back for another!"'

It is rare, however, to find even so much of personal matter as the above in Mr. Leslie's volume; his modesty shrinks from narrating what happens to himself, however indirectly; and he prefers to record the sayings of such eminent persons as the world is eager to listen to, and with whom he enjoyed peculiar opportunities of associating. His account of Coleridge, about whom so much has been written, in blame as well as praise, is exceedingly favorable. 'It is not the lot of any one, twice in his life,' writes he, 'to meet with so extraordinary a man.' The poet, in speaking of his favorite Shakspeare, observed 'that the difficulty was great in imagining an expression adequate to the feelings of Othello when he first sees Iago after having discovered his villainy, and he thought it a master-stroke of Shakspeare to surmount it as he has done.

> I look down towards his feet; but that's a fable.
> If that thou be'st a devil, I cannot kill thee.'

And again: 'I can never read,' said he, 'any of those scenes in which children are introduced, without laying the book down, and loving Shakspeare over again.'—Coleridge's lectures were extemporaneous, but he had books about him for quotation; on turning to one of these, which happened to be a work of his own, he said: 'As this is a secret which I confided to the public a year or two ago, and which, to do the public justice, has been very faithfully kept, I may be permitted to read you a passage from it. 'Speaking of the utilitarians, he observed: "The penny-saved penny-got utilitarians forgot, or do not comprehend, high moral utility—the utility of poetry and of painting, and of all that exalts and refines our nature." He thought Lord Byron's misanthropy was affected, or partly so, and that it would wear off as he grew older. He said that Byron's perpetual quarrel with the world was as absurd as if the spoke of a wheel should quarrel with the movement of which it must of necessity partake.' Leslie once found Coleridge driving the balls on a bagatelle board for a kitten to run after them. He noticed that, as soon as the little thing turned its back to the balls, it seemed to forget all about them, and played with its tail. "I am amused," he said, "with their little short memories."' A few days after his tragedy of Remorse appeared, Coleridge was sitting in the coffee-room of a hotel, and heard his name coupled with a coroner's inquest, by a gentleman who was reading a newspaper to a friend. He asked to see the paper, which was handed to him with the remark, that "it was very extraordinary that Coleridge, the poet, should have hanged himself just after the success of his play; but he was always a strange mad fellow." "Indeed, sir," said Coleridge, "it is a most extraordinary thing that he should have hanged himself, and be the subject of an inquest, and yet that he should at this moment be speaking to you." The astonished stranger hoped he had "said nothing to hurt his feelings," and was made easy on that point. The newspaper related that a gentleman in black had been cut down from a tree in Hyde Park, without money or papers in his pockets, his shirt being marked "S. T. Coleridge;" and Coleridge was at no loss to understand how this might have happened, since he seldom travelled without losing a shirt or two.'

Almost all who knew him, though it were ever so slightly, were moved to come to him for advice in all matters, save those, we conclude, concerning the investment of money. 'When Allston was suffering extreme depression of spirits, immediately after the loss of his wife, he was haunted, during sleepless nights, by horrid thoughts; and he told me that diabolical imprecations forced themselves into his mind. The distress of this to a man so sincerely religious as Allston may be imagined. He wished to consult Coleridge, but could not summon resolution. He desired, therefore, that I would do it; and I went to Highgate, where Coleridge was at that time living with Mr. Gillman. I found him walking in the garden, his hat in his hand (as it generally was in the open air), for he told me that, having been one of the Blue coat boys, among whom it is the fashion to go bareheaded, he had acquired a dislike to any covering of the head. I explained the cause of my visit, and he said: "Allston should say to himself, 'Nothing is me but my will. These thoughts, therefore, that force themselves on my mind are no part of me, and there can be no guilt in them.' If he will make a strong effort to become indifferent to their recurrence, they will either cease, or cease to trouble him." He said much more, but this was the substance; and after it was repeated to Allston, I did not hear him again complain of the same kind of disturbance.' Of Charles Lamb and his associates, Coleridge wrote: 'His character is a sacred one with me; no associations that he may form can hurt the purity of his mind, but it is not, therefore, necessary that I should see all men with his eyes.' And again: 'Nothing ever left a stain on that gentle creature's mind, which looked upon the degraded men and things around him like moonshine on a dunghill, which shines and takes no pollution. All things are shadows to him, except those which move his affections.'

From the dread of appearing affected, says Leslie, 'Lamb sometimes lapsed himself into his behavior before persons who were slightly acquainted with him. With the finest and tenderest feelings ever possessed by man, he seemed carefully to avoid any display of sentimentality in his talk. The following trifling anecdote is merely given as an illustration of his playfulness. I dined with him one day at Mr. Gillman's. Returning to town in the stage-coach, which was filled with Mr. Gillman's guests, we stopped for a minute or two at Kentish Town. A woman asked the coachman, "Are you full inside?" Upon which Lamb put his head through the window and said: "I am quite full inside; that last piece of pudding at Mr. Gillman's did the business for me."' But he would give replies of that kind when something of quite another character was expected from him, through the morbid fear above alluded to; and the painter, Stothard, suffered from the same weakness, from which, indeed, few graceful and poetic minds are altogether exempt. 'Full as his countless works are of exquisite sentiment, I never heard him use the word sentiment in his life. I spoke to him one day of his touching picture of a sailor taking leave of his wife or sweet-heart, and he said: "I am glad you like it, sir; it was painted with japanner's gold size."'

With reference to George IV.'s known dislike to Peel, and contempt of his plebeian origin, and supposed want of 'taste', Sidney Smith used to tell this story: 'Peel, when in the ministry, and on a visit at the Brighton Pavilion, was called out of bed in the middle of the night to attend his majesty in what—his dinner having disagreed with him in a very alarming manner—the king supposed to be his last moments. Peel was much affected, and the king, after a few words, which he could scarcely utter, said: "Go, my dear Peel—God bless you!—I shall never see you again;" and as Peel turned to leave the room, he added faintly: "Who made that dressing-gown, my dear Peel? It suits very badly behind. God bless you, my dear fellow! Never employ that tailor again."'

Samuel Rogers, who has had but hard measure dealt him by many an natchlographer and writer of 'Recollections,' is spoken of by Leslie almost [illegible] as a gentle mould,' and it must have been scarcely possible for the most sathleal of men to keep their acid in the presence of one so genial as our author. We can easily believe, however, how excellent a story-teller was the poet-banker, and what a fund of stories the aged author of the Pleasures of Memory must have possessed. He spoke one day of a 'wretch who, for some atrocious crime, was hanged in chains. His whole life had been so desperately wicked, that the country people believed his body would be carried away by the devil. The day after his execution, their prediction seemed verified, for the corpse was gone; but, strange to say, in about eight or ten days, it was there again, safely enclosed within the irons, and as if but newly dead. The truth was, that on the night of the execution, a farmer and his son who had been for some days from home, were returning in a cart, and passing close to the gibbet, were startled by a groan from the body, and then a feeble voice imploring help. When they got the fellow home, they nursed him with the greatest care, till, in the middle of one night, his deliverer was disturbed by a noise, and discovered the villain in the act of packing up every article of value in the house which he could conveniently carry away. The farmer had just time to awake his son, who agreed with him that they had better put their new friend into his chains again.'

Of Sir Walter Scott, although Leslie stayed at Abbotsford, and knew him well, there is nothing very quotable; but he testifies to some gross inaccuracies in the Life by Lockhart, which, although concerning matters of little importance, are significant, indeed, of the doubtful character of the book as a record of facts. The two best things, perhaps, in all our painter's Table-talk, are told, however, of persons unknown to fame. Here is a story told by one Morgan, a sea-captain, concerning the choice of a husband at sea, which may afford a profitable hint to young ladies en voyage: 'Single ladies often cross the water under the especial care of the captain of the ship; and if a love-affair occurs among the passengers, the captain is usually the confidante of one or both parties. A very fascinating young lady was placed under Morgan's care, and three young gentlemen fell desperately in love with her. They were all equally agreeable, and the young lady was puzzled which to encourage. She asked the captain's advice. "Come on deck," he said, "the first day when it is perfectly calm—the gentlemen will, of course, all be near you. I will have a boat quietly lowered down; then do you jump overboard, and see which of the gentlemen will be the first to jump after you. I will take care of you."

'A calm day soon came; the captain's suggestion was followed, and two of the lovers jumped after the lady at the same instant. But between these two the lady could not decide, so exactly equal had been their devotion.—She again consulted the captain. "Take the man that didn't jump—he's the most sensible fellow, and will make the best husband."'

The other anecdote is one of which the same may be said, as Rogers remarked of a certain mot of Smith's—that the non-appreciation of it would prove the total lack of humor in any man. 'Maltby was one of the most absent of men. While in Paris together, Rogers dined at a party where a lady who sat next him did not know him at first, but after hearing him talk for some time, discovered who he was. Maltby was not at this dinner, and Rogers telling him of this lady, said, "She asked if my name was not Rogers." "And was it?" inquired Maltby.'

There is not one word, in all Mr. Leslie's Recollections, that can give a moment's pain to man or woman; they respect the memories of the dead as well as the feelings of the living; and well would it be for those without the charmed circles of art and literature, if hands like his could be more often found fit to be trusted with a note-book.—Chamber's Journal.

POPULATION OF THE UNITED STATES.

In the year 1815, the late Elkanah Watson, of revolutionary memory, published the following estimate of the probable population of the United States for a series of years:

In 1820—9,625,734; the actual result was 9,638,151.
In 1830—12,933 645; actual result was 12,866,020.
In 1840—17,115,526; actual result was 17,062,566.
In 1860—31,753,854.
In 1870—42,328,432.
In 1880—56,450,241.
In 1890—77,266,989.
In 1900—100,355,892.
In 1930—133,000,000, in round numbers.
In 1950—177,000,000, " "
In 1970—236,000,000, " "
In 2000—283,000,000, " "

In all probability the census of the present year will show a remarkably close approximation to the calculation.

He that followeth after righteousness and mercy findeth life, righteousness, and honor.

THE BLIND PREACHER OF THE SANDWICH ISLES.

When first visited by Captain Cook, the Sandwich islanders showed a disposition to receive him with great kindness, mingled with awe; for, never having seen white men before, they supposed they were gods, and called the great commander Orono, meaning a god; making sacrifices to him, and even appointing a priest to attend him, who, when on shore, ran before him, exclaiming: 'The Orono is coming;' whereupon every one under the dignity of a chief or priest fell down flat on his face, remaining in that position until he was past. At first, the sailors got on pretty well with

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1860.

Only Fifty Cents for the Advocate from the first Number in October till the end of the Year.

A WORD TO OUR FRIENDS.

"Brethren, enter the Word of Exhortation."

We desire to say a few words to the agents and friends of the Advocate. We hope they will read attentively what we say, and that they will comply with our requests.

First of all, we do earnestly request all our subscribers, who have not done so, to pay up to the end of the year. Much is dependent upon it. The success of our plan to make all subscriptions begin and end with the year, is dependent upon it. That plan we have inaugurated and prosecuted at the expense of money, time, labor, and trouble. It will avoid confusion in accounts, and will prove convenient and agreeable to us and all our subscribers and agents. Shall the success of that plan be marred by the delinquency of a few? We hope not. And then, we need the money. Times have been hard; there has been a financial pressure for some time; it may get worse. We have gone to considerable expense in the improvement of the paper. We wish to improve it still more. This will cost us money. Pay us what you owe us. It is a little matter with you, but, all of them together, it is a great matter to us.

We have sent out the accounts once; many responded, but some have not. We are now sending them out again. You will receive them shortly. Pay the preacher, or remit the money to us, immediately. Let us have no unpaid account on the books at the end of the year. If you think you find an error in the account, tell the preacher, and let him settle it, or write us, and we will settle it. But do not get angry. Act like a christian gentleman or lady. Are we not all honest, all friends? But whether you get angry or not, pay the money; be sure.

And now we ask our preachers and friends to help us to increase our circulation—the circulation of your paper. Make a strong effort for us between this and the Conferences. Send us a large list of new subscribers.—Get every body to subscribe, in the Church and out of it. Come, brethren and friends, we work for you all the time, work some for us. How many new subscribers can you get? Have you made a sufficient effort this year? Let the preachers, the men, the women, and the children help.

THE THREE GREAT BRANCHES OF METHODISM.

There are some great facts in American Methodism, and some great truths in her philosophy, which it seems difficult to impress upon our Northern and British brethren; but which will find ample justice when the time comes for the preparation of a candid and impartial history of her present transition state. In a late number of the New York Methodist, an able, and generally impartial journal, we find a comparison of British and American Methodism which is highly suggestive of the above view. There it is that each has developed its life according to the necessities of its position, and that each is to-day of a peculiar [illegible] that American Methodism is at present involved in a vast political controversy, which has withdrawn attention from purely denominational interests. Education, missionary activities, lay delegation, are, for the time being, held in abeyance. We are rushed and almost riven by an infernal feud. From a want of exercise of due caution, we have made ourselves participants in a popular excitement, and have brought into the Church the passions engendered by the struggles of the great political parties for power. Our Church controversies now raging have a quasi-political aspect; and it was curious to observe in the debates of the late General Conference (Northern) how many of the speeches made were affected by the prevalent tone of political "stump" oratory. All this proceeds upon the supposition that there is no such branch of American Methodism as the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Whereas that Church is nearly as large as the Northern branch, and promises to be fully as large, and it is much larger than the British Methodist Church,—"the mother of us all."

Moreover, however true the above picture of semi-political strife and discord may be in regard to the Northern Church, it has no application whatever to the Southern Church. The picture drawn by the Methodist of the English Church, in regard to freedom from entangling alliances, is as true also of the Southern Church, in regard to the political agitations of this country. British Methodism, he says, is at present free from serious internal troubles, and the energies of the Wesleyans are now devoted, without distraction, to the growth and expansion of their polity. There is manifested by its leading spirits an extreme care to keep the connection free from all participation in politico-ecclesiastical contests. The only national question in which Wesleyans are concerned, is that of "Church rates," which is an offshoot of the old debate respecting the relations of the State Church to dissenters. On this subject, Mr. Arthur expressed himself nobly, and appeared to carry the Conference along with him; and the same is true of the practice of the Southern Church. He said: "We draw from the Establishment in our history—in influences like those which belong to such a building as this in which we are assembled; we draw from Puritanism very largely; in our organization we draw from Presbyterianism immensely; and we draw from the Moravian Church, too. My feeling toward other churches is not, 'I have nothing to do with you;' but 'I am the friend of all, the enemy of none.' I believe that the more thoroughly catholic we are, the more we shall be blessed. As to our bearing upon the future history of the Established Church in this country, there is nothing so friendly to the true interests of that Church as our unpolitical Methodist bearing. Go on, taking no sides, having nothing to do with party strife. I do entreat every brother, so far as his personal influence extends, to counteract in private conversation every tendency to drive us to extremes. I should be very sorry to see the day when Methodism did not contain men of wide differences of opinion. There always were men of different types. John Wesley was one of one sort, Charles Wesley of quite another. Their relations to the Church of England were very different; and a good thing, too. Methodism was never meant to be a sect. John Wesley's idea was the recovery of primitive Christianity under the modern name of Methodism; and while we are pursuing that idea we may leave such questions as the one before us. Let us all go on, by God's help, spreading scriptural holiness throughout the land."

The Methodist adds, most truly, that if we on this side of the water kept before us, as clearly as this eloquent Wesleyan, the distinctive mission of Methodism, our Church controversies would be settled in a single day.—Indeed, he might have gone farther; he might have said that if we had done this from the beginning, our controversies never would have had a beginning, and the American Methodist Church would, to-day, have been one undivided family. But the Methodist again forgets the existence of the Southern Methodist Church, and forgets, also, that she is pursuing the very course indicated and approved in his remarks above. The policy shadowed forth in the above-quoted speech of Mr. Arthur is the one from which the Southern Church will never deviate. Why is the Methodist unwilling to give her credit for either her existence or her policy? Why does not the Methodist advocate a similar policy in his own Church, instead of venting vain regrets? The evil must be checked now, if ever. The popular majority among American Methodists is in favor of a Diolpline free from connection with political questions. That majority will become larger with every year. The Northern Methodist Church is the only leading American Church which, by its position in regard to the great questions of American politics, is forced to be sectional. A change of position on her part—a correction of the great error of our early history—would result, ultimately, in the re-union of the now divided Methodist Church. Unless that change take place, the Southern Church will ultimately absorb all but the ultra-abolition faction of Methodism. The destiny of the Northern Church is chained to the fortunes of abolitionism; that of the Southern Church is utterly free from all political complications. We say these things, not in a sectional, but a catholic Methodist spirit. The remarks of the Methodist found below have but a partial application to Southern Methodism. We are more progressive than our Northern brethren, and nearly as systematic and conservative as our British brethren: "The Wesleyans excel us in method and discipline; we, perhaps, excel them in elastic energy. True to English instincts, they combine well conservatism and progress. We will hear of no progress unless it move with the speed of the whirlwind. Our history would, perhaps, furnish a finer record of privations heroically endured in the extension of Christ's kingdom; theirs would show resources better utilized, and system, economy, and thrift, made to tell, as they always do, in the expenditure of means to the best advantage. In a word, Wesleyan Methodism bears the impress of stability; it is, doubtless, to-day more stable than ever. American Methodism needs something—whatever that may be—to give it steadiness and balance. If it shall be recorded, that it divided twice within twenty years, the world may well doubt of its future. While it will then be conceded that we had the energy to build up a vast ecclesiastical system, it will be added that we lacked the wisdom necessary to give it perpetuity."

PROTESTANTISM IN FRANCE.

We resume the subject so soon, after the paper of week before last, for the reason that we have long been of opinion that France has not held the place to which her importance entitles her in the estimation of Protestant Christendom. Why should the churches be so zealous for the evangelization of the savage and semi-babarian heathen, who promise but little except in connection with increased commerce and civilization, and political progress, and do so little for those civilized and refined nations where a pure gospel is but little known, and yet where there is religious toleration? If Paul was not ashamed to preach the gospel to mighty Rome and polished Athens, why should we be ashamed to preach it in Paris, the metropolis of the world of art and fashion, and in the capitals and universities of Germany! Truly, it seems to us that there is a Macedonian call to the Christians of this country and England in this direction. And we trust also that all Italy, even Rome herself, will soon be open to the unrestrained preaching of the pure gospel. In France, we sincerely hope that a bright and glorious day is beginning to dawn, and that the blood of the martyred Huguenots will yet prove the seed of the Church. The following facts, which we obtain from the New York Methodist, confirm this hope.

A trial of vast importance to Protestantism in France was finished recently in the Court of Cassation, the highest French judicial tribunal. Fifteen years ago a number of Protestant schools [illegible] partment of the Haute-Vienne. Many children of Romanists attended them. In a few years the fruit appeared: Protestantism began to bring its usual blessings to the people, and they were rapidly leaving Rome. The priests took the alarm, and the prefects were badgered until they suppressed the schools. Since that time no Protestant schools have been authorized in that region. But the Evangelical Society of France kept some of its teachers and colporteurs in the district, who went from house to house, wherever pupils could be had, and instructed them around the firesides of their parents. This work grew, until the number of pupils under instruction in this way greatly exceeded the number that had attended the schools before their suppression. Here was a new trouble for the priests. Their grievances were intolerable, and they again appealed unto Cæsar. Last spring a case was brought to trial. M. Jusnel, one of the teachers employed by the Evangelical Society, (whose school was in the number of those suppressed,) received at his own house the children of several families in turn, taking those of one family at one hour, and of another family at another, etc., thus giving instruction without opening a "school." The tribunal of Bellac, before which the case was brought, held that M. Jusnel had, in fact, opened a school without authority, in violation of the law of March 15th, 1850. That law obliges all persons who design to give "public instruction, to make certain declarations and obtain a legal authorization, before opening an establishment." The tribunal condemned M. Jusnel to a fine, and put an end to his teaching. He appealed to the Imperial court of Limoges, which confirmed the decree of the tribunal of Bellac. He finally appealed to the Court of Cassation. The case was fully argued and considered. There was a report from counsellor Bresson, and the avocat-general, M. Galllos, argued the question for the priests. M. Jusnel's side was advocated by the Count Delaborde, a convert to Protestantism, and one of the ablest pleaders now at the French bar. The court decided that "by public instruction is understood instruction given in common to a number of children, in a place specially devoted to the purpose; but that a teacher who gives lessons to children of the same family, whether in the house of their parents or in his own, gives private instruction, and therefore does not need previous authorization, according to the law of March 15th, 1850." The decrees of the courts of Limoges and Bellac were accordingly reversed. It is to be hoped that this decision will settle the question finally, not merely in theory, but in practice.

In the present aspects of French Protestantism there are many very encouraging facts. It is believed that there are now about 1,600,000 Protestants in France—an increase of perhaps half a million since 1800. This increase is largely made up of converts from Romanism. Pastor Boucher states that some time since, at the opening of a new chapel, he detained the people after service and asked them, individually, whether they were born Romanists or Protestants. Out of 247 communicants present, only 43 were born Protestants; all the rest were converts. There has been a great change in the attitude of the literary men of France towards Protestantism within the last few years. One of the addresses of the 300th anniversary of the French Reformation, held last year, was delivered by Professor St. Hilaire, an eminent historian, and a convert from Popery. The Revue des deux Mondes, perhaps the greatest literary journal in the world, has repeatedly advocated the Protestant cause, so far as religious liberty is concerned, with great vigor, boldness, and ability. The same thing is true of the Journal des Debats, the foremost of the daily papers of Paris in point of the literary eminence of its writers. On the recent retirement of M. Paradol from the Debats, his place was filled by the selection of M. Weiss, a Protestant, who now writes the leading articles in that great newspaper. Another important convert is M. Foucher, a member of the Polytechnic, who, notwithstanding his high official position, is an earnest and devoted Christian. He frequently writes in l'Esperonce and in the Archives du Christianisme, Protestant journals which are well known to our readers. Another daily journal of Paris, l'Opinion Nationale, which is rapidly gaining influence as the organ of the democracy, and which, though little more than a year old, already has nearly 25,000 subscribers, gives frequent articles on the general question of religious freedom; and on its special relations to Protestantism. "Let us not forget," says this journal in a recent issue, "that it is to the French Reformation we own the triumph of the great principles which form the firm foundation of modern civilization, and that this triumph was purchased by the brave endurance of persecution, tortures, and butcheries on the part of the Reformers, the real founders of liberty in France."

Another encouraging sign is the growing disposition of French Protestants to honor God with their substance, as well as in their profession of faith. They were formerly deficient in liberality, and indeed they have yet a great deal to learn on this point. Recently, however, the general tendency has been upward; and there have been some brilliant instances of individual benevolence, which will bring forth others, just as the large charities of a few American Christians, some twenty or thirty years ago, inaugurated a new era of practical benevolence in our own churches. Mme. Andre Kochlin, of Mulhouse, has recently given $40,000 toward building a new Protestant church in that town; $10,000 for the extension of the Hospital; and $2000 towards a school among the Jews. Benevolent societies—Bible, Tract, and Missionary—are generally increasing in popularity and influence, and some of them also in resources.

THE BRITISH PRINCE IN THE UNITED STATES.

The heir of the British throne will soon be the guest of the United States of America. It is, we believe, the first visit of British royalty to the nation which has repudiated allegiance to it, and which, in its political philosophy, ignores royalty altogether. He comes to visit the colonies lost by the indiscretion and tyranny of his royal ancestors, and now greater than the mother-country. Royal visits to countries royally governed, have not been uncommon in the history of the world; but such a visit as this, to such a country as this, has not, we think, been witnessed before. It will not be long until a visit to the United States will become a part of the education of the heirs of all the European thrones. Alexander, Autocrat of all the Russias, visited the most of Europe before he ascended the throne, and his heir will very probably visit the United States also. So of the Prince Imperial of France. As the world grows in enlightenment and freedom, political wisdom and statesmanship, and enlarged social, political, and commercial knowledge, in kings and princes, become more necessary and important. They are beginning to be considered more as the chief gentlemen and first citizens of their respective countries, than as sacred potentates and authoritative rulers. Travel is necessary, therefore, as a part of their education. It will not be long until kings will not be allowed to rule unless they are fit to rule. Public opinion is gradually coming to be the ruling power in kingdoms and empires, as well as in republics. The will of the people—the very basis of republicanism—has gradually asserted itself in England; it is the political platform of Louis Napoleon; under his inspiration it is asserting itself in Italy; and it is even being felt in Russia and Austria. Therefore we esteem the visit of the young English Prince as important to the future of the British nation, and also to the peace and harmony of the civilized world.

As to the Prince himself he is no better than any other youth of eighteen, of good family and refined culture.—As to personal genius, and nobility of character, there are thousands of his own age, in this country and in Eu[illegible] high social position, and among those upon whom fortune has not smiled. And it is well to take the occasion of his visit to reinforce our fidelity to the true standard by which men should be judged, weighed, and measured. Difference in worldly circumstances does not difference the essential value of men. Neither God who made man, nor Christ who redeemed him, nor the Scriptures, the only infallible philosophy, nor our own reason, by which we have intuitive insight into the essential reality of things, teaches us to value one man above another on account of mere difference of fortune. The Prince is to be honored above other men, nevertheless; not because he is called a Prince; not because his blood is called royal; not from a delusion that his blood is better than that of other men; but because he is a representative man; because he officially represents the European half of the great Anglo-Saxon race, to which we belong, and which, in connection with our own half, is the hope of Christian civilization. As to blood, that man's blood is purest whose family from the earliest generation to himself has been freest from vice and physical excess. As to nobility, that man is noblest whose mind is grandest, and whose heart and life are best. The Prince, however, is a worthy young man, the son of a noble mother, the future king of a great nation, and in him the mother-country and the daughter-country shake hands, cordially, for the first time since the Revolution.

METHODIST COURTESIES.

The Methodists of England are too much inclined to personal courtesies, and the Methodists of the United States too little. Christian taste and propriety can very easily find a happy medium between the two, however. That taste ought to be cultivated, and that propriety observed. Such observance is beautiful in itself, it is just, and it is of good influence. We have been led into this line of remark by noticing that when any public event is commemorated by appropriate ceremonies, or any important enterprise has inaugurated, among our Methodist brethren, the men who have borne the burden and heat of the day in earlier years, and planted and watered the seeds which are ripening to harvest, are scarcely ever present, or ever named. New men are nearly always sought. A splendid Church edifice is to be inaugurated by the laying of the corner-stone; or it is finished, and is to be dedicated; the old frame in which the congregation has worshipped for years is to be torn down; new men, not identified with the peculiar history of that christian enterprise, are sought for, while the missionary who organized the first society there; who toiled there in tears and privation when the flock was little; who probably grubbed the Church lot with his own hands; though still living, a venerable patriarch, in another portion of the country, is not present, has not been invited, is not even named on the festive day. In all such cases, how beautifully appropriate it would be to have present as many of the former pastors of the Church as possible. Some of them may have been too early to be remembered by the majority of the congregation; they may be plainer men than those common, now; but an occasional surviving veteran, male or female, white or black, who made a part of the first congregation, and was, perhaps, of importance in a Church which has now grown to forgetfulness of his value, will be rejoiced to meet the preachers of his time. And the same taste and propriety would include the local preachers, and public spirited laymen, who have had any thing to do with the history of that Church. And this philosophy applies not only to laying corner-stones, and to dedications of churches, but to all Methodist commemorative and festive occasions. The men who have helped to make the history of which the occasion is a part, should be duly remembered and adequately honored.—One of the crosses of the itinerancy is, that no one man, whatever may be his ability in that line, has much encouragement to attempt any thing monumentally grand, for the glory of God and the good of the Church. He cannot remain to enjoy fully the enterprise he has planned. Other men may immediately follow who, however great their evangelical gifts, have not the executive and administrative talents to complete what he has begun. The Church should not make this cross heavier by practically ignoring earlier genius and labor and zeal. Nothing is said here in disparagement of new men; they are mentioned merely to bring earlier men into relief. Thank God that we have new men; that our field is fruitful enough to be ever productive of them. But let us not forget the old. Let the Church be educated into a better appreciation of the philosophy of providential history, and be taught to look at men and things in the light of God's purposes, and not in the light which made Christ merely the carpenter's son.

REVIVALS.

Rev. J. H. Higginbotham writes that Livingston circuit, Mississippi Conference, has been gradually improving in religious interest at every point. Several profitable meetings have been held. One, at Friendship, a new place, resulted in 25 added to the Church. Father Higginbotham is renewing his youth.

Rev. J. W. Laney, P.E., Eufaula district, Alabama Conference, reports wonderful prosperity in the bounds of his district—470 souls converted, so far, this year; Clayton circuit, 30; Villula, 30; Chunnenuggee, 120; Clayton and Louisville, 150; Enon, 70; at the Chunnenuggee camp-meeting, 70. Mr. Laney confirms the testimony of Dr. Powell, that this was a most glorious camp-meeting. The preachers on the district are zealous and laborious; and the local preachers are equally so.—It is good to be the Presiding Elder of such a district, and Mr. Laney is a good Presiding Elder. He thinks every new convert and member should take the N. O. Advocate, and we think so too. Let us hear from our brethren of the Eufaula district.

Rev. J. J. Latham, Litchatchie colored mission, Ala. Conf., writes that he has added three appointments to the original five; received on trial, 30; baptized 14 adults and 48 infants; has 223 under catechetical instruction; has raised $100 missionary money. The mission is prosperous, and regarded as permanent.

Rev. W. P. Harrison writes us that the Lord is graciously reviving his work at Auburn, Ala. Twenty-five have already joined the Church, all but three on probation. The revival is still in progress—as many as fifty at the altar of prayer at a time. The Male College has opened well, and the religious interest among the students is daily increasing. The Female College is unusually prosperous, and quite a number of the pupils are subjects of the revival. Auburn is an important place, and a revival there will be of great value to the country. A gracious time is expected.

Rev. J. D. Cameron reports another revival on Clarke circuit, Ala. Conf. At Salem 18 joined the Church, and over 20 were converted. At Enon 6 joined the Church, and 10 were converted. A neat church has been built at the latter place, and a society of 75 organized. Two years ago there was no church in the community. At Shubuta, a meeting has just been closed which resulted in the addition of 48 whites and 6 blacks to the Church, and the conversion of about 35 persons. A year ago about a dozen members worshipped at this place, under a bush arbor; now they have a good church almost finished, and over 100 members. This is truly great prosperity.

Rev. W. P. Dickinson writes from Attala circuit, Miss. Conf., that 80 persons have joined the Church recently; about the same number converted; 52 joined the Church at one place, most of them converted, many of them children of the Hard Shell Baptists. This circuit is truly blessed.

Rev. J. W. M'Neil writes us of another profitable protracted meeting on Paulding circuit, Miss. Conf., at which 27 whites and 13 blacks joined the Church, and 15 others were converted. Paulding circuit seems about to be blessed.

Rev. W. H. Wild, Snow Hill circuit, Ala. Conf., writes us of a protracted meeting at Pine Flat, Butler county, at which 11 whites and 13 blacks joined the Church, and quite a number converted. The entire circuit is in a prosperous condition, and still better times are expected.

Rev. T. J. Lacey again writes of the continued revival on Winnsboro' circuit, La. Conf. The number added to the Church up to the time of writing was about 120. At Winnsboro and Bœuff Prairie, that able minister of the Mississippi Conference, Rev. D. M. Wiggins, assisted.

Rev. J. S. Harris writes from Clinton mission, Miss. Conf., that at a new appointment he held a profitable protracted meeting, many were converted, a society of 20 members organized, many more are seeking salvation, and the mission is prosperous.

Rev. O. B. Stanley writes us of a glorious revival at Perote, Ala., at which 65 joined the Methodist Church, exclusive of those who joined other Churches. Nearly all the pupils of the Perote High School, of which our old friend, Rev. R. H. Haynes, is principal, were converted and joined the Church. The revival in the school is described as unusually gracious and powerful. About 200 have joined the Church on probation on the circuit during the year. That circuit is prosperous, and Perote High School is doing good.

Rev. B. F. Alexander writes us good news from the Pleasant Hill camp-meeting, La. Conf.; 32 were converted, and 15 joined the Church. The missionary collection exceeded $100. The good cause is prospering in North Louisiana, as will be seen still more from an interesting communication, "Revivals in North Louisiana," which we insert elsewhere.

OBITUARIES.

Some of our friends seem to think we are opposed to publishing obituaries. Not at all; we only wish them brief, confined to the facts, and free from redundant verbiage. Some write as though we had refused to insert certain obituaries. Never; we publish all that reach us. Some complain that an obituary does not appear as soon as they had expected. We do the best we can in this respect. Some overlook an obituary after it is published, and complain that it is not published. Brethren, read the paper more carefully. Sometimes it is desired that we publish a second obituary of the same person.—We cannot do this, unless there are circumstances to justify it. Some send us a full obituary, accompanied by a long and formal set of resolutions, by a "lodge," or public meeting. In such cases, all should be embodied in the obituary—the fact of the resolutions mentioned, and the substance stated. Some will persist in concluding obituaries with quotations from scripture, prayers, poetry, poetical reflections, etc. Brethren, this is unnecessary. In the case of infants, there should be nothing but the announcement of the death. Brethren and friends, you think you have causes for vexation in these things, and no doubt you have, sometimes; but we have, too.—Let us not be vexed at all, however.

Personal Letters.—In the summer time, in this climate, a great number of people travel, preachers among them. Loved old homes, and dear kindred and friends are visited, tears are shed and prayers uttered over the sleeping dust of the precious dead. Sometimes letters are sent us attempting descriptions of these scenes and the attendant reflections. There are several objections to publishing these letters. A great many such have been published, and our readers say they have had enough. The letters are interesting to the writers and their friends, but not to the great public. These things enrich personal feeling and character, but not those of the public.—Last of all, few pens can do justice to the subject.

AUTHORS AND BOOKS.

How to form public libraries is a question which must be often asked in this country of rapidly growing cities, and rapidly increasing wealth and intelligence. With our Mercantile Library Associations in every city, and other libraries open to the public, either for general use or reference, in all our larger and more important commercial and literary centres, not to speak of the daily increasing importance of the private collections of this country, the question "how properly and most wisely to collect material for a library which shall have a lasting value, and for which our successors of two hundred years from now shall feel grateful to us," is one of no little importance. In the last volume of the "English Cyclopædia," a writer discusses this subject very ably.

To form a great national library, this writer insists that "the most rational course to pursue is to collect everything, small and great, that issues from the press; a system now acted upon in the British Museum; and which, if steadily observed, at the Bodleian from the foundation of that library in 1602 onwards to the present day, would have made that collection the model library of the universe." What invaluable documents would Great Britain possess now, as material for her historians, had such a plan been followed from the days of Elizabeth. Our own Congressional Library ought to have the scope—at least either that or the library of the Smithsonian Institute. It is not enough that a publisher, to secure copyright, must send a copy of his book to the Smithsonian Library. The most interesting historical documents are often not copyrighted. Macaulay made such use of the old ballads and broadsides, and squibs of the periods he treated in his history, as should be a warning to other governments, and a lesson to teach them now what to preserve for the Macaulay of the year 2060. Books are not nearly so difficult to secure as street ballads, and such matters, which we are apt to call trash, but which our posterity will value above the graver and more bulky treatises which are now held in great honor. A friend said to me a few days ago that he would like to get a copy of the old ballad of "Captain Kid." I agreed to help him to hunt, anticipating little difficulty. But I failed to find it in any song book, any where exposed for sale in New York, or even in Boston. It is a little matter, and of no importance. But it shows that such things have their day, and somehow disappear completely from print, even when, as in the case of this old sea-ballad, they have become almost classic.

Last year I kept a file of the three leading New York dailies. By some mishap, I missed three numbers of one of them; when I came to hunt for other copies of these, I found that one I could not get at all, and the other two I could only get at extravagant prices. Yet, on the morning of publication, we pay our two cents, and throw the paper away when it is read. It is stated that few of the British journals have complete files of their own issues. The British Museum boasts a complete file of the Times, and the Times itself has another. But this is not the case with every newspaper; for at the office of the Morning Chronicle, which is one of the oldest British newspapers, there is not a complete set of that journal; and at the office of the Daily Telegraph, which is one of the newest, there is no complete set of the Daily Telegraph. But of the Times, especially, so difficult is it to obtain a perfect set, that as much as $5,000 has been offered for one for the public library at Melbourne. Happily, in the new library of the British Museum there is space enough, for many years at least, to accommodate all the journals published within the British empire. These are now regularly received at fixed intervals, and have been so for many years past, being duly bound, placed, and catalogued for the benefit (when or some [illegible] may go hat sets have been accumulated of the Moniteur, and other French, Italian, Spanish, and German newspapers.

I know that at least one of the leading dailies has not a complete file of its own issues, and only one of them all has complete files of all the leading papers, from the beginning.

Mr. Thomas Bodley's collection had, by his desire, no pamphlets or broadsides, only books. Contrast with the example of Bodley the course pursued by Thomason, the bookseller, who during twenty years, namely from 1640 to 1660, collected every book and pamphlet that appeared in England, whether Royalist or Republican, from the folio volume to the newspaper and broadside, all which he had bound up in 2220 volumes, now lodged in the British Museum, where they form a noble monument of his foresight and untiring zeal. It appears that the poor man could not, after all, satisfactorily dispose of this treasure. The Restoration left him but two probable purchasers in the Bodleian Library and the King; though it could hardly be expected that the University would wish to recall the downfall of the Church, or the Monarch the downfall of the monarchy. The University, however, only declined on the ground of want of funds; and the King actually purchased, but would never pay; so that Thomason's representatives, who had at first been glad to be quit of the burden, were glad to receive it back. After the lapse of a century, the collection was finally purchased by George III., and presented to the British Museum, where it still remains, a library in itself, often consulted for various purposes, but never as yet thoroughly explored. Readers will smile when they are informed that this splendid library, for which the collector during his lifetime is said to have refused 4000*l.*, was at last purchased for the insignificant sum of 300*l.*

"An anecdote told in 'Moore's Diary' that a poetical jeu d'esprit in a number of the Times at the period of the Reform Bill was attributed at Rogers's breakfast table to Moore, and on being denied by him was acknowledged by Macaulay, has led since Lord Macaulay's death to a search after the forgotten poem in the set of the Times at the British Museum, to be transferred from the unwieldy columns to a place in the posthumous works of its illustrious author, which will find their way in some edition to almost every library in Christendom."

To the question, therefore, what to collect, the answer is, if means are sufficient, and purpose national, collect every thing. Says the writer I have alluded to:

"Nothing is so difficult to find, it'll be wanted, as a novel that was in everybody's hands some years ago; for, being in everybody's hands, it was the more liable and likely to be pulled to pieces. About thirty years after its publication, a search or the first edition of 'Waverley' was long ineffectual, till a copy turned up in private hands. We have been told that at the library of the British Museum a collection of old novels of a certain period was long a desideratum, till about fourteen hundred volumes appeared in an auction, catalogued without specification as old novels, in lots of forty volumes each, and were bought for the Museum at less than a penny a volume, probably the cheapest purchase ever made for the national library."

As for the scope of various literatures, I find this curious statement in the article referred to:

"Mr. Wilson Croker, on his examination before the Royal Commissioners on the British Museum, expressed his belief that there were no books in print exclusively Hebrew without a Latin explanation of some sort. There were at the time more than 4000 of that description in the British Museum, comprising not only editions of the Bible and commentaries, but Jewish plays and Jewish epics.—The late of Jewish libraries has been singular. The two largest now in existence are said to be those formed by Rabbi David Oppenheimer in the seventeenth century, and by Mr. Michael, of Hamburg, in the nineteenth, of which the first and largest is now in the Radcliffe Library, and the second in the British Museum. Formed in Germany, and both preserved at Hamburg, they have both been transferred to England, and Oxford is now become in particular the place of pilgrimage to Jewish bibliographers. The collection at the Museum is being constantly augmented with accessions from quarters from which no other accessions come—from presses in the Crimea, among the Karaites, from obscure villages in Russia Poland, from Africa, and from Turkey. The number of volumes in the Museum collection was stated by its librarian, Mr. Zedner, in the 'Hebraische Bibliographie' for 1859, to be 7480."

And, to quote once more, and for the last time, from this very interesting essay, there are some valuable particulars on the extraordinary spread of the English language in the last hundred years. "A century ago," he says, "at the accession of George III; in 1760, the English language is supposed to have been spoken by about twelve millions of persons. In the year 1860 it is probably spoken by not less than sixty millions, and each year adds to the census of those who speak it a number greater than the population of those who speak some of the secondary languages of Europe. The French and German languages, which at the commencement of the century far surpassed it in that respect, are now far below it.—Russian is the only form of speech in Europe that owns at present a larger number of speakers, having about sixty-five millions; and if the advance of population continues for a few years as before, Russian will be outnumbered. The English language is at the same time the vernacular of a great kingdom in Europe and of great colonies in America, in South Africa and in Australia, all of which are growing, and some are rushing, into importance. But the dominion of the English language is not bounded by the limits of the British Empire, wide as they are. It is also the language of a great republic, or rather cluster of republics, whose territories now extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and will probably in the course of another century be teeming with population. English is now spoken by more persons out of Europe than within it, and the disproportion is certain to grow greater every year. While in Old England it has as yet been unable to supplant the Welsh in the course of centuries, in New England it has long swept from before it all trace of the languages of the aboriginal nations, except the books that were written for them by the missionaries of the seventeenth century."

From books to book publishers cannot be called a step. I have already in these letters given some particulars of the English and American Book trade. In France the publishing business seems to be mostly confined to Paris. "Paris is France," in every sense. Paris has now some extensive printing establishments, including the Imprimerie Imperiale, provided with machinery equal if not superior to anything of the kind in London. As regards substantiality and elegance, French books occupy a place between those of Germany and England. They are, with few exceptions, done up simply in colored paper covers, for temporary service; but the ink is generally better than that used in England, and works when of a superior class are executed with a high degree of taste—the excellence of pictorial embellishments being always conspicuous. Certain voluminous and most expensive works in French, and also in the classical languages, occasionally issue from the Parisian press, and command a large sale; orders of copies for university and public libraries all over the continent tending to promote these gigantic enterprises. Although confined mainly to Paris, the business of publishing, or at least of preparing books for the Parisian market, and for exportation, is carried on to a considerable extent in several provincial towns. Tours, in particular, is the seat of a large book-factory, that of Messrs. Mame, in which printing, designing, engraving, and binding, are all executed on the premises. According to the returns of the Board of Trade for 1857, the following were the French imports and exports of books in 1855: Value of imports, 1,829,470 francs; of exports, 15,344,855 francs; the export trade having increased 30 per cent since 1851. The exports are to Italy, Germany, Russia, Belgium, the United States, and other countries, and a portion also goes to England.

Of literary news there is very little just now. The Harpers have nearly ready, "Explorations in East Africa," by Capt. Richard Burton, who is now in the Rocky Mountains, in search of further adventure. An English correspondent says of one of his previous [illegible] news—the celebrated and most hazardous pilgrimage, and prescribed medicine for the sultan who, fortunately for him, was a "sick man," like the grander potentate who bears that title. Burton had a Colt's revolver under his robe, and would have shot the sultan had he observed any signs of his own condemnation. This extraordinary man is a great linguist, and can speak at least twenty languages. In the Persian and Arabic he has passed for a native. Besides this, he is an astrologer and a necromancer; one of the best swordsmen, as well as shots in the world. When he performed the pilgrimage to the tomb of the Prophet, he left London as an Oriental, under the name of Mirzah Abdullah, and the secret was only known to two persons on board of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer. Captain Burton's late father was a clergyman at Bath, of very strict views, named Rev. Joseph Burton. It is to be presumed that he did not look with an approval on his son's pilgrimage in the guise of a heathen to the shrine of the unbelievers' Prophet. When Captain Burton was called on by some aged Sheiks for his pedigree, which was duly enrolled on parchment, and of which he carried off a copy, he stated himself to be the son of Joseph the Affghan. Captain Burton was General Beatson's aid-de-camp when the latter organized and commanded the Bashi-bazouks. He is about thirty-six years of age, and was at Oxford, which he left without a degree, to enter the Bombay army. His work on Scinde is highly interesting, as well as his Falconry in the Valley of the Indus. He is a splendid Latin scholar, and has described some curious matters of his Eastern experience in that language. Altogether, he is one of the most extraordinary men of the age.

Mr. Dickens is reported to be at work on a new novel; to make its appearance in the usual monthly shilling form, which is found to be the most profitable after all. It would be difficult to make any serial pay £40,000 profit in twenty months, by running a novel through it. This sum was netted by "Bleak House."

Dr. J. G. Holland's new novel, Miss Gilbert's Career, is now rapidly passing through the press of Mr. Scribner, and will probably appear in October. The action of the story vibrates between a New Hampshire village and New York.

Mr. Emerson is preparing for the press a volume of his more recent lectures and essays. Its title will be "Culture."

The "Narative of the Canadian Exploring Expedition," the preparation of which is entrusted to Prof. H. Youle Hind, who fills the chair of Chemistry and Geology at Trinity College, Toronto, will be an important addition to our knowledge of this continent. It will include a full report of the two expeditions dispatched by the Canadian Government in 1857 and 1858, at a cost of $60,000, for the exploration of the southern part of Rupert's Land, or the basin of Lake Winnipeg, including the country within the new crown colony of Red River, as well as the region traversed by the proposed overland route from Canada to British Columbia. Much of this large area has never before been described, or, indeed visited by white men, until crossed by these expeditions, the second of which was under the command of Prof. Hind, and is known as the Assiniboin and Saskatchewan Expedition. Particular attention was paid to the physical geography, geology, and climate of the territory by the scientific corps; and, as a practical photographer was one of the staff, the illustrations of the grand and romantic picturesque scenery, and of the ethnology of native Indian tribes, will be very abundant. The work will probably appear this Autumn (forming two volumes, octavo), from the house of Messrs. Longman.

In this country such books are published by Government, in splendid style, so far as illustration goes; very unreadable indeed, and never seen by any but government functionaries and their friends. They would be of some little use if written with some desire to be read, and put out by some able publisher, for public perusal. Now the facts are laboriously collected, and then hid away where they never contribute to the general knowledge. Then they would be of some real value to merchants, farmers, and many other classes of the community, who now emigrate to new lands with no chance to learn aught beforehand, except from unreliable newspaper report, as to the condition and wants of their prospective homes.

Prof. Spencer F. Baird, of Washington, is about to issue a general systematic work on American Ornithology, that will be greeted with eagerness by the scientific men of Europe and America. Though still a young man, Prof. Baird, as friend of the Department of Natural Science, at the Smithsonian Institution, has had opportunities of investigation afforded by the rich collection of specimens acquired by the Boundary and Pacific Railroad Surveys that have fallen to the lot of few naturalists, and their results will all be embodied in his forthcoming book, to be entitled, "The Birds of North America, containing descriptions of all known species, chiefly from specimens in the Museum of the Smithsonian Institution, by Spencer F. Baird, with the co-operation of John Cassin, and George W. Laurence," in two volumes, quarto, with an atlas of one hundred colored plates. Price $20. Published by J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia. The number of absolutely new species figured for the first time, is one hundred and fifty eight.

Col. Sir Henry Rawlinson has just announced the discovery of some important synchronisms between the histories of Egypt and Assyria, recently discovered by him, on a set of clay cylinders received at the British Museum from Niaveh, during his absence in Persia. He finds on them the details of an expedition conducted into Egypt by the Assyrian monarch Assur-hooi-pal, the son of Esar Haddon, at the commencement of his reign, probably about B. C. 660. It was undertaken to chastise the King Tarkn—evidently the Tarcos of Manetho, the third and last king of the Ethiopian dynasty, and the Tirakeh of the Bible—and was successful in restoring the Assyrian authority which was confirmed by the establishment of twenty subordinate rulers or "kings," whose names, and the list of cities over which they presided, are given in the inscriptions.

REVIVALS IN NORTH LOUISIANA.

Camp-meeting at Walnut Grove—General work throughout the Circuit—Church and Parsonage building—Ministerial Support—$1700 Missionary Contribution—Spirit of other Denominations—Work at Delhi——40 Adults Baptized 82 Accessions—Rapid advancement of this part of the Conference.

Mr. Editor: I feel it my duty to comply with the request of several brethren, to give you some account of the work in North-east Louisiana. A meeting was commenced at Walnut Grove, in Carroll parish, on the 2d of August, and protracted to the 9th, at which 40 persons joined the Church; 16 of the gentlemen who joined were heads of families; the most of them were converted.

At the close of the meeting it was agreed to hold a camp-meeting at the same place, to commence on the 13th of September; and although the entire encampment had to be erected in one month, and the cotton crop attended to in the meantime, which we reached there on the 14th inst, we found the accommodations on a liberal scale. The meeting lasted until the 19th, and resulted in 46 accessions and about the same number of conversions; making 86 accessions and as many conversions at this place during the two meetings. During the last six weeks about 200 have been received into the Church on probation, in the Carroll circuit, and the Preacher in Charge, brother McGaughey, informed me the number of conversions had been about the same.

This night before the closing of the camp-meeting we witnessed a moving scene. Between 30 and 40 young men at the altar, deeply affected with feelings of penitence, and earnestly seeking pardon, were surrounded with those who had been but recently converted, advising them "how to flee the wrath to come;" and ladies could be seen kneeling at seats in every direction outside of the altar, because there was no room in it. Our brethren of other denominations rejoiced to see so many about to join the Church, and exhorting them to believe in Christ as the only way of salvation. They assisted also nobly in sustaining the meeting, and contributed to the missionary cause liberally.

The cause of Missions was presented on Sunday evening; the appearance of ruin had caused a large portion of the people to leave the encampment before the hour arrived; add to this the fact, that the people composing the small audience had subscribed $7,000 to build a church in Floyd; besides, four other churches are building in the parish which will perhaps cost $6,000 or $7,000 more, and a parsonage is just completed in Floyd, making not less than $16,000, to which nearly all of the contributors had borne a part, together with $2,000 off the circuit for ministerial support; and, you will not be surprised that the missionary collection only reached $179[illegible], in cash, drafts, and negotiable notes; promises, (not on paper) however, will possibly swell the amount to $2,000, which was directed by the contributors to be applied to build a church for the 2d German mission in New-Orleans. Brother Pauley, the pastor of the mission, was present and made some remarks. The object was then explained, and responded to without either speech, anecdotes, or clap-trap; the people were serious, and I saw several contribute with tears in their eyes. At the close, Bro. Pauley led in prayer, during which there was a general sobbing and weeping through the audience, and the spirit of praise was in all hearts; many were heard to say that the collection was better than a sermon.

A fine meeting is progressing at Delhi; up to last accounts 52 had joined. Thirty adults were baptized on the 17th inst. A parsonage and church have just been completed at this place, and the labors of brother Upton, the pastor, have been much blessed in all his work. The progress of this part of our conference may be judged from the fact, that five years ago there were four preachers, including the presiding elder, upon a work now employing 10 preachers, and yet not fully supplied. I believe all of them receive their full salaries.

THE NEW METHODIST CHURCH IN COLUMBUS.

Mr. Editor: On Monday, at 10 o'clock, A. M., a large congregation assembled to hear an address from Rev. E. Baldwin, on the occasion of the laying of the corner-stone of the new Methodist Church, which is in course of erection on Main street. The services were commenced by the singing of an appropriate hymn, followed by an earnest and eloquent prayer by Rev. Mr. Steinback, of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. Mr. Baldwin then entertained the audience with an admirable address, in the best style of that highly gifted man. He dwelt beautifully upon the necessity which had given rise to the erection of a new church edifice, viz.: the prosperity of the Church. God had showered his blessings upon them so profusely, that, like the rich man in the gospel, there was no place to bestow their fruits and their goods, and they were compelled to build up greater barns for their accommodation. This prosperity he ascribed to their liberality, the purity of the doctrines taught, and the sanctified zeal of the Church. He next dwelt upon the manifest providence of God in the final success of the enterprise, after it had been apparently defeated last year; brought about in a manner which harmonized the Church and strengthened the union heretofore existing. He cautioned the Church against a spirit of vain-glory because of their prosperity, and admonished them to have the glory of God in view continually, so that the name of Jesus might be inscribed upon every brick and every piece of timber in the building. He also warned them against bigotry and more particularly zeal as a denomination, to cultivate kindly feelings towards the body of Christians generally, and to let the glory of God be the actuating principle in all their efforts to advance the prosperity of the Church.

The address was very practical, and produced a happy effect upon the assembly. I have seldom listened to an address with more pleasure, and felt at the close that he had said exactly what ought to have been said, and in the best spirit and manner in which it could have been said.

After the address the assembly adjourned to the site of the new building; a copper box was inserted in the corner-stone, containing the statistics of the Church, a bible, hymn book, discipline, copies of the various Church periodicals, minutes of the Alabama Conference for 1859, copies of the city papers, etc.

The church is to be of brick, and will accommodate about 1,000 persons. It will cost $30,000. Its erection speaks well for the zeal and liberality of the Church, and will be highly ornamental to the city, occupying a beautiful site on Main street, a much more central position than the old church, and will no doubt command a much larger congregation than could have been expected at the former place.

DEATH OF REV. L. CAMPBELL.

Mr. Editor: Bro. Godfrey and myself reached here this morning, and found that brother Campbell, of our Conference, had died at half-past eleven o'clock last night. He had been sick since Tuesday—with scarce an interval of consciousness. Thus you will see that our Conference mourns another of its old and strong men. Four of them have passed away this year.

Brother Campbell had been in the Conference twenty-two years, and occupied a high and honorable position among us. Without any early training, he had won a position in the Church, as a man of talent, integrity, and moral worth, which secured him the confidence and love of his brethren. Sister Campbell and her children will receive the sympathy of many hearts, and the physicians and friends in Bayou Sara, whose kind ministrations to this servant of God were so unsparing, deserve our warmest commendation.

W. H. Watkins.

Bayou Sara, Sept. 22, 1860.

True Witness and Sentinel.—The True Witness, of this city, and the Presbyterian Sentinel, of Memphis, have recently been united, under the name of the True Witness and Sentinel; and the talents and taste of both editors—Rev. R. M'Innis and Rev. F. A. Tyler—are now applied to the new and stronger journal, though the latter still resides in Memphis. In addition, Rev. Dr. Sparrow, of Pensacola, has been secured as corresponding editor. With a circulation so much increased, and with such an increase of editorial strength, our neighbor has, we trust, an encourging prospect of increasing usefulness. We congratulate him, and we also congratulate our brethren of the Presbyterian Church.

Church at Bay St. Louis.—We have intended for some time to call attention, again, to the effort now being made to build a Methodist church at this place, headed by Rev. J. H. Shaw, of the Mississippi Conference, who is the pastor of the circuit including Bay St. Louis.—It is an important place; thousands of people spend the summer there; and it is lamentable that there is no suitable place of worship. They are determined to have one, however, and we trust our citizens will help them. Mr. Shaw and his friends are working bravely, and we wish them success.

The Educational Journal.—From the August number, which we have just received, we learn that our friend, Prof. W. H. C. Price, of Auburn, Ala., has been appointed editor of the Educational Repository and Family Monthly. He commences his work with a spirited and sparkling editorial paper. We wish him and the Monthly the largest success.

The action was to recover $2971 claimed by the Bank of the Express Company, the discount of a forged note sent to the Bank through the Express. The Court held that an Express Company is an insurer, or guarantee, of the genuineness of paper sent through it, and has the right to deliver the avails of a note to the party from whom it receives the note, even though the Bank sending the avails supposes it is sending them to some one else.

Destructive Fire.—Kane Street, which resulted in the destruction of the City Hotel and the Garrison Block. The value of the buildings destroyed was about $100,000. In addition to the above, the loss sustained by the destruction of furniture, etc., will reach $51,000. The post-office was destroyed, with 4000 letters, and the last California mail for Memphis. Minot's Ledge Light-house.—We learn from the Boston papers that the new light-house on Minot's Rock has been completed, and on the evening of the 22d ult. was lighted up for the first time to test the power of the light. The light was a very powerful one, and could be seen from a great distance. By the side of it the lights on the light-ship seemed like farthing candles.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The latest news from Europe announces that General Garibaldi and his force entered Naples triumphantly on the 8th. A provisional government had been formed and Victor Emanuel proclaimed King of Italy. The insurrection in the States of the Church was rapidly progressing. Four hundred insurgents had attacked and repulsed the Papal troops. Victor Emanuel had been proclaimed. A panic was prevailing at Rome. A telegram from Turin says that the King of Sardinia had ordered his troops to march.

A "Battle-Royal" at Naples.—The Paris correspondent of the London Morning Post says: "It is not generally known that the immediate cause of the departure of the Ex Queen from Naples proceeds from nothing less than a violent dispute and personal altercation with the reigning Queen. The latter is very sensitive and very frank; the former is very proud and jesuitical. One day, after the family council had received unpleasant accounts of the state of affairs, the young Queen could not restrain her feelings, but proceeded to the apartment of the Queen Dowager, and after making her acquainted with the bad news just received, she told her that the throne of Naples was lost forever, and that she, the Ex Queen, might consider herself the cause of the ruin of the family, owing to the bad advice and example which she had always offered in the late King, upon which the Ex Queen, without uttering a word, arose up from her chair, and, report says, they came to blows. At all events, the rupture is so, decided, that reconciliation is declared impossible."

English Officers with Garibaldi.—Several Englishmen have made themselves quite celebrated in Garibaldi's service. Col. Peard, known as "the famous shot," was dubbed a Colonel at the capture of Messina. Col. Dunne, who was one of "the Light Brigade" in their celebrated charge at Balaklava, and was decorated with the the Victoria Cross, commands a corps in the Liberator's army. Capt. Styles, formerly belonging to the English guards, and a Crimean campaigner, is now in London, recruiting for the Garibaldian service.

In London, recently, twenty-two pictures of the choicest kind, from the Belvidere collection, were sold by auction, and brought the sum of $125,000.

The Dutch in Borneo.—Great satisfaction is every where expressed throughout Holland at the important intelligence received by the last overland mail, announcing that the whole of the territory of Banjermassing, in the south part of Borneo, has been annexed, and is now formally incorporated with the foreign possessions of the King of the Netherlands. The Governor-General has received the thanks of the two Chambers of the States General, and the home Government has sent him the fullest powers, and impressed on him the necessity of taking such prompt and energetic measures as he may deem necessary for the maintenance of order, the consolidation and prosperity of new territory, and the honor of the Dutch flag.

Paris was astonished, not long since, by the sight of a carriage, propelled by neither steam nor gas, going with such amazing swiftness as to leave far behind the four in hand carriages of the Jockey Club, which endeavored in vain to keep up with it. The inventor is said to be a poor man, who has constructed the vehicle entirely himself, and will not disclose the secret till he is properly secured by patent.

Hungary begins to move. The great festival of St. Stephen, on the 20th of August, was celebrated in the most patriotic style in all the cities, towns and villages. The universal cry was, "Let us have our ancient constitutional rights." Many speeches were made in the spirit of the cry.

A Strange Encounter.—When Louis Phillippe and his queen were in exile at Claremont, they visited the convent of the Sacre Coeur. The nun who conducted them through the house was so amiable and agreeable that the queen on leaving, expressed her extreme satisfaction. "Perhaps," added her majesty, "you will be interested to know who your visitors are. This gentleman is Louis Phillippe; I am the Queen Amelie." The nun, bowing proudly, replied, with a gentle smile, "and I am Mademoiselle Bonaparte."

A cannon on a new construction was tried a few days since in the Plaine St. Denis. It is said to be superior to any rifled cannon, to carry three leagues, and cause immense destruction.

The Prussian Army.—The Prussian Annals contains an article by Col. Schlamming on the reorganization of the army. The writer states that for the future Prussia will be in a condition to have in the field an army of 320,000 men, at the same time that she would keep at home 211,000 well-disciplined troops, by adding to that force, at a moment of crisis, 200,000 men, between the age of thirty-two and thirty-nine, belonging to the second ban of the Landwher, the total number of the disposable force would be brought up to 780,000.

Killed in Descending Mont Blanc.—Three English gentlemen have lost their lives on Mont Blanc—T. M. Rochester and F. Vavasseur, both of Cardiff, and R. Fuller, of London. In descending, whilst tied together in the usual way, one slipped, and dragged his companions and the three guides over a steep and long slope of snow. Attempts to arrest the descent were in vain, and the two guides at the end, seeing they were about to be launched into a precipice, let go and forced their heads and feet into the snow. The three bodies were found at the foot of the precipice Tarnaz. An experienced guide was also killed.

M. de Paravy has written to the Academy of Sciences to state, that the knee lady (cassia acuelatus) is universally used throughout Thibet and India, for manufacturing paper; and that, in the present dearth of materials for paper, it might be advantageously used for the same purpose, the plant being extremely common throughout France.

LITERARY GOSSIP.

A Paris letter says that the Baron de Bazancourt has just published in two volumes, 8vo., with maps and plans, "The Campaign of Italy, or Chronicles of the war of 1859," on the same plan as his successful work on the siege of Sebastopol. His style of narration is essentially adapted to please and edify military men by the technical accuracy of the details of the different engagements. M. de Bazancourt was an eye-witness of what he relates, and is the "authorized" historian of the imperial prowess, all the official correspondence and documents of the état-major having been communicated to him. The military ability of Napoleon III, as sole leader and director of the movements of the last campaign, loses nothing, as may be supposed, in the hands of such a narrator of his exploits.

Charles Dickens is reported to be at work on a new novel, to make its appearance in the usual monthly shilling form, which is found to be the most profitable after all, as it would be difficult to make any serial pay £10,000 profit in twenty months, by running a novel through it. This sum was netted by Bleak House.

An interesting work has just been published in London by Mr. Sharpe, author of the "History of Egypt." It is entitled—"Historical Notices on the Bible," etc., and presents the results of a critical examination of the Septuagint Greek version of the Old Testament. Mr. Sharpe has discovered some remarkable discrepancies in this version, both as regards its chronology and other points. He thinks that the changes or corruptions referred to are not accidental, but that they arose from a systematic attempt to accommodate the translation to later Alexandrian and Egyptian philosophy.

Mr. John F. Watson, the venerable author of "The Annals of the Olden Time in New York," is now in that city collecting and arranging materials for a new edition of that work. The New York Tribune says that Mr. Watson, who is now 82 years of age, "displays all the ardor of a young man in his favorite pursuit, and in the full use of his faculties is constantly engaged in adding to his antiquarian stores, having lived to become an authority in the matters that employed his attention as a collector half a century ago."

"Duffy's Hibernian Magazine," is the title of a new periodical which has lately appeared in Dublin, and which is said to be the cheapest periodical of the day. It is published in eight-penny monthly numbers, and professes to be the new exponent of Young Ireland.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

Evangelical Religion in Belgium.—The growth of evangelical religion in Belgium for the past ten years has been very remarkable. A single church has been multiplied into between thirty and forty churches, embracing a membership of at least ten thousand members. So says the Christian Union.

An English clergyman at Holloway, England, has been detected in preaching the sermons of the Rev. Dr. Bushnell, of Hartford, from the published volumes in this country.

The corner-stone of the new German Lutheran Church, corner of Preston and Green streets, Louisville, was laid on Sunday, the 2d inst., in the presence of a great number of spectators.

Circulating the Scriptures in Mexico.—The Philadelphia Christian Observer learns that the Rev. Mr. Thompson agent of the American Bible Society, has recently made an excursion into Mexico, as far as the city of Monterey, and that he met with a cordial reception in this work of circulating the Scriptures, and found the way open for preaching the gospel and building Churches. The Observer asks, Should not the attention of evangelical churches be directed to the occupancy of Northern Mexico?

Early on Sunday morning, 9th inst., the Second Congregational Church in Bedford, Mass., was destroyed by fire, with two wooden buildings adjoining. Loss $12,000. Insured for $6,000.

The Rev. McEwen, D. D., died at his residence in New London, Connecticut, on the 7th inst., at the advanced age of eighty years. He had been the pastor of the First Congregational Church of that city for more than half a century, but during the last few years had been assisted by a colleague. The New London Star says that he was a classmate, at Yale College, of John C. Calhoun, and his successful competitor for the valedictory.

CITY NEWS.

Deplorable and Disastrous Conflagration.—Lamentable and Agonizing Scenes and Sufferings.—Friday evening about 7 o'clock, a fire broke out in the fourth story of the wholesale liquor store of Karstendieck and Co., 101 and 103 Tchoupitoulas-street, between Lafayette and Gaiennes and destroyed the [illegible] the goods (on storage) of E. S. Hart & Co., principally liquors, paints, etc.; the store and small stock of Bredow & Wusthoff; the store and stock of Malony & Bro. Before a few moments had passed the flames spread with fearful rapidity and destruction, and shed a grand and awful glare over the entire upper section of the city. In a short while the fire rushed through these spacious buildings back to Commerce-street, and here a fearful occurrence took place. A loud explosion was heard—the liquor barrels yielded to the devouring element—a frightful crash followed. An upper portion, one story, of the building of the lower store, 101, of Messrs. Karstendieck & Co., came down by the force of the explosion on the building next it, a three story one, that of Malone and Co., floor commission merchants, on the corner of Lafayette and Tchoupitoulas streets. By this wall falling it carried in the corner store-roof and buried the outer or side wall (on Lafeyette-street) of Malone & Co. to the ground with electrical velocity. How we shudder to report the scene. From 150 to 200 persons were near around, and to this building of Malone & Co. some firemen, some laborers, some policemen, some merchants, and others, young and old, of our citizens. From 25 to 30 laborers, firemen and others, were engaged in removing and rolling barrels of flour and merchandize out of this store, as there was no time within it at the time. And in a moment from 20 to 30 persons were buried in the ruins. Regardless of the scorching elements and the dangers of surrounding, tottering walls, the firemen grandly went to the rescue of the sufferers, whose groans of agony were heard from beneath the pile of bricks and rafters. Every effort was brought to bear by firemen and policemen and citizens to relieve the sufferers, and as, one by one, each body was brought out, the silent operation thereof was loudly cheered by the lookers on. Up to yesterday, when the bricks and beams were entirely removed, as many as twenty-five firemen and others have been taken from under the ruins, of whom fifteen are dead, and ten badly wounded.

CHURCHES IN LIBERIA.

The Methodist Episcopal, Baptist, Presbyterian, and Episcopal Churches of America are doing work in Liberia. They are furnishing the moral strength on which the Government must rely in exigencies of the future, and by which she is to be established, if established she may be. We had the pleasure of meeting with and addressing the Methodist Conference of Liberia, at Monrovia, in the winter of 1856 and 1857. This is a body of intelligent and devoted men, numbering near one hundred, and having in communion with the church over thirteen hundred members, many of whom are natives. Their schools are numerous and flourishing. It is a Mission Conference, supported by the Methodist Episcopal Church of the Northern States.

The Baptist Church is represented here by over seventy missionaries and teachers, and, according to the report of the association which met in Muarovia, December, 1857, nearly one thousand members.

The Episcopal Church has a bishop, four white missionaries, and eight colored, three of whom are natives. Teachers, thirty; twelve of whom are natives. Day school scholars, five hundred and fifty; three hundred and fifty natives. Communicants, two hundred and fifty, more than half of whom are natives. Their most important station is at Cavalla, near Cape Palmas.

The Presbyterian Church has, white missionaries, two; colored, four. Teachers, twelve; one high school, five day schools, one hundred and fifty scholars; communicants, one hundred and eighty.

Most of the missionaries of the Episcopal Church are from the South; one of the two white Presbyterian missionaries is from Georgia, and the Southern Baptist Board supports a high school in Monrovia.—Exchange.

COMMERCIAL.

Monday Evening, September 24, 1860.

Our general market has shown but little animation during the week just closed, but in Cotton the movement has been more active than we have had occasion to notice previously during the season, or for some months past. In Tobacco the business has been confined to a few parties, and transactions in Sugar and Molasses are still restricted by small supplies. In Western Produce the demand has been materially checked by the want of shipping facilities to our Gulf ports, and especially to Texas, the means of transportation offering being inadequate to the requirements of the trade. Flour and bran, however, have continued to bring very full prices, owing to the limited arrivals of the descriptions in request. In Provisions there has been but little movement, while prices has shown but few changes of any consequence. Freights have been rather more active, but at easier rates for shippers, and the rates for most descriptions of Exchange have been in favor of buyers.

Cotton.—Prices have shown much irregularity during two or three days especially for the middling and lower grades which are difficult to quote, though the bulk of the business has been at rates within the range of our quotations. The receipts continue to embrace a large proportion of low grades, with much leaf and considerable dust, and it has been very difficult to find desirable or even running lots of the better grades for which extreme prices have been obtained, and we amend our figures for those descriptions.

Few readers of Russian history will fail to remember the name of Count Alexey Orlof, one of the most prominent actors in the murder of Peter III. of Russia. But prominent as he was that deed, it loses half its blackness when compared with another committed by him at the instigation of Catharine II., widow and successor to the murdered monarch.

Catharine, not being a native Russian princess, was quite desirous of removing from her path all who might be supposed likely to disturb the security of her government; and in order to effect her purpose, in one instance, she and her associate Orloff exercised a degree of fiendish ingenuity almost unparalleled in history. The unfortunate girl who excited the jealousy of Catharine was a Russian princess, and granddaughter to Peter the Great. Elizabeth II., his daughter, contracted a private marriage with Count Alexey Rasumofsky, and three children, two sons and a daughter, were the issue of this union. Of the sons, it is only necessary to say that one was accidentally killed, and the other not judged of sufficient political importance to excite either jealousy or suspicion. But it was otherwise with the young Princess Tarranakoff, the subject of our story.

The ambitious designs of the Empress Catharine with regard to Poland excited the indignation of the Polish nobles, and one of these, the Count Radzivill, conceived the design of using this young native princess as an instrument in supplanting her. For this purpose, by dint of bribing her female attendants, he secretly removed her to Poland, and thence to Italy. Many attempts were made to induce Radzivil to place the young princess in the power of Catharine; but though reduced in poverty by the confiscation of his estates, the promise of their restoration, and the offer of the most costly bribes, failed in inducing him to yield. No effect being produced by such proposals, the empress had recourse to threats. Mysterious communications were conveyed to the Polish count, intimating that ruin and misery impended over the Princess Tarranakoff, which could be averted only by his ceasing all correspondence with her. Whatever ambitious designs might have actuated Radzivill, he was most anxious for the safety of the unfortunate girl. What could he do? Shorn of his estates and dignities, and in a foreign land, how was he to protect her from a powerful empress and most unscrupulous woman? Unhappily, he yielded to these covert menaces, and, took a final leave of the princess, having first exacted a pledge from the Russian government that she should remain unmolested.

This reparation effected, the most difficult part of Catharine's work was completed, and by the aid of the Count Alexey Orloff, and one of his infamous associates, the rest became easy. Though the murderer of her husband, Count Alexey retained the favor of his imperial mistress; doubtless, she found him a most useful tool in accomplishing other dark deeds, though a fouler crime than the one committed on this hapless princess could hardly disgrace human nature. When first resident at Rome, the granddaughter of Peter the Great was amply supplied with everything befitting her rank; but at the time Orloff came thither, she was almost in want, and occupying a poor lodging in a humble quarter of the city. Judge of her surprise when an elegantly attired officer called upon her to offer his services. Though he was to all appearance wealthy, and his situation one of actual indigence, he paid her the same respect as though she had been seated on the imperial throne. When invited to sit in her presence, he respectfully declined. 'Misfortune,' said he, 'cannot alter your claims to our respect. Can I, when you are before me, forget that the granddaughter of the illustrious Czar Peter the Great is entitled to all the homage I can offer? Is it for me, because you are in a foreign land, to forget that to you, and not to the tyrannical foreigner who occupies it, belongs the imperial throne of Russia? I have not the honor to be your countryman, but believe me, princess, I am not the less devoted to your service, in which I would freely lay down my life.'

The unfortunate princess listened with delight and thankfulness to this address. It was long since such respectful language had greeted her ears, and the departure of Radzivill had almost reduced her to despair. She answered the flattering speech in terms which proved how much pleasure it had given her, and desired to know to whom she was indebted for this solicitude respecting her welfare. To this her visitor replied: 'That his name was at little moment, since he was only the ambassador sent by some of her most influential countrymen, whose hearts bled to think that she, the descendant of one so doubly illustrious as the Czar Peter the Great had proved himself to be, should be exposed to neglect and indigence in a foreign land.' The princess being naturally anxious to know the names of those whose interest was so deeply excited in her behalf, again pressed her visitor for information on this point, but he still refused to gratify her curiosity. At length, he begged permission to present one who would explain all; and withdrew as from the presence of a sovereign prince, having first knelt to kiss her hand.

The visitor who thus imposed on the credulity of the Princess Tarranakoff was indeed employed by one of her countrymen, he being the spy and associate of Count Alexey Orloff. The uniform in which he appeared was of course assumed for the occasion, as he was in reality a man of most infamous character, a Neapolitan by birth, and known to his toul by the count, because he had already committed crimes sufficient to prove that he would enter unscrupulously into the designs of that nobleman. Orloff, for that was his name, did not at once introduce himself to the presence of his intended victim; he repeated his visit, and finding that she was in actual need, induced her to make use of his purse, and by the respect he paid her, completely won her confidence.

Now was Orloff's time. When informed that the schemes of his emissary had proved successful, and the princess was duly prepared to listen to and believe whatever he might advance, the principal tragedian, as we may call him, appeared on the stage.

Better skilled in the ways of a court than was his emissary, the deference of the latter soon sank into insignificance when compared with that of his more polished employer; and so well did the latter play his part, that the princess became devotedly attached to the man whom she believed to be a model of all that was noble, good, and disinterested. In a short time, Orloff had cause for exultation in the success of his plan, for the princess readily consented to be his wife. A sham-marriage completed the deception, and was followed on the part of the princess by a brief period of unclouded happiness. Never for a moment did she suspect the imposition that had been practised upon her, but built with the most perfect faith on the affection and sincerity of him she believed to be her husband.

One day he entered her presence with an air of the greatest concern, and on her inquiring the reason of his sadness, Orloff replied: 'Ah, dearest, I may well look sorrowful, since I must leave you—you whom all here call the good and the beautiful. But who can tell how good or how beautiful you are in my eyes? You, the granddaughter of one who made himself as illustrious by his deeds as by his high station, yet deigned to bestow on me the treasure of your love.'

'Why speak of this, Alexey?' said the princess. 'My birth mattered little when you sought and found me poor—nay, in want. It was not on an illustrious princess you fixed your affections, but on a neglected and unfortunate woman. Why should we part? Can I not accompany you? Am I not your wife, and as such, is it not my pleasure to sacrifice my convenience to yours?'

It was, of course, no part of Orloff's intention to leave his wife behind, though he was desirous she should object to accompany him. Hitherto, she had been carefully watched, though unknown to herself, she having attributed the continual presence of the count to the devoted affection he professed for her. She was now informed that he had received a summons to join the squadron he commanded at Leghorn, and thither she also went, and was received with many demonstrations of great respect. Orloff's scheme was fast approaching its completion, and the Empress Catharine, exulting in its success, prepared to shower honors on those who had labored so zealously in her behalf.

It was a lovely day, with the blue sky only as an Italian sky can be, when the Princess Tarranakoff escorted by her husband, stepped into a magnificent barge. Gay and in the highest spirits, the princess laughed and chatted with her attendants, little dreaming of the horrible fate impending over her. It had been arranged that she should be permitted the indulgence of a marine excursion, and she was assisted up the side of the vessel, by her obsequious husband. The feathers on new the sails spread without suspicion, and waved their farewells, deeming that they should soon witness the return of the party. The hapless princess was doomed never to revisit the shores of Italy. On board the ship were none save the creatures of Orloff; and one, having his wife completely in his power, he revealed his treachery in all its blackness and fiendish ingenuity. The delicate wrists of the princess were manacled, and the granddaughter of the Czar was taken back to her native land, not, as she had been led to expect, with the honors due to her, rank and the prospect of a throne, but as a wretched prisoner.

It would be utterly impossible to depict the agony of mind she must have endured during this gloomy voyage, but probably no human being ever suffered greater. For during several years after her arrival, she was the tenant of a dungeon in the Russian capital. Catharine triumphed in the success of her plan, and amply rewarded those who had too successfully carried it out. Europe might exclaim against her, but her object was gained, and the Princess Tarranakoff was in her power. In her dark prison-house, the unhappy young woman spent, it is said, six years, and her deliverance came in a dreadful fashion. The autumnal equinox was at hand, and a furious gale raged in St. Petersburg. The angry waves of the Neva lashed the sides of the prison in which she was confined. Absorbed in sorrowful recollections, she scarcely heeded the storm, until she noticed that the floor of her dungeon was wet; then the horrible thought crossed her mind, that the river was rising. Perceiving that the water gained in height, she shrieked aloud; she strove, by every means in her power, to attract the attention of her jailer. But no human aid was at hand. She raised herself as high as possible by means of the articles of furniture in her cell, but still the waters pursued her. The whole of the ground-floor of the prison was laid under water. When the gale had passed over, and the impetuous Neva returned to its ordinary course, her jailer found only the corpses of what had been the victim of Count Alexey Orloff's treachery, and the jealous hatred of Catharina Alexiewna.

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Chapter XXIII.

"A fringe of dowy leaves!
Along the branches droop,
That overhang the cottage-eaves
Where stand a bridal group."

As months rolled on, Frank became impatient for the consummation of his own marriage, and urged Alline to hasten the day that should give him the right and the inestimable pleasure of protecting her as only he could; and now, one lovely evening in August, at an open casement at Alline, trembligly caressing the sweet flowers and bright leaves of the jessamine and honeysuckles that clung there, mingling sweet odor with the gentle breeze. She was robed for her bridal. Serene and fervent was the expression of her eye, while hope lighted her upturned brow. And though no joyous festival was to be held in honor of her wedding, yet her heart looked into the future with a beautiful trust and undimmed faith; "for," thought she, "if care's dark shadow should come, and my spirit loses the brightness that fills it now, and even hope's beacon fade away, I shall have left my faith in God and my hope of a home in heaven."

And later in the evening, as she was led to the altar by her heart's chosen one, the bosome of the beholders thrilled with a feeling of fearful delight, for beautiful in her weakness as a fair, fragile girl, girded by mortality, she stood; but, oh, how strong in her spirit's unchanging steadfastness to God! And well for her that she was able to retain her mild religious light amid her joy, even as she had through her shadowed past, for though she was to find her reward of duties well performed in the home to which she was going, and though all human love could do was done to shield her from harm, and to protect her from sorrow's blight, yet to all there comes, as long as life remains, days of darkness and tears of anguish; for there is no sky, however bright, but hath its transient cloud.—Generous and noble as was Frank's love, it could not always avert the trial, though it did soothe the wounded heart.

Calm indeed were those last hours before the event that was to change the current of her life; and here, absorbed in thought, we will leave Alline, and enter into an apartment of Mr. Carlton's dwelling, where was assembled a group of three or four persons, around whom the shades of twilight still lingered. One amid this group had but lately arrived from a foreign land, and was a guest and friend of Mr. Carlton's, though a stranger to Frank until his recent arrival. His form was tall and attenuated; his noble brow, upon which thought and intellect sat enthroned, was sunburnt by exposure in a tropical clime; his cheek was sunken and swarthy, but his dark brilliant eyes shone with the light of his spirit's holiness and purity, shedding a sublime halo over his otherwise care-worn features. Being a minister and a guest in his father's house, Frank had invited the revered estimable man to perform the ceremony of uniting him to his beloved without having mentioned her name to him,—deeming her a stranger to him, he had thought it unnecessary; and still as the shades of evening deepened, and they were leaving for Mr. Elwin's, did he remain unconscious to whom he was about to unite his young friend; and not till he alighted at the little wicket gate of that well-remembered spot, which had often, with the scenes passed through there, beguiled him from more holy thoughts and pious purposes, did he even imagine that he know aught or felt any interest in the bride. These scenes, with looks and tones that should have been forgotten, taught him that his heart still retained a portion of human weakness, notwithstanding the earnestness with which he ever devoted himself to his task; he knew not until now what light and life, what strength and even hope, their memory had been to him through long months of absence from home, and friends, and country. As well-remembered scenes and dear familiar objects met his eye, he felt a strange icy chill creep over him; but entering the little parlor with a degree of calmness, he awaited the appearance of Frank and Alline without being recognized by any one of those with whom he had been once so familiar. And as Alline was led out before him, he murmured inaudibly, "Can she, too, have forgotten me?" But as she approached him, her eyes were downcast, and her face shaded by her bridal veil, so that she saw him not; but as he began to read, and those deep musical tones, so often heard before, fell upon her ear, there was visible a slight start, and suddenly these long drooping lashes rose, and she fixed her gaze upon the face of the minister. He had noticed her start of surprise, and his eye met hers in a quick glance of hurried inquiry, which neither interrupted the ceremony, nor was noticed by any one; but in that one moment he had become conscious that he was remembered—that if not loved, as he had once hoped to be, he at least held a place in her memory. And as he placed his hands upon their bowed heads, and uttered his fervent benediction, there was the earnest of inspiration in his looks and tones; and with that prayer for her happiness, in that deep and strong supplication that her destiny might be a bright one and how, from his soul that tide of love which had ebbed and flowed from his soul that tide of love which had ebbed amidst the world's busy throng; but now, and forlorn one life retained a holier bliss for thee! Yes, he found solace in a love divine; he heard and read the deep meaning of the love of God. What if his thoughts did go forth like the ark's lone dove, finding no resting-place, no sheltering home of sympathy and love, no response in the bosom of any fellow-being? What if his unanswered heart did grow desolate? Yet still he was sustained; his spirit, vowed unto high solemn service, did not grow weak nor faint because no human tones might cheer him on his way. There was something holy in a heart so beautifully lone. Dim visions of a home, with its lights and joys, often came up from the long past; but the tossings and changes of this world had long separated him from this life guiding star; wild flowers were blooming upon the grave of one whom he once held dear, and often tear-drops fell as memory would fain recall a thousand images of love which might have gladdened his heart, but which now came in visions of loneliness but to plant a deeper thorn in a bosom which had already borne a fearful weight of human ill. But, sad as it is to witness such sights, the human brow will be shadowed and its brightness dimmed as long as life and love shall last.

Anna Leslie, whom disappointment and alienation of friends failed to change, still goes about sneering and mischief-making; still remains an unloved woman, and if she does retain a hope that she will yet fulfill her destiny as a woman, we think she will grow weary of waiting, unless she changes her tact and manœuvres more successfully than she has hitherto done.

It was on a bright evening, a few days after Frank and Alline were married, that they might have been seen seated in a traveling carriage, passing on their way through the little village of G.; they had proceeded to the outskirts of the town, absorbed in their own happiness, and enjoying in anticipation the wedding tour before them, when an object arrested their attention within the quiet graveyard which lies east of the town. There, on the ground, in the shadow of an elaborate tombstone, knelt Percy Maitland, in unrestrained bitterness of heart.—Changed was that eye whose glance had so often inspired hope and joy; changed his heart, which had been with so much ardor fraught, and which had spoke of glory to his every thought. Where now was his spirit's eloquence? What meant that wild expression—those stern thoughts and fierce resolves? Reader, the death of Alice had wrought this change in the noble Maitland; and he in taking his farewell leave of all that is left to him of her. 'Listen, hear him, and the mournful tones of his voice will awaken a feeling in your heart somewhat like unto his own.

"To-morrow, Alice, I shall be far away from these scenes, from home and friends, from thee; but my heart will still remain. Oh, what a cloud has gathered over my destiny! We have stood upon this quiet tranquil ground at this soft, silent hour; and, oh, how exultingly glowed my heart! But the tempest has overthrown all my hopes—my heart is desolately changed. Farewell, high thoughts, inspiring hopes, and visions of gladness! My dreams of pride are over, and grief for thee, my Alice, broods mournfully over these."

And when this farewell was over, and he stood amid other scenes and other climes, there was no unswerving glance, though many an eye dwelt upon his noble brow and perfect manly grace, in beaming ecstacy. No, he did not, would not bid the soul of another expand with those thoughts and dreams which he had once wrought to perfection, and which death had now hallowed, for each faint breeze still murmured to his ear a low mournful dirge.

And now, after the lapse of many years, though the memory of the sad past still lingers, and often casts its shadow on the present, Alline is happy, exceedingly happy in her home, and the affectionate love of her husband and children.

"While o'er life's wide darkling plain,
Unheeding, as we roam,
Through many a path of joy and pain
God leads his children home.

"And though, sometimes in prospect viewed,
The winding way seems dark and rude,
Ah, who the backward path hath scanned,
But blest a Father's guiding hand."

THE END.

THE BLACKBIRD'S SONG.

The bee is asleep in the heart of the rose,
The lark's nestled soft in the cloud,
The swallow lies snug close under the eaves—
But the blackbird's flitting it loud;
His pipes as no hermit would nor should,
Half a mile deep in the heart of the wood,
In the green dark heart of the wood.

The raven's asleep in the thick of the oak,
His head rose under his wing;
The lark's come down to his home on the earth—
But the blackbird still will sing,
Making the heart of the dark wood thrill
With the notes that come from his golden bill,
That flow from his golden bill.

THE LAUGH OF A CHILD.

I love it—I love it—the laugh of a child,
Now rippling and gentle, now merry and wild—
Ringing out on the air with innocent gush,
Like the trill of a bird at the twilight's soft hush;
Floating off on the breeze like the tones of a bell,
Or the music that dwells in the heart of a shell,
Oh, the laugh of a child, so wild and so free,
Is the merriest sound in the world for me.

"BOOKS IN THE RUNNING BROOKS."

BY LUTHA FONTELLE.

I.

Sparkling rill of the gay, glad lone,
Spanning the uplands with silver zone,
Giving new life to the drooping fern;
Cheering the dreamer with "thoughts that burn,"
Leading him duty to love and learn;
Hast thou no mission of love to the lone,
Sparkling rill of the gay, glad tone?

II.

Yes, God called me in gladness to flow,
Children look on me and life's mission know—
A pure heart-light to guard all their days,
The sad-and care-worn to cheer with its rays,
To show in the child God hath perfected praise.
Yes, a mission of love to the weary and lone
I teach thee, O, child! in thy cheering tone.

III.

Gentle stream, as thou hurriest by,
Brightening the glance of the violet's eye,
Cooling the brow of the lily fair,
Flushed by the breath of the noon-tide air;
Casting thy light o'er each heart of care:
Hast thou no purpose holy and high,
Gentle stream, as thou hurriest by?

IV.

Pressing on ever through sunlight and shade,
Steadfast to my aim through the fairest scenes made,
I wear the rock by my constant flow;
Choice living seeds in lone banks I sow,
And beauty springs up as I onward go;
Yes, I breathe a purpose holy and high
Into all souls as I hasten by.

V.

Noble river, advancing in pride,
Bearing proud ships on thy swelling tide,
Pouring thy all in the lap of the giver,
That freely returns it with interest ever,
Losing thyself in its bosom, proud river!
Art thou a mentor, a truthful guide,
Noble river, advancing in pride?

VI.

Glorious manhood in all its strength
Must yield to a stronger will at length;
Its hooors high should be gladly laid
At the feet of Him who the glory made,
And His just commands be all obeyed;
And of His glory advancing to pride,
I am to all nations a truthful guide.

Obituaries.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MAJOR JAMES RAILEY, of Adams Co., Miss., died at the residence of his brother, Mr. Logan Railey, near Versailles, Woodford Co., Ky., Sept. 2d, 1860. The deceased died at the place of his nativity, being on a visit to his brother and other relatives. He had been a planter in Mississippi and Louisiana for many years, and was regarded among his numerous friends and relatives as a man of warm heart, deep and generous sympathies, and noble philanthropy. His was so genial a spirit that, while he enjoyed society greatly himself, he contributed largely to the enjoyment of others. The intensity of these elements of his nature, however, proved to him, as to many others of the same warm temperament, an evil; betrayed him into an occasional spree—to intemperate habits. It was his misfortune in early life not to have been raised under religious influence. His father, though in many respects a model gentleman, was not, until advanced in life, a pious man. The most of the family, somewhat numerous, became decidedly pious, and felt for this their elder brother a deep and solemn solicitude. They covenanted to pray for the salvation of all their relations, and where prospects seemed less encouraging they felt the deeper solicitude; but it seems that to some extent at least, that their prayers had gone up as a memorial before God. Mr. Railey feeling for some months that his health was declining, started with his daughter (Mrs. Boyd) on a trip to the east. Proceeding as far as Baltimore and finding he was not improving, he turned to Richmond. Yes; from thence he hastened to Kentucky that he might be among his relations. Soon after coming among them he was visited with a chill, and a complication of diseases preyed upon him. His mind became flighty; so much so, that while to a direct question he would give an intelligent answer, he would pass to another subject so rapidly that an continuous conversation could be had on any one subject. This condition of his mind did not permit a conversation with him on the momentous question of his condition and destiny. This gave to his friends the most painful and prayerful solicitude for him. After the lapse of some days, it pleased the Lord to grant him a clear state of mind; when he was occasionally heard to ejaculate a prayer for mercy. On the last visit of the writer to him before his death, after looking earnestly at me for a time, he asked me: "How can a sinner be saved?" I proceeded to explain God's method of saving sinners through the merits of our Lord Jesus Christ, in which salvation is purchased and offered to the acceptance of the penitent sinner's faith, as the gift of God. I asked him if we should pray for him? He said: "O yes, yes, yes." I continued, have you prayed for yourself? He replied, "Over and over and over." He united with him in prayer, during which his own soul seemed present to sing a hymn: "Rock, waver, he asked his friends its hyma—'Come thou fount of every blessing.' Their favorite was being sung he seemed particularly moved by the following words:

"Jesus sought me when a stranger,
Wandering from the fold of God;
He to rescue me from danger,
Interposed his precious blood."

The singing having closed, I asked him if he desired to be baptized? He said: "I do; and I desire to join the Church." I asked, what Church? He said: "The Episcopal. The Methodists came from them, I believe." I said, yes; Mr. Wesley, the founder of Methodism, was an Episcopalian." Desiring that I should baptize him, I did so. After explaining the plan of salvation to him, as before stated, I asked him if he felt that he could trust his soul to Jesus Christ to be saved? He said: "I hope in him." During this conversation he articulated very imperfectly, and made repeated efforts to say a great deal more than we could understand. His mind seemed to the last to cling to devotional subjects, and one of the last things he did was to try and sing his favorite hymn. These his last exercises were very gratifying and consoling to his friends present. Besides his family, many a beneficiary of his kindness will long lament his death.

H. H. KAVANAUGH.

St. Charles, Mo., Sct. 11, 1860.

REV. J. S. MOORE was born in North Carolina, Mecklenburg county, January 22d, 1814, and died July 27th, 1860, in Selma, Alabama. His death was occasioned by the falling of a piece of lumber from a scaffold of a building. He lived about twelve hours from the time of receiving the stroke, mostly in a state of unconsciousness. But in his life, and very recent manifestations of the religion he professed, we feel assured that his change is a heppy one. He professed religion July the 6th, 1832, at Rock-Spring camp-ground, Lincoln county, North Carolina. His conversion was clear and satisfactory; he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in September following, held his membership at Bethesda Church, Charlotte circuit, North Carolina. He was impressed that it was his duty to preach the gospel in 1833, against which impression he strove with all his might. He engaged in business about this time, since which his life has been one of toil and disappointment. He went to South Carolina, where at a camp-meeting he professed the blessing of perfect love, Nov. 8th, 1837. He went to Alabama in 1838, where in 1839 he was married and gave up the idea of preaching; he shortly; lost the enjoyment of the blessing of holiness. For years he spent his life in fruitless toil and anguish, his plans and exertions, in a temporal point of view, all appeered to be thwarted by providence. In 1849, he professed to attain the blessing of entire sanctification a second time; first, he strove to be reclaimed, and obtained the evidence, and then he commenced to pray for a clear heart, and attained the evidence of that also; this took place at Summerfield, Ala., in a little prayer-meeting held by old Father Scales. From this time till his death, he was more steady in his religious enjoyments, and at times was very ecstatic. He was a man of strong faith, and at times powerful in prayer. The Lord greatly blessed his labors among mourners. We have reason to believe that he led many into the higher religious experience. About two years ago, he obtained license to preach, since which he appeared to be satisfied and happy. As a prayer-meeting, the night before his death, he appeared to be as happy as he well could be. Thus he was standing in readiness with his lamp trimmed and his light burning, waiting for the coming of the bride-groom. He has left a wife, five children, and many friends to mourn their loss. Farewell, dear brother, thou wert one among the few of whom I could say, we are of one heart, and one mind, we will meet again in heaven. J. H. MONTGOMERY.

Summerfield, Ala., August 20th.

MISS MARGARET J. McDANIEL, daughter of Henry and Delila McDaniel, was born Jan. 14, 1835, and died in peace, August 11th, 1860, at Sumpterville, Ala, aged twenty-nine years and six months. Her natural life was spent under the paternal roof; her warmest earthly attachments were those of child and and sister, but she had a heart in full sympathy with all around her. Loved by a large circle of friends, she lived to carry out God's purpose in her creation. For several years she had been the daughter of affliction; it was but the refiner's fire preparing her heart to receive the image of Him who was "made perfect through sufferings." Two years previous to her death she had a "life hid with Christ in God." When asked as to her preparation for the future, she said: "I have settled that matter long ago; the dying hour is no time for that." Her vigorous mind had been well stored with useful knowledge; the Bible was her constant companion, and God's presence was with her during all of her last illness. Truly, our father and mother in Israel have ties in Heaven; the bodies of three lovely daughters sleep side by side on earth, whilst their spirits join the hallelujahs of the blessed above.

MRS. PHERRIBA H. RAIN, wife of Dr. Daniel Rain, and daughter of Wyche and Martha Cato, died in Washington county, Ala., Aug. 16, 1860, after an illness of six months, leaving a husband, ten children, and numerous friends to mourn her loss. Sister Rain had been a consistent member of the Methodist Church for the last fifteen years. And her prayerful solicitude for the welfare of her family was evinced by her pious admonitions, and example in her every day life. We have never known a more confiding wife and mother. Having committed all that were dear and dear to her to God, she expressed a desire to "depart and be with Christ." And about her last words were, "Bless the Lord, O my soul," and all that is within me bless his holy name." And soon closed her eyes, and her pure spirit passed away to its resting place in the paradise of God. J. G. H.

JAMESON F. HUFFMAN, son of John and Mary Huffman, was born March 26th, 1832, married December 1st, 1858, and died in Pike county, Miss., August 13th, 1860. I have never met with one more pure, high-minded and noble. His Christian life reflected all the noble qualities of a man of God. He told me a few days before his death, he wanted to live only to do something for God in return for his goodness in making him happy when near his end. He felt a joy the "world knoweth not of."

W. H.

HARNEY HARRINGTON, son of Ruben and Martha Denham, died on the 20th August, in East Baton Rouge Parish, La., aged one year and four months. This is the sixth infant of about the same age, that our dear brother and sister have laid side by side. But although they weep, by faith they see them in Abraham's bosom.

J. B. McFerrin D.D., Rev. Dr. Rivers, President of the Wesleyan University, Florence, Ala., Rev. Dr. Keener, P. E. of the New Orleans District, La.

People of the South, the State Female College has claims upon you of no ordinary character. Its beautiful and healthful location in the midst of a community noted for its refined and christian character; its admirably arranged and neatly furnished Boarding House; together with its experienced and skillful Faculty, present such an imposing array of advantages as justly entitle it to be styled a "School of the highest grade and a delightful home."

Many of our patrons were present at the recent Examination; and all, as far as we can learn, were delighted with the school and all its arrangements.

During the past year there were two hundred and twenty in attendance.

Parents may rest assured that the Boarding House will be conducted in the best style.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

SHANGHAI, June 26th, 1860.

MR. EDITOR: To continue the description of our journey: The whole of the Blessed Sabbath, May 20th, we spent in Hay-E, we hope to the benefit of our own souls, and to the glory of God. After having service together mid-sweet communion with each other, and blessed communion with God, we took each of us some books and went into one of the principal temples of the city, and there preached to an attentive congregation the blessed gospel of Jesus. People came in from every direction, perhaps more anxious to see than to hear. I was rejoiced to see them so attentive to preaching, and I hope the Word has fallen into good ground and will bring forth much fruit, to the glory of God. At the close of my remarks, I told them I would preach in the afternoon in a large temple on the sea shore, outside of the city, which is well known to all the people. I invited them to come to my boat, if they wished to make any inquiry after truth. On returning to our boat we went into a large temple which seemed to have been, with all its idols, cast to the moles and bats. The house seems falling to ruins, and the idols—some of them full twenty feet in height—seemed no less so, for their bodies began to show the marks of time, and needed repair to cover the mud and straw of which they are composed. There is Buddha, an idol of clay and straw, on a gigantic lotus-flower; on his right and left stand the two Indian disciples of Buddha. On each side of Buddha stands a row of clay statues. On one side of this we saw an immense hell, which is struck on certain occasions. But this temple seemed even to be deserted by the priests. Here I collected a very quiet crowd, and preached to them as plainly as I could the words and doctrines of our Lord Jesus. But how indifferent they are to the knowledge of truth. They love the ways of sin and vice, and the power of darkness causes them to hate the means used to bring them to God. The Lord can and will convert this sin-loving people from the error of their ways, though Satan may oppose. Our hearts are melted within us when we look around and see this whole "valley of dry bones" unmoved by the preaching of the word of God. They seem dead as the stones around us; but we know that God is faithful, and able to do this great work. He may be working in a way that we know not, and will some day glorify our hearts by an abundant outpouring of His spirit upon this benighted people.—We returned to our boat, feeling rejoiced with the thought that the word of God is not bound, and that He will accomplish the salvation of the heathen. O how much we need, as missionaries of the Cross of Christ in heathen lands, to live by faith, and to continue without ceasing in prayer for God's blessing upon the labor of our hands.

The whole of the afternoon the people continued to come and ask for books. They collected around the bow of the boat, and begged me to get my bible and read and preach to them. I did so, to their great joy and gratification. A number of literary men came and got books, and seemed very thankful for them. We were often astonished at the eagerness with which this people seek to obtain our books. May we not hope that God is working among this people? What an encouraging thought this is for us! It nerves us to more earnest efforts and diligence to spread vital religion throughout all China.

A little after five o'clock I preached in the temple on the sea shore to quite a number of persons who had collected. I trust good will be the result of it. Most of them paid good attention to what was said. Some were intent on seeing what the book contained. I pray that the word preached may work mightily upon the hearts of this people, by the spirit of the living God, and cause them to awake from their lethargy and believe in Jesus as the Savior of the world. O, how my heart mourns to see this people so sleep without a shepherd. May the Lord hear the prayers of all his people in behalf of this heathen nation, and hasten the glad day when they shall be released from the bondage of sin and death, and brought to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

The meaning of the name of this city is "Sea Salt," but it has been more than a thousand years since its salt was won. The wall is crowded with lushes and cisqs [illegible] of the city; still, they close the gates at night. No neat, newly-built houses meet the eye as you would see in one of our cities, but all bear the marks of age and use. The people seem to care only to live by the day, but in a different sense from the child of God. It is this spirit of indifference for the condition of their soul in a future life which meets the missionary at every step and brings sorrow to his heart. None but those who live among the heathen can fully know the extent to which this spirit prevails, and none but he who labors among them can know how far their hearts are alienated from God and all spiritual desires.

The sea coast outside of the city, at the East gate, for many miles is built up into a wall of stone some twenty feet in height, and makes a perfect level on the top of more than ten feet in width. It was built before the Tartars subdued China; since that time, which has been about three hundred years, the public spirit of improvement has been, as it were, removed from the people. The government has become one of oppression, and the people suffer hard bondage under the Tartar yoke. But the day seems to be dawning upon China, when the yoke will be thrown off and they shall be once again a free nation. I will speak more of this in the conclusion of this journey, when I shall speak of the insurgents who now seem to be taking the whole country around us. On Monday morning, May 21st, we were up early and concluded to walk through the city before breakfast, and meet the boat on the opposite side of the city. This was the first day of the moon; consequently all the temples were opened wide for worship. At the first temple on the sea shore, where I had preached the evening before, we saw a poor man suffering from a severe cold and cough, seated on a coil of rope near the door, which had not yet been opened, it being very early. He had a few sticks of incense in his hand, and two small candles. I commenced conversation with him, and soon found that it was for his cold and cough he wished to consult the idol and procure a remedy. It is done in this way: A man whose business it is to wait on all who come, stands by the idol with a small bamboo vase in his hand; this vase is filled with small pieces of bamboo, upon which are written various prescriptions. The candles and incense are set to burning; when the worshipper has made his prostrations, and knocked his head nine times upon the ground, then the keeper of the temple, and sometimes the worshipper himself, begins to shake this vase at first lightly, but gradually with more vehemence, until one falls to the ground, and that is considered the propitious one. If it does not suit, the same process is gone over. The worshipper takes the slip of paper given him, pays the priest a few cash, and goes immediately to an apothecary's shop and purchases the required medicine. We afterwards met the same man on our way through the city; he had been and made his purchase of the medicine, making two or three large bundles which he had under each arm. There was an old woman also at the same temple on the sea shore.—She was there before the door opened, and she compared to abuse the keeper of the temple for not having the door opened by the time it was light, being the first day of the month. She made use of her tongue quite freely, as all the women in China can do. Her object was to seek information from the idol as to where she could procure at a cheap rate the mulberry leaf for her precious silk worms. She seemed to have found the required information, and hurried a man off to the spot. There was another poor woman who said her husband was in ill health, and she had come to implore the gods in his behalf. There was also another man who seemed to be a scholar. Upon my inquiry as to what he came for, he confessed that he could scarcely say, except it was a universal custom to pay homage to the gods on the first day of the month. I think he felt a little ashamed of his position. Just at this time a low official came in his chair, and made his prostrations before the first god he came to, as he wished to be brief, for he had many others to whom he must pay homage during the day. He had two musicians with him, and a man to hold the lower part of his long robe, lest he should get it in the dirt as he kneeled upon the soft cushion before him. He did not condescend to cast a single glance upon us. His worship was through in about three minutes or less, and off he went to another temple in sight, and then to another still in sight, going through the same performance in perfect silence, except the unharmonious sounds of his noisy musicians. Many millions in China are just like this man. They believe in more religions than one, and in more than one mythology of gods. There exists three religions in China, and it is often the case one may will believe in all three, and endeavour in his views to support each. They care but little about finding out the truth and holding to it. They are very superstitious but want conscientiousness. The three religions of China are: Confucian, Buddhu, and Taoze, and the great mass of people believe in them all. After observing this man for a while, we passed on through the city and went into the pagoda outside of the city, at the West gate. When we came down, I collected a crowd before the door, and preached to them the words of eternal life.

About nine o'clock we started for the city of Kar Shan, twenty-five miles distant. We passed many beautifully arched bridges, which spanned the canal, and reached the city about four in the afternoon. I soon collected an audience on the hill outside the city, near the East gate. They were all very attentive and seemed anxious to hear the word of God. O that they knew the importance of it, and felt its full meaning. They are to be pitied and prayed for, that the light of the gospel may come unto them, and that their eyes may be opened to behold their condition. This hill is of considerable note among the Chinese as being the place where one of the Emperors passed a few days when visiting the place. An enormous building is to be seen, entirely empty, for no one is allowed to occupy it, being once the residence of the Emperor. His enormous bedstead is yet to be seen, which is carefully locked up in one of the upper rooms of the building. There are several stone monuments standing in and out of the hall to commemorate the occasion of the Emperor's visit.—We then entered the East gate of the city, taking some books with us. We passed out at the South gate. But long before we got to the South gate our books were exhausted,—taken from us almost as it were by force, so clamorous was the crowd, that we had no peace until they were all gone. What is the cause of this eagerness to get our books? Is it that they sell them to others who destroy them? We have good evidence that the Roman Catholics destroy our books when they can get them. I wish I could say that this eagerness proceeded from a sincere desire to read the Word of God. I preached to a large audience at the foot of the pagoda, near the South gate, in a large temple, in the presence of one of their largest and most hideous idols, with many inferior gods all around me, and many priests.—The latter of whom continued to walk back and forward, seeming quite uneasy as I denounced them all as false worshippers of false gods. There is a book in China called the "sacred edicts" of the Emperor, in which are sixteen lectures addressed to all classes. In one of these an attack is made upon idolatrous worship, warning the people not to frequent the Buddhist and Taourist temples, nor to take any part in idolatrous festivals. Buddhist priests are called the "drones of the country," like moths and other insects that thrive on the gatherings of others, while they do no honest work throughout. I trust they all heard the word gladly and to their soul's eternal benefit. There are many large Buddhist temples surrounding this pagoda. Some are now at falling to the ground. At the entrance of one I saw an idol which had fallen to the ground and had been in the fall shattered to pieces. These pieces were carefully taken up and placed in a confused mass upon the altar at the door. This altar reminded me much of the ancient Jewish altar in its formation, and I stood for a moment and looked upon this altar erected by the heathen who know not God, but have sought out many inventions. Pagodas in China were originally the tombs of Buddhist priests, or for any relics of Buddha and other venerated personages. It seems now that they are erected in honor of Buddha and for purposes of necromancy. Wherever they are situated it is supposed to insure prosperity to those persons in close proximity to it. Each story has a gallery attached to it, completely encircling the pagoda, and to the roof of each gallery are attached small bells which are rung by the wind. When this occurs, and the tinkling of the bells is heard, the priests say it is praise to Buddha. We remained at the city of Kar Shan all night. This is a beautiful city, very neat, and in good repair. It was once the seat of government for one of the kings of China, when the country was governed by many kings. He made war with the king of Soo-chau and was subdued by him, and was taken to be his servant. But he treated the king so kindly on an occasion when he was taken sick, and when no one else would come near him, that the king of Soo-chau, on his recovery, gave him his freedom and sent him back to his own country. Upon which the king of Kar Shan, to show his gratitude, sent him the most beautiful woman of his province. In about seven years this king made war again against the king of Soo-chau, and overcame him. This woman was then rescued and brought back to her own country, and made the wife of the king. The former wife of the king of Kar Shan, became very [illegible] and is supposed to have killed her. Her monument is to be seen outside of the South gate. She is known all over China by the name of Se-Sy, the beautiful woman. We were well treated by all the people, and only called "monkeys," and "red-haired men," and "devils from the ocean" by way of diversion, which did us no harm, but only opened the way for us to speak to them of Jesus and what he had done for them, and of their soul's eternal interest. I have preached often in and out of the city on former occasions, and have always found the people quiet and peaceable. I trust that they will at some future day readily embrace Christianity. The population of this place is, I suppose, two hundred thousand inhabitants.

We left Kar Shan early on Tuesday morning, and passed, just outside of the city, quite a number of Imperial soldiers who seemed just awaking from their slumbers, not dreaming perhaps of their enemy. They are placed here to guard against the approach of the Insurgents.—Their matchlocks seemed to be those of the primitive style, and appeared as though they had seen service for ages. There were several forts of stone and mud which seemed to have a profusion of flags but no soldiers. We passed through three large villages before twelve o'clock, numbering about fifty thousand inhabitants each. At one of these we made a halt of half an hour, and in ten minutes we had two hundred or more persons on shore to whom I preached from the bow of the boat. I had an acquaintance here, but upon inquiry, I found he had gone to judgment before an awful God, awful to those who will not love and obey him. He was killed by one against whom he had a law-suit. Passing through many populous villages during the day, we arrived at the city of Soo Kong, which bears the name of the king who once lived in Soo-chau. It was too late after night when we reached there to go out and preach. I have preached quite often at this place and have given out many tracts and bibles. It is only twenty miles from Soo-chau.

I fear I have written quite too long a letter and will thus trespass upon your patience; I did not intend it to be so long. In my next I will give you a description of this miserable city, crumbling into the dust, and also of the beautiful city of Soo-chau.

EUROPEAN CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE, SYDENHAM, NEAR LONDON.

Providence House, London, Aug., 1860.

MR. EDITOR—Among the many noble institutions which have been called into existence by the public spirit of the age, to promote the health, intelligence, and happiness of the people of this great metropolis, a conspicuous place must be assigned to the Crystal Palace, at Sydenham, which had its origin in the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park, in 1851. We are often disappointed when we see places that have been highly complimented by travellers and by the press; but in this case there was not only no disappointment, but we could say, as the Queen of Sheba said, when she saw the riches and heard the wisdom of Solomon, "the half had not been told us."

After a very pleasant ride of about twenty minutes in one of the carriages of the London and Brighton Railway, we found ourselves some eight or ten miles from the dust, smoke, and din of the over-crowded city, and breathing a much more salubrious air, while our eyes were delighted with the scenes of rural beauty spread out before us. A great crowd of people were on their way to the palace, all of whom were strangers to us, except Mr. Tyrus Thompson, of your city, with whom it was our happiness to spend this and some other pleasant days in visiting the "lions" of London and its suburbs. A more polite and agreeable gentleman it would be hard to find, and I was particularly indebted to him for his kind attentions to me and my wife while he was in London. It is refreshing to meet with a friend and fellow-countryman anywhere, but especially in such a place as London. As we pass on we talk freely about England and America, and hear some opinions about Louis Napoleon, which shew that he does not stand very high in the estimation of Englishmen. One cautions another about the danger of speaking his mind too freely, lest he should get into a French jail, and in the midst of the discussion the train stops—we are at the entrance into the great building.

It is impossible, without the use of diagrams and pictures, to convey to a reader a proper conception of this noble edifice. It is a very large and beautiful structure, with a basement of stone, the body of the building and the roof being composed almost entirely of glass and iron. A type of a new order of architecture which has been called the "modern English," it is essentially the creation of the 19th century. The erection of this building in 1851, as well as the original palace in Hyde Park, in 1851, as we are informed by Mr. Samuel Phillips, "is mainly due to the rapid advances made in this country in the manufacture of glass and iron, substances that, with only moderate attention, will defy the effects of time. The present structure is capable of enduring longer than the oldest marble or stone monuments of antiquity." Its spacious courts and galleries, and its lofty towers, are constructed with exquisite beauty, and filled with the most interesting productions of nature and art. It has also schools of literature, art, and science, concert halls, lecture-rooms, dining and refreshment saloons, and all that could be desired for the amusement and instruction of the people. The palace with its gardens and pleasure-grounds, occupies 200 acres. The Company to whom the British public is indebted for the existence of this institution, was originally organized with a capital of £500,000, in one hundred thousand shares of £5 each. The praiseworthy object of the institution is very well stated by Mr. Phillips, as follows:—"That it should form a palace for the multitude, where, at all times, protected from the inclement varieties of our climate, healthful exercise and wholesome recreation should be easily attainable. To raise the enjoyment of the English people, and especially to afford to the inhabitants of London, in wholesome country air, amidst the beauties of nature, the elevating treasures of art, and the instructive marvels of science, an accessible and inexpensive substitute for the injurious and debasing amusements of a crowded metropolis—to blend for them instruction with pleasure, to educate them by the eye, to quicken and purify their taste by the habit of recognizing the beautiful; to place them amidst the trees, flowers, and plants of all countries and climates, and to attract them to the study of the natural sciences by displaying their most interesting examples; and making known all the achievements of modern industry, and the marvels of mechanical manufactures. Such were some of the original intentions of the first promoters of this national undertaking."

At one time as many as 6,400 men were employed in completing the Institution, while the agents of the Company were sent out in every direction to procure architectural specimens from the most remarkable edifices throughout the world, so that within the glass walls the student might inspect a vast historical gallery of this branch of art from the time of the ancient Egyptians to our own day. A magnificent collection of plants, flowers and trees from every land was also made; and, standing in the gardens and groves, stuffed specimens of different varieties of the human race, in the savage or semi-civilized state, may be seen, as well as other animals, giving the student of natural history a fine opportunity of noting the different degrees of civilization, and the progressive improvement of the human race.

Spacious galleries are allotted to collections in Theology, Ethnology, Zoology, and all those sciences, an acquaintance with which is attainable through the medium of the eye; but those who look with more interest upon specimens of the results of modern industry and skill in the mechanical arts, can find ample gratification in the large courts appropriated to these departments. The statuary court, the Birmingham court, the Sheffield court, the glass, and porcelain, and ceramic courts, abound in specimens of vast variety and beauty, showing the inventive genius and skill of modern British workmen.

The Alhambra, the Assyrian, the Byzantine, and Romanesque, the English Mediæval, the Renaissance court, and many others, would profitably employ more hours than we have minutes to spare; and, fatigued by wandering through numerous and spacious rooms, we sat down in a large assembly-room, and listened to the thrilling sounds of instrumental music from a larger company of performers than we had ever heard before. The music is excellent, but we cannot enjoy it long, as there is so much to be seen before the time of departure from the palace. We start again and walk about until we are too much fatigued to go farther, so we sit down and look at the people as they pass by.

It was shewn by the reception of tickets that more than ten thousand people visited the Crystal Palace on this day, and this was a small number compared with the crowds that meet here on special occasions. It is, of course, quite amusing just to sit still and watch the people as they pass by. All but the very poorest and lowest order, and there are also representatives of almost every nation and tribe and tongue. With deep interest we looked upon some intelligent-looking Hindoos and Parsees, and other varieties of the Human race whom we had never seen before. As they passed by us in the Indian or Egyptian courts, with their bronzed faces, graceful turbans and robes, gazing with curious eyes upon the immense statues of Egypt's grim-looking conquerors and gods, and the monstrous creations of Indian mythology, we could easily have fancied that we were in an oriental land.

But we must leave many of these things without even a cursory examination, and glance at the Library and reading-rooms beyond the vestibule of the Byzantine court, where the visitor, while he meditates on what he has read, may enjoy the beautiful prospect of the gardens, and the rich landscape before him. The books are principally works of reference for those studies and literarts that are exemplified in the Institution. From the author before referred to, we learn that, "amongst several very splendid works, the magnificent gifts of both Continental and British publishers, which enrich the library, one deserves special notice on account of its great value, as well as of its beauty: this is a copy of Das Neue Testamenta, which was printed in 1851 for his Majesty the King of Prussia. As a specimen of Gothic typography, the work is perhaps without a peer, while as a work of art, and a record of what can be achieved by the printing press in those days, it is highly valued. Five exquisite designs from the rich and original pencil of Kaulbach illustrate the volume. They represent the Deity (!) and the four Evangelists, severally, being single allegorical figures. There is also one illustration to the Revelations, by Peter Cornelius. Twenty-five copies only of the book were printed when the type was broken up. This magnificent volume is the production of Herr Rudolf Decker, of Berlin, printer to the King of Prussia, by whom it was presented to the Company's Library." In the news-room upwards of a hundred newspapers, half of them from London, eighteen magazines, and seven reviews, are regularly opened for the inspection of readers, and the very latest news, by special telegraph, is exhibited immediately on its reception.

But the body must be fed and refreshed as well as the mind, and, of course, in an establishment where thirty or forty thousand people sometimes assemble to spend a day of hilarity, something good to eat and drink must be provided. The arrangements made for this purpose are ample and varied. Private or public meals may be had in the dining-rooms and saloons, to suit every variety of appetite and means. When the windows of the dining-rooms are thrown open, they command a view of the terraces, fountains, gardens, and the rich landscape beyond. Here the visitor, when tired of wandering through the courts of the palace, and gazing upon the collected treasures of the Institution, may sit down to a sumptuous repast, or enjoy the society of friends, if he should be so happy as to have any near him, while the sweet notes of music, which are rolling and reverberating through this great temple of art, add to the enchantment of the occasion. I know not what I may see in the future; but thus far, in all my wanderings in Europe and America, I have seen nothing that will compare with the Crystal Palace of London, as a place of innocent recreation or of useful instruction, in which the citizens of an over-crowded city may spend their leisure hours, and forget for awhile the burden of their cares, and the dull monotony of every day life. No language of mine will express what I feel with regard to the elevating influences of this and kindred institutions. The time, it is to be hoped, is not far distant when those who project, endow, and carry out these enterprises, will be held in higher estimation than all the "heroes," whose sole claim to distinction arises from their being unusually successful upon the field of blood, who have left behind them, as memorials of their prowess, hecatombs of slaughtered victims, and numerous cities in ruins.

We have not time and strength sufficient to ascend the crystal towers, nor to walk through the grounds where the geological illustrations, and the specimens of extinct animals are kept. At some future time we hope to have an opportunity of looking at the labyrinthodons, the megalosaurus, the iguanodons, the great pteradoctyles, and other hard-named creatures, who existed, it may be, away back beyond the "remotest depths of antiquity." We regret that we had not an opportunity of seeing the fountains play, as they are said to be the largest in the world, and the crowning beauty of the whole system; but if we ever have another opportunity of visiting this marvellous place, we will try to be there on one of the days upon which the fountains play, and if, in addition to this, could be added a bright summer or autumnal day, free from fogs, mists and rain, we feel persuaded that we should be in a place as worthy of the name of paradise as any upon the face of the earth.

JOHN BAYLEY.

Discretion in speech is more than eloquence.

A PARADISE OF FOOLS.

The love of narcotics and intoxicating compounds is so universal, it may almost count as an instinct. Every nation has it in a greater or less degree; some in the shape of opium, some of smoke, some in drink, some in snuff; but from the equator to the snow-line, it exists—a little changed in dress, according to the climate, but always the same need, always the same desire. Kings have decreed punishments on the secular side; priests have mathematised on the spiritual; lawmakers have sought to pluck out the habit, root and branch, from their people; but all to no good—man still goes on smoking, snuffing, and chewing; putting an enemy into his mouth to steal away his brains, and finding immense satisfaction in a practice that makes him both an invalid and a madman, and never quits him till it has laid him fairly in the grave.

The practice of self-stupefaction dates far back.—Those terrible sluggy old Scythians made a paradise for themselves out of the fumes of burning hempseeds; the Greeks had their nepenthes and their henbane; the Romans knew the virtues of opium and the black drop; and their Lycasta, the Tofana of her age, could contrive at a way far more cruel than the enemy's death, as pleasant in its course as it was certain in its end. Lethe itself might have been only the poetic name for the prose idea of a huge river of laudanum—like a child's imagination of a world of cake; and the Delphic ravings were perhaps caused by certain fumes of an intoxicating character, whose precise name is unknown. Later down in the great tide of life, we find Pamelens founding his fame and influence on the unpublished properties of opium; and what was half the necromancy of the dark ages but bang and hachishish, and the rest of the magic compounds of a like nature? In the East, until opium was discovered, and, indeed, independently of opium, hemp has been the great manufacturer. Hemp, which in Europe means fibrous mats and the toughest of cordage, is there in soft fibreless plant, saturated with narcotic juices, and of no textile value whatever. There is the same difference, also, between the hemp of North and South America; tropical heat converting ropes into bang, by some mysterious process of nature as yet kept secret. Besides making hachishish or bang, hemp performs the functions of tobacco, and is sometimes smoked in very unorthodox pipes, such as cows' horns, gourds, cocoa-nuts, and the like. But this tobacco is made only after the resinous juice—which is the narcotic—has been taken away; and this is done in some parts of India in rather a strange manner. Men clothed in leather dresses rush violently through a plantation of hemp, brushing the plants this way and that, so that the soft resin, called churrus, adheres to the leather; it is afterwards scraped off and kneaded into balls, the selling value of which is five or six shillings the pound. In the Nepaul, a finer kind is gathered delicately by the hand, and sells at double the amount of that got by the leathern dresses at the rest of India. The Persians collect their churrus by passing the plant between coarse clothes, the resinous juice on which can be scraped off, as from the leather; the churrus of Herat is considered the most powerful of all the varieties of the drug. Hemp resin, when pure, is blackish gray in color, fragrant but narcotic in odour, slightly warm, bitter, and acrid in flavor. The famous hachishish, which makes men mad with joy, and leaves them mad with despair, is a dark-green, bitter, highly perfumed preparation of this churrus, of about the consistence of syrup; and of effects that may well pass for miraculous. No other drug has such a potent influence on the brain as this; none seems to affect the imagination so entirely. Dr. Moreau once took a dose, just before going to the opera, and it seemed to him that he was three hours in getting through the passage (he was probably not three minutes). M. de Sauley took a dose, the effects of which lasted the whole day; that day seemed to him to have been a hundred years. Half the Arabian Nights' stories introduce hachishish—not always by name—as one of their means of action; and some people say they were composed under its influence. Acting as it does on the imagination, it produces all kinds of [illegible], sometimes very terrible.

Afreets and jinns are daily companions with the Eastern takers of hachishish; they hold long conversations together, make far journeys, see wondrous sights, live through eventful lives, all the time that the poor wretch is lying drunk in his fool's paradise upon the straw, and spending, on unsubstantial visions, the wealth and energy which should have gone to build up a noble and useful life. These lies of delirium, often repeated, close finally in disease and madness—a sad realistic ending to the substitutes of irreparable happiness, the thrillings of immeasurable incommunicable joy, the chaste frame, the teeming brain, the atmosphere of love and glory, and divinest beauty, which make up the sum of those hachishish dreams.

The Assassins of the Mountain, of whom every one has heard, were simply Hachishishins, or the takers of hachishish; but their hempen madness generally choosing a turbulent and aggressive outfall, leading them to the somewhat unpleasant demonstration of cutting their neighbors' throats, the name came gradually to be synonymous with all blood-thirsty and riotous people whatever, and, in English, was corrupted into assassins—hachishishins, or the takers of hachishish—men ever ready for some impromptu act of violence and murder.

The Sheik Haider, chief of the ascetics of his day, was the discoverer of the dangerously delightful properties of bemp. For ten years he had lived, in the monastery of the Fakirs, a recluse from man and pleasure, but one day he chanced to go out into the fields alone. When he returned he was a changed man—gay, blithe, communicative; in nothing resembling the gloomy saint who had wandered forth into the fields, dull of brain and dead of heart, to whom life was a long act of penance, and joy a thing of the past. He told his friends that he had seen a plant which had seemed to dance in the sunlight; that, struck with its appearance, he had eaten some of its leaves, when, on the instant, earth was transformed to paradise, and love and beauty flowed where only stupor and stagnation had crept before. His companions went with him to the place, found the plant dancing in the heat, ate the leaves like their sheik, and were confirmed hachishishins for evermore. The sheik was accustomed to take his portion steeped in wine, and the bright green tint it gave to the liquor was the meaning of "the emerald cup," so celebrated in Eastern poetry. This discovery of the intoxication properties of hemp was in the year of the Flight 658. Twenty-two years afterwards, the severest ordinances were passed against the hempites. Their teeth were knocked out; they were persecuted and outlawed; and the famous valley or garden of Bejacina, where all the inhabitants were given over to the practice, was rooted up and laid desolate. But man's desires were stronger than legal enactments. In twelve years' time after this raid, the users and abusers of hemp were as powerful and numerous as ever; and now the problem would be to find an Eastern who has not, at some time or other, known by experience the fascinating effects of hachishish. It is even creeping into America; and men with turn-down collars and whittled sticks send themselves into a state of stupor and delirium by means of the same drug as that which made the Assassins of the Mountain so terrible, and gave the world some of the best stories in Scheherazade's collection.

The Hindoos make several preparations of the plant and juice. After it has flowered, and the resinous juice been extracted, the dried plant is made into bundles two feet long, and three inches in diameter, each bundle containing twenty-four plants, which are sold for smoking. The larger leaves and capsules, without the stalks, are called Bang, Subjee, and Sidhee, and make, first, an intoxicating drink; next, an intoxicating tobacco; and thirdly, an intoxicating conserve called majoon—a lozenge-shaped mass of butter, flour, milk, sugar, and bang, sweet and pleasant to the taste, and of potent properties. One dram of majoon is enough for a beginner, but an old hand may venture on three. Almost all kinds of carnivora eat this conserve greedily, and become deliciously drunk in consequence. The Hindus sometimes mix the seeds of the datura with their hachishish, with what specific effect is not quite clear. The eaters of hachishish have almost always voracious appetites; and, in some instances, the effect of hallucination and delirium ends at a moment, abruptly and without gradation; in others, it passes off gradually, and by a painful effort.

Dr. Heinrich took a dose of a very powerful kind, called Bummgi (the laughter-producer) macht kef, got at Bucharest in hard black tablets, very smooth, inodorous, insipid, and tough, becoming, on mastication, a pappy mass, which in time dissolves, and leaves a crumbling solid substance of a residuum. The doctor took ten grains, and the dose began to operate in about an hour and a half. He met an acquaintance in the town, where he had gone, and to him he talked incoherent nonsense; his face and eyes were red and inflamed, and everything he saw or did had a ludicrous aspect. Suddenly, he became pale and sad, his excitement and pleasure faded, and the whole world seemed dead, gray, cold, and narrow; his blood was boiling, and seemed to surge to his head like a heated fountain. He drank cold water, and bathed his head and neck also in cold water, and for a time was better, but in five minutes the attack was renewed. He thought he was dying, and spoke of his dissection; and so he continued for three days, with intermittent attacks, growing gradually less severe, but the effects not passing entirely away until long after.

The "gift," as the Turks call opium, plays even a more important part in the paradise of fools. It is a more sleepy serpent than bang, more deadly, and less delicious; still its votaries are just as devoted as the others, and its reign as deplorably universal. But it has, as a set-off against its hideous evil, a counter-balance of good; the gift stands between the angel and the demon, with a considerable leaning, however, to the demoniac side.—When fresh, opium-juice is of a pinkish color; this juice is placed in shallow vessels, to allow a coffee-colored liquid to drain off, when (in Hennes) it is dried to the required consistence by exposure to air in the shade; in Malwah, it is immersed in linseed oil; and in Turkey, it is beaten up with saliva, a process almost as nasty as the Friendly Islanders' cava, to which we shall come presently. It is prepared for the market in various forms. The Bengal opium is made into balls of three and a half pounds weight, about the size, each, of a child's head, coated with poppy-leaves, fastened together by the lewah, or coffee-colored liquid drained off in the shallow saucers. Garden Patna opium is in square cakes, one inch thick, and three in diameter, wrapped in thin plates of mica. Malwah opium is in round flattened cakes, ten ounces in weight, packed in 'hoosa,' or coarsely powdered poppy petals—sometimes packed in nothing at all. Catch opium is in small cakes, an inch in diameter, enclosed in fragments of leaves. Kandeish opium is in round flattened cakes weighing half a pound. Egyptian opium is also in round flattened cakes, about an inch in diameter, covered with the vestiges of some leaf.—Persian opium is in sticks, six inches long, and half an inch in diameter, covered with smooth satiny paper, and tied with cotton. Smyrna opium is both round and flattened, in cakes of irregular weight, and covered with the capsules of a species of dock. And Constantinople opium is either in large irregular cakes, or small regular convex balls, covered with poppy-leaf, and two inches or so in diameter. Of all these kinds, the English market receives most gladly the Smyrna opium. Besides these, there are various adulterations, some of them being balls of Madras tobacco, with an inside of sand, the balls neatly made, and rubbed over with a watery solution of chandu (the extract for smoking obtained from the pure opium); and others mere cakes of refuse, admirably pounded and washed, so as to resemble the real thing to all save the unbelieving Frank, with his accursed tests and infidel microscope.

The opium used for smoking is an after-preparation—a purified process, by which all the irritating matter is got rid of, and only the soothing and soporific qualities remain. This smoking opium, or chandu, is got, among other ways, by intense heat, and requires much care in the process. The men who work at it lead a strange life of physical discomfort and mental excitement; half-dead with heat in the day, drunk with arrack at night, and, as some say, though others deny, in a perpetual state of cerebral exaltation from the fumes of the boiling opium. So precious is the drug, that the very paper through which the chandu is strained is carefully preserved; as also the bowl of water in which the workmen from time to time wash their hands; as also, again, the refuse, consisting of charcoal, oil, salts of opium, and uncousumed chandu. This refuse is smoked by the poor, who cannot afford chandu, and costs them just half the price. When smoked, it leaves a second residuum, called by the Chinese smashing. Smashing is mixed with arrack, and drunk by the very poorest—beggars, outcasts, and the like, who cannot go without their drug, and who yet cannot afford its price.

In Egypt, several varieties of conserve are made of henbane, hemp, and opium, to each of which kind a separate manifestation of enjoyment is given. Thus, one kind makes one sing, another talk wild and fast, a third dance; a fourth gives wonderous visions, and a fifth simply induces a lazy sleep, calm, peaceful, and [illegible]. The Malays of Java and Sumatra, who [illegible] mixed with sugar and ripe plantain; the Turks take theirs in pills, or mixed with syrups, which are either moist or dried into small cakes, with the words Mash-Allah, 'the Gift of God,' written on them. When two or three drams a day have lost their effect, they mix corrosive sublimate with the opium, until they get to ten grains. The Hindu makes his gates of paradise out of pills; and the English swallow laudanum, as it comes from the shops—bitter, poisonous, adulterated; of infinite blessing to the diseased, but always hateful to the healthy. It is almost incredible to what quantities the opium-eater and laudanum drinkers can gradually attain. Dr. Christison speaks of one woman who took a dram of solid opium daily for ten years; Lord Mar, for thirty years, drank two or three ounces of laudanum daily; De Quincy got to a daily dose of eighty small teaspoonfuls, or eighty thousand drops—about enough for three hundred and twenty patients under ordinary hospital treatment; and half an ounce in the twenty-four hours is not at all an uncommon amount for constant drinkers. But the worst feature in the English practice is, the immense number of deaths it causes among the infants of the poor. A dose of 'quietness' is given by the busy mother or the careless nurse, and the 'quietness' comes so often, that the little creatures are finally quieted out of the world altogether. So with the Chinese. The delicious dream of the opium-smoker is followed by the hideous waking of the drunkard; with shattered nerves and ghastly fancies, the wretched being must fly again to the source of his delight and his despair. The opium-pipe must undo what the opium-pipe has done; and thus he fulfils the same sad round of dreaming ecstasy, and waking misery, until disease, madness, imbecility, and death closes that terrible chapter of misused life for ever.

As much beloved by its adherents, but by no means so maleficent, tobacco—l'herbe sainte, l'herbe sacree, l'herbe propre a tous les maux, la panacee antarctique, as it was called by its early admirers—helps men also to a mild kind of heaven. Not so deliriously delicious as that got out of hachishish, nor so soothingly enchanting as that from opium, it yet has its own special gift of calm delight, and, if it does not intoxicate, soothes and refreshes. Brought by Raleigh or some of his men from Virginia; christened by Jean Nicot for the benefit of future botanists; patronized, in the shape of snuff, by French and Italian princedom; evilly entreated by English royalty—tobacco has gone through the course appointed to most things human—the small beginning, the sharp opposition, the steady way, and the final triumph, with opponents hanging their diminished heads. Tobacco is now an institution. Banished from the drawing-room, it is paramount in the clubs; worshipped under protest, and possible fine in the railway-carriage, it is at times on the omnibus top; the soldier smokes it, the sailor chews it, the elderly matron snuffed it in years gone by, and still a few devotees are to be found, lurking in holes and corners, with breast-plates of a golden brown, and handkerchiefs curiously embroidered. Tobacco can make the hungry man forget his hunger, the shivering man indifferent to the cold; it can lessen the toilsomeness of the journey, and brighten the weary; it can soothe the aching heart and still the throbbing pulse; it can do all that opium and hachishish do in their special spheres, and without their special evils. So powerful is the sainted herb which Raleigh brought, and Jean Nicot thought worthy of his own name.—Small need have I to praise it; small need to advocate free use of this heavenly weed. Dirty habits, ruined digestions, offensive rooms, cross wives; intense enjoyment, and spoiled furniture, attest the university of its reign, and make the task of proselyting unnecessary. On the whole, seeing that man must and will have some kind of narcotic stimulant, some kind of drug which shall still the nerves but awaken the brain, tobacco is as good as anything else, answering its legitimate purposes, but not going so far beyond them as the two deadly charms spoken of before; and though not a particularly clean habit, the dose of it is not so bad as betel-nut chewing or cava-drinking, excepting, indeed, in the United States, where it is simply a disgusting nuisance.

The cava of the Friendly Islands in another preparation that does not seem cleanly to European tastes.—This is a drink made of the chewed root of the Ava pepper, and is accounted as near perfection, in the way of intoxicating liquid, as the Friendly Island mind can conceive. A whole party sits in solemn conclave with their chief, chewing cava; the round balls which each puts out of his mouth are then laid reverently in a bowl, and water is poured on them. This water, after sundry ceremonies, is ladled out into improvised cups of screwed-up banana leaves; and then is the company transported to the seventh heaven!

The coca palm is another masticatory delight—a stomachic and a tonic, tasting like grass, and dying the lips and saliva green.

A few people use thorn-apple (Datura), and a few others, nightshade (Atropa belladonna), and some henbane, and some the bitter-sweet; in fact, whatever can excite or soothe, stimulate or quiet, has its users and its votaries, no matter at what cost. The seeds of the datura are often given in India to stupefy those whom it is intended to rob or ill-treat in any way; and the lethargy or stupefaction induced sometimes lasts for two days or more. In Peru, it is given to the nearest relative of a sick man, who takes it in order to discover the sorceror or mohori who has given his friend the disease—for all disease is by witchcraft in Peru. His dreams, under the influence of datura, and when he recovers, he describes to his family the person of the sorceror he has seen. They then set out in a body, and compel the mohori indicated to undertake the cure. If the dreamer has seen no person in his dreams at all, the first mohori met with is obliged to undertake the cure instead. Should the patient die during the dreaming of the relative, the mohori dreamed of must die too.

THE ADVOCATE AND PARTY POLITICS.

A presidential, or other political canvass, makes men suspicious, unfair, overbearing. This is particularly manifest in the dictatorial bearing of politicians and political papers toward religious papers and ministers of the gospel. In addition to their bitter partisanship, they generally bet large sums on the election, and become a sort of political banditti, attempting to over-ride every right to compass their ends. The same public addresses, and the same editorials, which in former times passed unnoticed, are, during the canvass, tortured into partisan broadsides. It is time for a "declaration of independence" against this most unprincipled tyranny. The Advocate has been charged with partisanship. It is wholly untrue. For an article against those "vote-mongers" who prostitute our Christian civilization for the purchase of the Romish and German infidel vote, and for another on the "Destiny of the Irish," we have been condemned by Democrats; for our defence of Southern rights, and for our deprecation of the charge of "disunionism" made by Southern men against Southern men, we have been condemned by the Opposition. So be it. We have not aimed to benefit a single candidate; but, on general questions, we have our rights, and intend to enjoy them. We advise pettifogging politicians to attend to their own affairs. We shall certainly attend to ours, whether they do or not.

PLAGIARISM OF MANNER.

Plagiarism is a three-fold sin: it is a sin against the truth; it is a sin against the soul of him who is guilty of it; and it is a sin against him who is thus defrauded of his living thoughts and words.—The latter element of the sin is the only one which is generally emphasized. Not because it is intrinsically the worst, but because it is the most inconvenient. The sin is more apt to be detected, and the sinner more apt to be brought to shame. If we sin against truth, or against our own souls, they remain silent; no audible voice accuses us; our punishment is left to the action of the general government of God, in the present and in the future. But if we sin against our neighbor, there are living witnesses; we cannot escape the condemnation. Nevertheless, the sin against our own souls is worse than that against our neighbor, at least in consequences. He is wronged, but not injured; at least only temporarily. But our own souls are both wronged and injured. Our neighbor only suffers an involuntary and temporary loan to the plagiarist of his mental treasures; but the plagiarist thereby confesses that he has no such treasures; he admits his inability to acquire them; and he also, in proportion as he continues to plagiarize, gradually weakens, and parts with, what native mental power God has given him. "To him that hath shall be given, that he may have the more abundance; but to him that hath not, shall be taken away even that which he hath."

But the sin of plagiarism is too limited in the popular meaning and application. It is generally applied to the appropriation and use of other men's words. It is sometimes applied to the use of other men's thoughts. But the justice of this is not so clear. He who governs his tongue, according to the Bible, and also according to common experience, governs his whole body—his whole character and life. And, likewise, he who uses his own words—the natural clothing of his own ideas—will rarely be guilty of plagiarism as to thought. He may not have originated his ideas, in point of time, but if they have truly become his own—his own convictions, taking the forms of his own mental moulds, and the coloring of his imagination, feeling, and language, they are his own, in the best sense. The seed may not have been indigenous to the soil of his own mind. It is doubted if any ideas are original in this sense. But, come the seed from what quarter it may, if he have truly planted it in his own mental soil, and made his own harvest by his own cultivation, he is no plagiarist.

But there is a plagiarism of manner, as well as of words. No where is this so common as among Methodist preachers. Every great preacher, every striking, or merely popular preacher, has his school, his disciples, his imitators. The evil of this needs no argument. The most unlettered Methodist is offended, in taste, whenever he hears a young preacher, however popular, imitating in manner, in tone of voice, in modulation, in emphasis, some other preacher. This plagiarism of manner is as bad as plagiarism of words. It has the same elements of evil. The individual power of different preachers consists as much in their individuality of manner as in their individuality of thought, if not more. It is therefore as wrong and injurious, both to our neighbor and ourselves, to be guilty of plagiarism in manner as in words. And he who plagiarizes another's manner, is very apt to plagiarize his words, his ideas, and his forms of thought and expression. And if he does not, which we will not admit, he will have the credit of doing so. Whenever a congregation hears a young preacher speaking in the tone and manner of another, they will conclude, intuitively, that he is preaching that other man's sermons, or at least appropriating his language and ideas. As long as a man allows himself to be an imitator he is wronging his own soul, dwarfing his own mind, undermining his own power, losing self-respect, confidence and dignity, and bringing upon himself barrenness of mind, heart, and imagination. A plagiarist of words cannot feel, as he should do, the original, native force of the truths they contain; a plagiarist in manner can neither put the fire and power of his own soul into his sermon, nor depend upon the Holy Ghost for his gracious unction, like an original man. Man grows, if he grow at all, from within, outward. God's plan in our culture is development, growth, not manufacture.

It is not necessary, in order to avoid plagiarism in manner, to be insensible to the excellencies of manner in other men, nor to neglect to cultivate similar excellencies in our own manner. But let them be our own, truly; our own voice, our own manner; our own eloquence, in harmony with our own nature and person; developed naturally, with the help of all possible suggestions from every quarter.

The best plan to insure naturalness in the pulpit is to speak in the colloquial or conversational style. Begin your sermon in the same tone and manner natural to you in conversation. Whenever this is forsaken for an imaginary ideal of an oratorical style, the speaker has denied the faith of eloquence, and is worse than an oratorical infidel. The colloquial style, or rather the natural style, is the best style in the world. It is divine; the one God has given. It is in harmony with your own nature. It is the tone and manner of your own soul. It can never sincerely, and truly, and powerfully utter itself in any other. It admits of the utmost improvement. It is adapted to every variety of thought, and every color of imagination, every shade of fancy, every touch of feeling. It is the only style in which true eloquence can ever be attained. Indeed, naturalness and simplicity of thought, feeling and manner, is almost synonymous with eloquence. All souls are eloquent, if they could be heard. The true speaker is the natural voice in which nature pours forth the burden of her soul. The ear may be pleased, and popularity may be attained, by an artificial style. Every preacher knows, however, that popularity is not the test of truth, of power, and of divine favor. Success may be manufactured artificially; but truth, power, beauty, joy, must come according to nature, like the voice of childhood, the words of love, the wail of grief, and the carol of hope. Speak according to yourself, and all human nature, and its Comforter, the Holy Ghost, will speak through you.

"ITALY IN TRANSITION."

This is the title of Mr. Arthur's book, and it is also a correct and comprehensive description of the condition of that country, according to the very latest telegraphic dispatches. The transition has been long in progress, but it is now proceeding rapidly to completion. The revolution may be said, we think, to be triumphant.—The despotism of Naples is completely overthrown.—Garibaldi entered the city of Naples on the 8th of September without opposition from the King's army, and amid the congratulations of the population. Thus he has gained in a day, without bloodshed, more prestige and power than had resulted before from long months of hard fighting. Nothing, now, in Italy, can stand before him. In addition to this, he now has the open support of the power and arms of Sardinia. Victor Emmanuel has wisely waited until now, and now has wisely acted, in putting himself at the head of the Italian Revolution, which, even before, drew all its strength from his name. Twenty-five thousand Sardinian troops have gone to Naples "to maintain order." The States of the Church will now fall almost without a blow. Indeed, they may be said to be already fallen—or rather risen. Twenty-five thousand revolutionists have taken possession of the town of Pesaro, and captured the papal garrison. The papal garrison of Orvieto, near Rome, has likewise surrendered. Sardinian troops are pouring into the Roman States.

All Italy will now rise as one man. All that was needed to insure this was, Garibaldi's success at Naples, Victor Emmanuel's open leadership, and the assurance of Louis Napoleon's non-intervention. Of these things they now have assurance. Louis Napoleon has said that he would not interfere, except to guarantee the city of Rome to the Pope as a residence. We believe he will keep his word. Were he disposed to interfere, it is too late. He has every thing to lose and nothing to gain by intervention. If he interfere in any way, it will be by diplomacy, in the settlement of the treaties by which the new order of things must be arranged. In this way he has a right to have a voice in the settlement of the affairs of Italy. We trust he will, in this, be guided by the same enlightened policy which has marked his past wonderful career. Italy may now be regarded as free, with the exception of Venetia, where Austria has an army of 250,000 men. There hangs the darkest cloud that obscures the horizon of the revolution. Garibaldi is pledged to deliver Venetia. Victor Emmanuel, having put himself at the head of the movement, may think it prudent to prevent an attack on Venetia, and wait for it to fall into his hands by the mere moral force of the revolution. But we think the attack will be made.—Now the tide is at the flood, and all Italy, and the sanction and sympathy of the civilized world, will be on the side of Victor Emmanuel and Garibaldi. Austria is alone with her 250,000 men, and hopelessly in debt.—Though she is twice as strong in military equipments and numbers as her antagonists, she will be beaten, if there is no intervention. We trust she will be driven out of Italy now and forever.

What is to become of the Pope? His States are in rebellion. The next arrival from Europe will doubtless inform us that the revolution in the Papal States is triumphant. Lamoricere's army will be swept away as with a whirlwind, if it even make a stand. Rome itself would lead in the rebellion but for the French occupation there. Louis Napoleon leaves Lamoricere to do the best he can in the States, while he himself takes care of the city and the Pope—the nest of evil and its one egg. Rome itself, we believe, will be revolutionized, though peacefully. Its political destiny, we imagine, will not be separated from that of the rest of Italy, or at least of the Roman States; but it will be guaranteed by both Victor Emmanuel and Louis Napoleon as the residence of the Pope, who will be left without any temporal power whatever. The Pope will still be the head of the Roman Church, but his political government will cease. Antonelli and his priests will find their occupation gone. They will fill no more fat offices, and no more despoil and oppress a miserable people. Louis Napoleon is sagacious enough to see that he can support the Church, and yet have the credit of causing the greatest political abomination of the earth to cease. He knows the miseries of Rome. In his letters to the Pope he has taken good care to tell the Holy Father, and the rest of the world, all about them. They will be his future justification before the Catholic as well as the Protestant world. "Babylon is fallen!" It is something to be living at the time to see her fall. She has weakened the faith, clouded the hope, and debauched the conscience of the world, even to the centre of heathen realms.

Just before going to press, another arrival from Europe informs us that our prediction is realized—Lamoricere's army is utterly routed.

THE CHINESE "CHRISTIAN" REBELS.

One of the most interesting portions of our knowledge of China, as imparted by Dr. Charles Taylor, in his addresses and in his book, is that relative to the Great Rebellion under Tai-ping-wang. Dr. Taylor was convinced that the great christian hope of China was in the success of these rebels, and we have shared the conviction. For some years the world has almost lost sight of them, and we have vainly hoped that our missionaries there would take pains to gather information in regard to them, for publication in this country. But they are again beginning to attract attention. These immense masses of people, with their leaders, still persist in calling themselves Christians, and in exterminating idolatry wherever it prevails. They admit that they are still ignorant on the subject of Christianity. But they desire to know more, and receive Christian teachers and books with gladness. The latest intelligence from them comes from the Rev. Mr. Muirhead, of Shanghae, in a letter to the London Missionary Society. Mr. Muirhead derives his information from the American missionaries, who have just visited the rebel camp.

The missionaries informed them as to what country they belonged to; that they were preachers of the gospel, and that they came from Shanghae simply in that capacity. They were desirous, they said, to ascertain the religious sentiments of those connected with the insurrectionary movement, and did not wish to be regarded as spies or as emissaries from any foreign State. In the course of conversation the so-called rebels freely avowed themselves to be Christians—that they believe in one true God, the Heavenly Father, and in his Son Jesus Christ, the Savior of the world, and in the Holy Spirit. It was acknowledged by them that their views might not be correct in some things, considering the circumstances in which they had been placed, but still they called themselves a Christian people, and desired to be regarded as a Christian dynasty. The bearing of these Kwangsi Chiefs is said to be noble and intelligent, far superior to the race of Mandarins generally met with. They evinced neither a haughty nor overbearing manner, nor an appearance of obsequious deference to foreigners, but expressed a strong desire to cultivate friendly relations, both of a religious and commercial character. They were animated evidently by a strong faith in God as to the success of the rebellion. Of late they had been suffering from terrible calamities which, with their deliverance out of them all, they attribute solely to the intervention of their heavenly Father.

The rebels say that their first object is to gain the victory, the second to seize the plunder, and the third to destroy idolatry. As to the last, they proceed to it in a very formal manner. The King, as he is called, marches with a number of adherents to the temple, and pronounces a curse of this nature:—"In the name of God the heavenly Father, and of his Son Jesus Christ, this idol temple is devoted to destruction." Forthwith the work is begun, and the idols are thoroughly cleared. Their intention is, it appears, to destroy all the temples and pagodas, but at present their time is otherwise occupied.

As to their religious ceremonies, they have a Sabbath on the same day as ours. One of the native Christians who went with the missionary brethren, was present on the occasion of their holding worship. His account of it somewhat accords with the description given by the late Dr. Medhurst. There was a kind of offering made to God and praise was sung, but there was no preaching. Indeed, those present confessed that they were not well informed on religious matters, but their teachers at Nanking were so. They listened attentively to our views of things, and observed wherein they differed from their own. Having left Nanking very hastily, they did not bring any religious books with them, and confined themselves chiefly to several doxologies, though their public proclamations are said to contain passages from and allusions to the Holy Scriptures. They have a form of baptism which consists in washing the heart, and it would seem is administered to all their adherents. They represent Tai-ping-wang, their first leader, as still living and well at the capital. In due time they believe they will gain the whole country, and they firmly resolve to bring it under Christian instruction.

There is a universal brotherhood among them, and they regard foreigners in a similar light. There was no indication of that arrogant spirit, which they evinced in their communications to Lord Elgin and others, and while they spoke of coming down to Shanghae, they expressed a determination not to interfere with the missionaries, but only to take the native city.

POPERY AND MOHAMMEDANISM.

These two monster systems of error arose, according to the ablest writers on prophecy, at the same time, about A. D. 606. Both retained their power unbroken till the beginning of the sixteenth century. Then the sword of the Spirit inflicted upon Popery a wound from which it has never recovered; and the sword of Charles V. did the same thing for Mohammedanism. Since that period Popery has failed to establish its authority over any new territory—its missions have proved a failure; and the aggressive wars of Mohammedanism have ceased. For a long time both these great systems of error have shown unmistakable signs of internal decay. Spain, which, in the reign of Philip II., was the greatest and richest kingdom in Europe, lost the Low Countries, then lost her colonies and her wealth, and now lies in weakness and degradation, utterly unable to help the Pope in the day of his calamity. Austria, almost overwhelmed with debt, and greatly divided, can extend to "His Holiness" no assistance. Naples, and part of the Roman States, have revolted from the Papal power. The kingdom of Sardinia has risen to greatness, and has extended its protection over millions of those over whom Popery recently tyrannized. France, so far from aiding the Pope, seems intent upon humbling him. Mexico has almost annihilated itself by its incessant wars. Whether the Pope can stay much longer in Rome, and if not, whither he can go for safety, are questions not easily answered.

Meanwhile the Turkish power has continued to decay, until it is apparent to all that its days are numbered. In its increasing weakness it has gradually yielded to the [illegible] its territories, until hundreds, [illegible] tolerated Christian missionaries in hammedans have begun to read the Bible and abandon the Koran.

And now these two powers, Mohammedanism and Popery, are making apparently a last and vain struggle for life. The Pope vainly hurls his anathemas against Victor Emanuel and Garibaldi, and gathers around him Irish volunteers to save him from the wrath of his own subjects. The Turks aid the Druses in the massacre of Christians, and more than a hundred Christian villages have fallen a prey to their wrath. But the Pope will fail to defend himself with the sword; and the Turkish power will fall a victim to its inexorable barbarity.

THE LATE REV. LEWELL CAMPBELL.

Having given the "copy" of last week's Advocate to the printer, we went to the Greensburg campmeeting, in the Mississippi Conference. A painful rumor reached the camp-ground, coming originally from a servant, that Brother Campbell was dead—that he died in Bayou Sara. We all hoped it was a mistake. Soon after, brethren informed us that, a few days before, Brother Campbell was known to be quite ill in Bayou Sara. Then we feared but still hoped. Next came the Advocate, and the painful fear became a certainty. The honest and independent, the brave and strong man is no more. Under God he made himself, and next to God, he relied on himself. He was a man of convictions, and he was equally a man of action. Few men have we known who had more courage and less policy in the utterance and advocacy of simple and ingenuous convictions. He was honest and brave, and consequently strong. He was a man of strong will, and of great force of character. He was felt, in whatever relation or position. His heart was in his life—in everything he said and did. A man of quick perception and fine understanding, his judgments, nevertheless, were heart-judgments. His intuitions and instincts predominated over all logical processes and calculations. He was truly heroic in his character.—Placed in positions where this element might have been called for in its utmost strength, Lewell Campbell would have been enrolled among the world's heroes. He was a hero as it was. He was a preacher of great energy and power, and has done long and faithful service. Brave and honest-hearted old friend, farewell! God bless his family!

BISHOP PIERCE ON PACIFIC METHODISM.

Nothing has ever emanated from Bishop Pierce's pen which has pleased us more than the letter, in this paper, on Pacific Methodism. We confess to have suffered no inconsiderable degree of grief at hearing from him, when on his way to California, expressions of doubt as to the propriety of continuing our organization there. His letter is a candid acknowledgement of his previous misgivings, and an equally candid acknowledgment of their entire removal by personal observation. For ourselves, we have always held and advocated the position the Bishop now occupies, without regard to any facts whatsoever—a priori. The time has been, we believe, when, in the Texas Advocate, we were alone in support of this position, in all our journalism. We are rejoiced to find that Bishop Pierce is equally satisfied, with our other Bishops who have visited the Pacific, of the permanence of the Southern Church there, and that he is encouraged to prosecute the work vigorously. There is great wisdom in his determination to send none but strong men to that coast. If we cannot send men of that class, we had better let our Pacific brethren rear their own preachers. Weak men will only burden them.—Who will go? Let the Bishops choose their men, and let none chosen decline. That is the only way to solve the question. The volunteer system will never do to depend upon.

We call attention, also, to the Bishop's remarks about "our caudal appendage." Let us cut it off. Some recent political objections to its removal demonstrate the necessity of speedy action—at next General Conference.

AUTHORS AND BOOKS.

Messrs. Sheldon & Co., of New York, have just published the "Life of George Washington," by the Hon. Edward Everett. Mr. E. contributed this biography to the new edition of the Encyclopedia Brittannica—at the suggestion, I believe, of Lord Macaulay. Besides the life, there is an appendix containing a paper on the disease of which Washington died, by Dr. James Jackson, of Boston; the official inventory of Washington's personal estate; and the Will of Mrs. Washington, documents never before published.

Mr. Everett, in his preface, apologizes for certain points and qualities of the work. He does not apologize for the piece of very bad taste in which he has permitted his publishers to indulge—for I don't believe he himself is capable of originating such a blunder. This is the publishing of a life of Washington, and prefixing, to it a portrait of ——— Mr. Everett! Publishers—as a friend of mine once remarked—are a very curious kind of people.

A history of the Electric Telegraph ought to be, on the face of it, a very prosy book. Mr. George Prescott, however, has made his subject and his book most interesting. It abounds in anecdotes, and good ones. Of "scripture" messages there are two instances so good that I must quote them here:

"A lady in a neighboring city, desirous of ascertaining when her husband would return home, sent him a message making the inquiry, to which he responded that important business detained him, and that he could not leave for some days. The lady immediately replied by sending him another dispatch in the following laconic manner: "At Home, August 12, 1859. To F. C. P.—Dispatch received. Deuteronomy 24: 5. (Signed) Kate." The gentleman to whom the dispatch was addressed, upon referring to the passage in the Scriptures alluded to, obtained the following suggestive epistle: "When a man hath taken a new wife he shall not go out to war, neither shall he be charged with any business; but he shall be free at home one year, and shall cheer up his wife which he hath taken."

Equally good was the reply sent to a person in a distant city, who, having committed some offence against the laws, and run away, was desirous of ascertaining if it would be prudent for him to return. He therefore telegraphed in the following laconic style: "New York, July 4, 1859. To B. C. M———, Philadelphia. Is everything O K?" D. T. M." To which he obtained the following brief reply: "Philadelphia, July 4, 1859. To D. T. M———, New York. Proverbs, chap. 27: 12. B. C. M." Upon reference to the passage indicated, the inquiring individual obtained the following valuable advice, which, it is to be presumed, he followed: "A prudent man foreseeth the evil and hideth himself, but the simple pass on and are punished!" Which seems to show that thieves even know something of the Bible. I believe Scripture citations are now counted among cyphers, and charged double prices; which has checked that species of the brevity which is said to be the soul of wit. It is a question, when the telegraph becomes a more every-day and common medium of communication, what will be the effect of its prices in promoting shortness of speech. It has not had much effect yet upon our congressmen—but then they don't pay for the telegraphic reports. Probably it would help Congress much, if our great Dailies, which now so expensively foster the vice of verbosity, would combine to report only, "Congress this day did nothing;" or "Congress this day merely twaddled," and I dare say to that it will come yet. Literal reports are being run into the ground; nobody reads them, except perhaps the members themselves—and I must say that if they read much of that kind of stuff, I don't wonder at their dullness.

Perhaps in the year 2000, members of Congress will stay quietly at home, and merely send on their votes by telegraph. This at any rate will relieve forgiversating members from the necessity of rising to define their position, and giving a reason for an unreasonable vote. It is to be hoped that by that time telegraphing will be send out a cheer over the wires, [illegible] Senator may course, a sarcastic member of the opposition would be likely to respond with a hiss. But cheers and hisses should be sent private expense.

I have read somewhere that Lord Clyde, sending news home of his successful siege, merely telegraphed, "I am in luck now," which beats Cæsars famous "Veni, vidi, vici",—and Commodore Perry's, "We have met the enemy, and they are ours;" but is not quite equal to Sir Charles Napier's witty dispatch, conveying the result of the battle of Maance, which had only a single word, "Peccavi," that is, "I have sinned" (Scinde).

One of the neatest and most valuable of the reprints of old and standard works chiefly affected by book-lovers, and for which Mr. Perry Barnham, of Boston, an old bookseller and lover himself, has put us all under obligations, is a fine edition of the elder D'Israeli's "Curiosities of Literature." To this new edition of one of the most delightful old books in the language, the younger D'Israeli has prefixed an interesting sketch of his father, for whom every reader of the book has, I hope, a genuine fondness; I have at all events. He says:—

"D'Israeli was fair, with a Bourbon nose, and brown eyes of extraordinary beauty and lustre. He wore a small black velvet cap, but his white hair latterly touched his shoulders in curls almost as flowing as in his boyhood. His extremities were delicate and well formed, and his leg, at his last hour, as shapely as in his youth, which showed the vigor of his frame. Latterly he had become corpulent. He did not excel in conversation, though in his domestic circle he was garrulous. Everything interested him, and blind, and eighty-two, he was still as susceptible as a child. One of his last acts was to compose some verses of gay gratitude to his daughter-in-law, who was his London correspondent, and to whose lively pen his last years were indebted for constant amusement. He had by nature a singular volubility, which never deserted him. His feelings, though always amiable, were not painfully deep, and amid joy or sorrow, the philosophic vein was ever evident. He more resembled Goldsmith than any man that I can compare him to; in his conversation his apparent confusion of ideas ending with some felicitous phrase of genius, his naivete, his simplicity not untouched with a dash of sarcasm affecting innocence—one was often reminded of the gifted and interesting friend of Burke and Johnson. There was, however, one trait in which my father did not resemble Goldsmith—he had no vanity. Indeed, one of his few infirmities was rather a deficiency of self-esteem."

One of the signs of the increasing wealth of this country, is the great increase in the number of valuable books (mostly scarce historical pamphlets, and fac-similes of very rare works), printed at private presses, and for private circulation.

The Seventy-six Club, the Bradford Club, Mr. J. Munsell of Albany (N. Y.), Mr. James Lenox of New York, Mr. James Carson Brevoort and Mr. H. C. Murphy of Brooklyn, Mr. Riggs of Washington and Mr. J. Wimberley Jones of Georgia, have all printed impressions of valuable historical documents, in the highest style of the typographical art, and confined to a small number of copies for distribution among their friends and public institutions. Mr. C. B. Richardson is now printing on large paper fifty copies of Bancroft's History, and 100 copies of the Private Diaries of Washington, from October, 1789, to June, 1792. A still more important work of the same publisher, is fifty copies of an exact reprint of the Bay Psalm Book, the first work printed within the limits of the United States. Four copies of the original edition, printed by Stephen Daye at Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1640, are all that are known to exist, and one of these was recently sold for $786. Prince, the antiquarian and chronicler of New England, thus speaks of the books: "By 1636 there were come over thither near thirty learned and pious ministers, educated in their universities of England, and, from the same exalted principles of scripture purity in religious worship, they set themselves to translate the Psalms, and other Scripture Songs, into English meter, as near as possible to the inspired original. They committed this work especially to the charge of Rev Mr Weld, and the Rev. John Elliot of Roxbury, well acquainted with the Hebrew, and the Greek also. They finished the Psalms in 1640, which were first printed by Mr. Daye in that year, and had the honor of being the first work printed in North America."

"The Character of Christ" is the title of a small and elegantly-printed volume about to be published by C. Scribner, from the pen of Dr. Horace Bushnell. It forms a portion of his "Nature and the Supernatural," but is a complete treatise in itself.

A substantial new work on "Christian Nurture," by Dr. Bushnell, will also shortly appear, his former book on that subject being so much altered and enlarged as to bear little resemblance to the forthcoming treatise.

Smith, English & Co. have got out a translation from the German, by D. W. Simon, of Hengstenberg's "Commentary on Ecclesiastes, with other Treatises." The treatises include a Prolegomena to the Song of Solomon and lectures on the Book of Job, the prophet Isaiah, the Sacrifices of Holy Scripture, and the Jews and the Christian Church, to all of which there are three separate indexes.

Robert Carter & Brothers have published "An Exposition of the Book of Ecclesiastes," by the Rev Charles Bridges, M.A., rector of Hinton Martell, Dorset, author of an "Exposition of Psalm cxix.," "Commentary on Proverbs," etc.

Messrs. Appletons announce "Sunday, its origin, history, and present obligations considered, by Rev. Dr. Hessey." And Messrs. Gould & Lincoln have in press "The Pulpit of the Revolution; or, the Political Sermons of the Period of 1776: with a Historical Introduction, Notes, and Illustrations, by John Wingate Thornton." The same publishers have just issued Sir William Hamilton's Lectures on Logic, the concluding volume of his logical and metaphysical series—works which, in this department, are confessedly among the most learned and exhaustive discussions in the English language. A third volume, in this class, Mansel's "Metaphysics, or the Philosophy of Consciousness, Phenomenal and Real," is also announced as in press. "The Limits of Religious Thought," by the same author, it will be recollected was published a few months since, and attracted no little attention. The fact, that works of this character are so well received as to encourage and warrant their publication, speaks well for the progress of thorough intellectual culture in our own country. Messrs. Gould & Lincoln have also now ready, for the autumn trade and the holidays, a new and superb edition of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, with numerous elegant illustrations, printed on tinted paper, in a style fully equal to that of the best English works, and bound in various durable and ornamental styles. The third and concluding volume of Mr. Hopkins' "Puritans" is in preparation, and will be issued at an early day; while Prof. Masson is engaged with the continuation of his learned and elaborate "Life and Times of John Milton."

Messrs. Appletons, who are the publishers of Buckle's notorious "History of Civilization," have in press the second volume of that work, and also a reply to Darwin. They also are about publish, "Species not Transmutable," by Dr. Reci. They announce also, Curiosities of Civilization, by Dr. Wynter; Everybody's Book, by John Henry Freese; Historical and Chronological Encyclopædia; Stepping Stone to Knowledge; The Dead Shot, or Sportsman's Complete Guide.

Messrs. Harper & Bros. have in preparation a new series of children's books, a department which they have so excelled in that it has become almost exclusively their own. This series will include a volume on Quadrupeds, one on Birds, and a book of Bible stories, all with illustrations such as only the Harpers get up. They have also in press, "Ben Franklin, the Printer's Boy," by Henry Mayhew; a new Translation of Homer's Odyssey, (for their "New Classical Library") and Herodotus, and the second volume of Euripides, in their neat pocket ant-Book [illegible] one an' [illegible] Tweta. Books whose pleasdays, when we could really have something to do with such volumes. They have just published a charming little book by Prof. Farraday, entitled, "Lectures on the Physical Forces." These were delivered originally to children,—but are the pleasantest, easiest, and most delightful reading, for tolerably ignorant old folks, that ever I tried. For this I vouch, personally.

To Harper's magazine for October Bayard Taylor contributes a charming poem, "The Quaker Widow;" Mr. Manton Marble a second portion of his Red River Experiences; Dr. A. H. Guernsey an excellent paper on "the Amoor and the Steppes;" Mrs. Bradley a Virginia story, the Pearl Ring; A. Oakey Hall, once our N. Y. District Attorney, an account of "a Dinner at the Mayor's," where Bancroft, Irving, Gen. Scott, and others of equal fame were gathered; Geo. Arnold a story called "Two against One; Ruth Harper a story, "Epping;" T. S. Arthur a story, "Up Higher;" and W. Gilmore Simms a ballad of King's Mountain." Ruskin's "Unto this Last," Thackeray's Four Georges, an illustrated paper on a Journey to the Land of the Moon, and several other stories make up the varied table of contents.

In the Atlantic, the paper on "Some of the Haunts of Burns," is by Hawthorne; "Darwin and his Reviewers" is by Prof. Guy of Boston; "A Modern Cinderella" is by Miss Rose Terry; "The Old Days and the New" is by Whittier; "Icarus," is by Longfellow; "Theodore Parker" is by his friend, the Rev. Tunmas Wentworth Higginson; "The Election in November" is by the Editor, Prof. Lowell.

FOOTPRINTS ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

NUMBER XIV.

A confession.—Three conclusions.—Good effect produced by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.—Our cognomen.—Reinforcements needed.—Strong men wanted.

It will be well to begin this letter with a confession. Before going to California I had doubts as to the propriety of our organization as a Church in that country. For reasons not necessary to mention, I was skeptical as to our ultimate success. Many sober brethren urged me to go on, wind up the Conference, and send the preachers to more promising fields. Some old ministers, and some lay brethren made statistical calculations, and tried to show me that the Church was wasting men and money on an impracticable enterprise.

Many of our people took, and, perhaps, still maintain the preposterous idea, that the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, ought to be restricted to the slave States. With this notion I never had any sympathy. I repudiate it as unworthy of the Church, contrary to the genius of the gospel, hostile to the very mission of Christianity, which is a religion for all people. Our position is, beyond all controversy, scriptural. We render to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things which are God's. There is nothing in our doctrines, discipline or policy, or spirit or usage, which limits or restrains our movement. The world is our parish; and I hope the day will come when we shall be numerously represented in every State and Territory of the American continent, in every nation and province, every continent and island of this round earth.

Nevertheless, I had thought that we might, perhaps, do better elsewhere than in California. With this idea in my mind, I began my labors and observations on the Pacific coast. I visited all the chief towns, traveled through the country, preached on the highways and byways, conversed with the leading men of the State, mingled with the multitude, compared Church statistics, and, I think, reasoned fairly upon all I saw and heard, and came deliberately to the following conclusions:

1. That the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was a necessity and a blessing in California.

2. That the Pacific ought to be vigorously maintained by means and men.

3. That if our Church authorities would send strong, wise, experienced ministers there, the M. E. Church, South, in five years would outnumber all other denominations combined. The Church, North, would rival us in the cities and in the mines: in the rural districts we should soon count five to their one, and in a short time, as far as Methodism is concerned, would be well-nigh the sole occupants of the land. I put these opinions on record here. Time will test their soundness.

Our mere presence, to say nothing of our example, has been a restraint upon the fanaticism of the Northern Methodist preachers. They have been forced, by the presence of a public sentiment which we helped to form and to strengthen, into at least a quasi-conservatism. The tongue of denunciation has been bridled; and lips used to political harangues have been constrained to preach the gospel. We have done them service which they are not likely to acknowledge, and for which they are not as thankful and as loving as they ought to be. They are unfriendly, alienated, cherish no fraternal regard for us. This is sad. Ought not to be so. There is no good reason for it. The policy and spirit of our Church is peace with all men. We have no time to quarrel, and have no heart for it. Amid many provocations, our editors and preachers have been silent. They are doing a great work, and cannot come down to debate slavery, or wrangle about politics. May they continue in well doing.

Had very little intercourse with the Northern preachers. I met my own friend, Rev. Jesse T. Peck, D.D., and two or three others. These were all polite and kind. With Dr. P. I had several pleasant interviews. We talked over Church matters and differences with great plainness of speech, but with a Christian spirit. Of course I was not invited to preach in a Northern Methodist Church. Yet, on the request of friends, I was allowed to preach in one, and the pastor treated me courteously and Christianly. This antagonism of ecclesiastical organizations is unfortunate. By building on the foundation of Christ, and the apostles, (as the Church, South, has done,) to the exclusion of all that is secular and political, we might yet harmonize and be one. Is this in likely result? I fear not. While we hold to the Bible, and Christ the Head, we can not, dare not change our position; the North, deluded by a false idea, will not change. So we must leave them, with Reuben and Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, on this side of Jordan, while we go up to possess the land.

The word "South" is very much in our way, just because it has a sectional sound. Many who approve our position and policy are hindered from coming to us because of that appendage to our name. It does us no good anywhere, and is turned against us by those who seek occasion to find fault, and is objected to by many who could come to us if it were removed.

In view of probable changes, and of our duty to carry the gospel to every creature as far as we may, the cognomen of the Church is of great importance. As it is, it has to be explained; and when the explanation is given, we only account for its origin, without a word for its intrinsic propriety. Seeking a title that would be distinctive, we have furnished an argument to our foes, and limited by name a Church that ought to be universal. Thus many think and speak. The objection is plausible, if not real. In either case we should "cut off occasion from them that desire occasion." We are free, in fact, to go any where; and, where we go, we ought not to defeat ourselves by holding on to an expletive word. For one, I am in favor of extending our Church over the whole country. It would be a blessing to the nation. The Methodism of the South everywhere would be a refuge, a haven to the conservative from the storms that agitate and threaten to uproot and tear down the sanctified institutions of our ecclesiastical fathers. At any rate, I go for maintaining, and largely reinforcing our organization in California. It is a solemn duty to God and the country. We must send more preachers, needs help, deserves it, is suffering for the want of it. We have a Conference there of sixty old preachers, but they are mostly young men without experience, and not adapted to portions of the work. I mean them no disrespect by the remark, for in my soul I honor them for their work's sake. They are heroes; bold, fearless, self-denying men, who do not count their lives dear, if they may but honor Christ and save souls. Many of them perform labors, submit to inconveniences, not only without murmuring, but with a cheerful spirit, which would locate half the preachers in the East, and justify them well nigh with the other half. Of these things I will write in another letter.

But to show that our Church is a plant with a living root in California, let it be remembered that the State is only ten years old, that society has been unsettled, and that houses had to be built, farms enclosed, and the people to fix themselves for living; and yet there we have regular stations, good churches, good, parsonages, well-organized circuits and districts, and more circuit-parsonages than can be found in one half of the old Conferences. We have schools, and will soon have a college built and endowed by the liberality of the people. We are not intruders on "free soil," as some think, nor yet merely welcome guests, but accredited ministers and members of the Church of God, part and parcel of a great and rising State, doing good, and laying the foundation of greater usefulness in the future. The people of California are able and willing to sustain their preachers. They do not ask the East for missionary money, but for strong, holy men. The appropriation last year was not large, and the most of that was applied to Oregon, an entirely new field. Take any one of the Eastern Conferences, strip them of their leading men, and leave them dependent on their probationers for a supply, and how would they fare? California has her cities and towns, intelligent circuit-people, people used to the best preaching in the old States, and they need it now, and beg us to send them the men. To confirm the statement I am making, and to furnish an appeal to the Conferences, I insert a sentence or two from a private letter, urging me to send them help:

"I know you will if you can. If you cannot, God have mercy on those eloquent men who preach and speak for missions, who glorify the itinerancy, and profess so much love for Southern Methodism, and yet complacently look on, and see our Church here suffer for lack of service they might render, and allow us to destroy ourselves in the endeavor to do that which is beyond our strength. San Francisco requires the service of one of our strongest and most devoted men."

Now, brethren, read, mark, and inwardly digest that sentence. Where is that "strong, devoted man?" One is not enough: we must have "several of that description." San Francisco, Sacramento, San Jose, Bascom Institute, and the Pacific Methodist College, all need help. Some young men of two or three years' experience are desired. The Conferences are at hand. I appeal to the Bishops for help. I appeal to the preachers; some of them ought to go: in the name of the Lord, and of Methodism, I say it, they must go. The Church is committed to the work; souls will perish if we decline. Why are brethren reluctant? What do they fear? The long land travel? It is a trifle. The writer stood it, and had a chill every day. A well man need not dread it. A trip by sea? Hundreds go each way, semi-monthly, for mammon—shall a Christian minister falter? The work is pleasant, the pay is good, the climate fine, the people waiting to hear: why tarry ye? Why? Hark! If any man love houses, or land, or father, or mother, or ease, more than Christ, he cannot be a disciple. More anon.

CONFERENCE STATISTICS.

The presiding elders nnd preachers in charge of circuits, stntions, and missions, in the several Conferences, are requested to be punctual and prompt in complying with the requisitions of the Discipline in regnrd to statistics. See Dis. pp. 59, 70. Also the Secretaries of Conferences. See Dis. pp. 49–54. The Book Editor hopes full and correct returns will be made without delay, for the General Minutes. If a preacher fails to attend the session of the Conference, let the Presiding Elder be sure to report for him. Be careful to report exactly in accordance with the requirements of the Discipline nnd the form of the General Minutes—a copy of which should be in every preacher's possession.

Other Church papers will confer a favor by copying this communication.

LETTER FROM BISHOP ANDREW.

I hnve had numerous responses to my call for Central America, and am glnd to have this proof that there is abundance of the missionary spirit nmong the preachers. I think that I have received at least a dozen offers of missionary service, and I should probnbly huve accepted some of them before now, but that just at this time I have been compelled to pause in my course by the grave nnnouncement that the Treasury is empty, with a very dull prospect of being soon replenished. Under these circumstances, I have not felt at liberty to increase at present the drafts on the Treasury. As soon as the liberality of the Church shall place the means at my disposal, I shall probably proceed to enrry out at once my original design; till then I can do nothing. In the meantime it may be proper to give a few items of information. First, let every brother who offers for this work, obtain a recommendation from his P. E., and some four or five leading ministers of his Conference who nre acquainted with him, testifying as to his character and fitness for the work. This I shall regard as indispensable, unless in cases where I nm intimately acquainted personally with the preacher.

Or if your Conference should hold its session in the meanwhile, get the proper testimonial from that body, with the signature of the President nnd Secretary. Take notice, secondly, that we nre calling only for preachers and their families; we are not at present prepared to send out physicians or teachers. If, hereafter, when the preacher shall have reached his field of lnbor, it shall be deemed proper to send teachers to nid him, why then we shall not. Some brethren have offered to go as teachers, and as physicians; to all such we say, we highly appreciate the motives which have prompted the offer, but nre not at present prepared to accept it. Some brother wishes a description of the country nbout Bogota. We refer all such inquiries to Dr. J. Hamilton, Mobile, Ala., who is prepared to give all needed information on the subject. And now we close by saying that we rejoice in the proof afforded that the spirit of missions is so strong among the preachers, and we hope that the Church will rouse herself to the work, and afford us the needed means, that we may very soon be able to occupy all the fields which are open to us.

JAMES O. ANDREW.

P.S.—We ask all our Church papers to give this an early insertion.

Summerfield, Sept. 22d, 1860.

LETTER FROM DR. SUMMERS.

MR. EDITOR:—I made a visit on yesterday to Bishop Soule, You know he lives seven miles from the city, on the Gallatin Turnpike. I found the venerable patriarch quite as you would expect to find an octogenarian, who has seen so much hard service as our senior Bishop. He showed me the apple trees covered with both fruit and blossoms, and the peach trees, which he had planted with his own hands, some of them exhibiting small ripe peaches, the third growth of this year! He takes great pleasure in horticulture, and finds in it a beautiful recreation. But "he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, nnd the shouting; he paweth in the valley;" alas! that we cannot add, "and rejoiceth in his strength; he goeth on to meet the armed men." He deeply regrets that he could not visit California—whose interests he has greatly at heart—to preside in the Pacific Conference, and to encourage and counsel our brethren in that frontier and important region. He has it in contemplation, however, if his health nnd strength do not fail, to visit the Louisville, Tennessee, and Alabama Conferences—these being comparatively easy of access. He takes great interest in all the movements of the Church. He is deeply distressed at the schismatical proceedings of the Northern General Conference, and is painfully anxious in regard to the results. He is too nearly identified with the origines of our common Methodism not to deplore the sad developments of these latter days. It is melancholy to reflect that the prophetic picture was not drawn for him, to cheer his declining life: "Thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; not one of the sticks thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken. But there the glorious land will be unto us a place of broad rivers and streams, wherein shall go no galley with oars, neither shall gallant ship pass thereby."

Instead of such enchanting scenes of peace and prosperity, scenes of painful and threatening intestine embroilment are evolving with boding rapidity—a gloomy spectacle on which our venerable fathers are to cast their dying eyes.

However, blessed be God! the sky is not all gloom. With one or two painful exceptions, we have peace in our Southern borders, and some prosperity. We hear of refreshing seasons from the presence of the Lord in many places. Nashville and its vicinity have been favored with some "showers of blessings." A hundred or more persons have recently joined the Andrew station; and there have been considerable additions to Mulberry-street, McKendree, Claiborne, and Edgefield. The Tulip-street Church (alias Russell-street Church), Edgefield, was opened last Sunday for divine worship, in the basement. It is a neat and commodious structure, located in a beautiful grove, in the centre of a growing community. A special meeting is now in successful progress in this church.

"Pray for the peace of Jerusalem: they shall prosper that love thee."

EAST ALABAMA MALE COLLEGE.

We nre informed by reliable correspondents that this institution has opened with a larger number of students than ever. Its prosperity is regarded as permanent. And the best of all is, it is sharing in the glorious revival now in progress in Auburn, Ala. About seventy have joined the Church, many of them students in the college. Several of the young men indicate that they feel called of God to preach the gospel. We know of nothing more hopeful, in all our Connection, than the indications that our Christian Colleges are going to be the nurseries of the Christian Ministry. God increase their power and usefulness in this regard. East Alabama Male College has commenced its career in such a manner as to satisfy the desire and command the confidence of the Church. It is a noble monument of Methodist progress, and an earnest of her future glory.

See Law Card of J. C. & T. H. Lewis in another column.

REVIVALS.

The revivals continue, nnd spread, and deepen. Rev. J. J. Mills ups writes us that 15 were converted nnd 12 added to the Church at a protracted meeting at Starkville, Miss. Con. The brethren were abundantly blessed.

Rev. John A. Vance writes that Philadelphia circuit, Miss. Con., is highly prosperous; 200 have been received into the Church on probation, and 30 by letter. Gracious times are expected at coming protracted meetings. Bro. Vance is greatly encouraged. The Lord give him success.

Rev. T. J. Upton writes from Bells, La., giving information of the meeting at that place, in addition to that published last week—53 added to the Church. Many brethren of the Louisiana and Mississippi Conferences assisted. At the quarterly meeting at Midway, 16 were added to the Church. About 110 have been added to the Church on the circuit this year. The Lord bless the Louisiana and Mississippi preachers; they are working hard nnd receiving wages.

Rev. J. L. Wright writes us of a glorious meeting at Bastrop, La. Con.—36 added to the Church and over 20 converted. The revival is spreading all over that country.

Rev. Anson West writes that on Tallassee circuit, Ala. Con., they have had protracted meetings at Oak Valley, Tallassee, Salem, and China Grove, resulting in 41 conversions and 86 additions to the Church. We know something of that country, and this news makes us feel glad.

Rev. T. J. Lacy still sends good news from Winnsboro circuit, La. Con. A gracious meeting in Ward's Bend, on Bayou Macon, resulted in 24 additions to the Church. The Lord has greatly blessed Bro. Lacy this year.

Rev. A. B. Nicholson sends more good news from Brandon circuit, Miss. Con. A recent meeting at Wesleyan Church resulted in 37 additions to the Church. The conversions were numerous. At one time, 20 were converted apparently together. Over 200 have joined during the year.

BEEN TO CAMP-MEETING.

It was near Greensburg, La., in the bounds of the Mississippi Conference. It was a camp-meeting of the old fashion. No parade, no ostentation, no extravagant preparations; but plenty of substantial comfort. It was conducted by an old-fashioned presiding elder, Rev. Barnabas Pipkin, who has been preaching the gospel in that country for thirty years. All the preaching was old-fashioned, earnest, powerful, awakening, soul-saving, gospel preaching. And we had an old-fashioned revival, old-fashioned conversions, and old-fashioned singing, praying, and shouting. It was a glorious time. Over sixty whites, and about the same number of blacks, joined the Church. And there were about as many conversions as additions to the Church. The congregations were very large, and the order was excellent. The unreligious young men of the vicinity acted as the police on the occasion, and a most efficient police it was. The people went out in companies to pray in the woods, and many were blessed there. An ingathering of 120 at one camp-meeting sounds like the early days. It is not necessary to name the preachers who were there; there were many, and it was a happy reunion. The preachers' tent was a pleasant place—for everything but sleeping; could not sleep for talking. May there be many such camp-meetings.

We have heard, since, that near 200 had joined the Church.

MISSOURI MISSION CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: The Mission Conference commenced its session here last Wednesday. Bishop Kavanaugh presided.—The business of the Conference is progressing in about the usual way.

St. Charles is a handsome town on the left side of the angry Missouri, only about twenty miles from St. Louis, containing about four thousand inhabitants, and is evidently new in the course of its second growth.

I have attended, in the last few years, about twenty Conferences, and if I have met a better body of ministry, to all appearance, so far as I am able to judge from a short acquaintance, than those I am now with, I am not aware of it. As a whole, they present a better appearance, and higher order of talent and refinement, than I had reason to look for. Their unity of feeling, purpose, and sentiment, and their love of each other, is of the old-fashioned Methodist preacher stamp.

The Church in the Missouri Conference is in a better spiritual condition than it has been for many years—probably the unity of the Spirit, growth of grace, and genuine revival progress, is more healthful than at any former period in the history of the Church in this quarter. Exclusive Northernism is decidedly on the wane in North Missouri. The Methodism of the Southern Church is sufficiently methodical and genuine for the people in this region. An exclusive Northern organization is seen to differ from common Missouri Methodism only in this, that they have the "everlasting question" always rife, and always angry, always turbulent, and always restless and rampant; and as these things are not seen to be conducive to the growth of piety, the people are fast indicating the inutility of the farther continuance of this Northern new-light Methodism amongst them.

The drouth in Missouri has been severe, and as a consequence finances are generally not in a flourishing condition. I am informed that Missionary collections are ranging low. But still, notwithstanding these disadvantages, the agent of the St. Louis Depository has been doing a good and profitable work the present year. His subscriptions in cash and good notes due in the course of one and two years, is twenty thousand dollars,—a trifle more or less. The Conference Depository system is popular, and is working well in all parts of the Church.—Not many years hence, and we will have Conference Depositories, if we manage well, in healthful operation all over the Church.

In education they are doing well in this Conference. They are entering a strong educational force at Fayette, Mo., in central and favorable point. Rev. Dr. W. H. Anderson goes there to take charge of the Central College. He is one of the most accomplished educators in the South.

Death has not visited this Conference for four years, until the last few weeks, and then it was under most extraordinary circumstances. The oldest member of the Conference, brother B. S. Ashby, died at the very altar of God, and in the very act of praying in the congregation, while conducting public worship. He was well when he knelt down to pray, and when half way through he faltered, became obstructed in his speech, fell into the arms of brother Cayles, who was present—and died. What a happy and valuable death!

This Conference is well supplied with ministerial help. The number offering to the Conference is quite as great as the Conference has room for. Some of them will go farther South.

R. ABNEY.

WONDERFUL ACCESSION TO THE MINISTRY.—At the late British Methodist Conference, there were one hundred and thirty-nine applications for reception into the ministry. They were of a most promising character, and all except twenty were received. This denotes unusual prosperity.

GROWTH OF THE IRISH CONFERENCE.—The late Irish Methodist Conference reported the largest accessions to the church which have occurred for the last twenty years.

MR. ARTHUR'S BOOK ON ITALY.

Rev. William Arthur is very well known in this country as a Wesleyan minister—as a delegate of the British Conference to the Northern Methodist General Conference at Indianapolis, in 1856—and as the author of the "Tongue of Fire," a powerful and spiritual work. Many books are powerful, few are spiritual—still fewer are spiritual and powerful at the same time. Mr. Arthur had fame, therefore, before this book was mentioned. It will not detract from that fame. There is no remarkable genius in it. It is a truthful and interesting description of Italy at the present time. Any such description at the present time is interesting. Mr. Arthur's book derives its value from its opportuneness. Recent events have also contributed to its value. Its predictions have been fulfilled. It is in harmony with the present state of Italy. It is very readable indeed. It gives a near view of political Romanism, without any of the dazzle of romance, and poetry, and art, so common in such works. It ought to be universally read in this country.

LITERARY NOTICES.

LADIES' REPOSITORY.—The October number of this excellent monthly of the Northern Methodist Church is equal to any number we have seen. It has a large circulation, is edited with great taste, and is very complete in its arrangement.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW of the Southern Methodist Church, for October, the close of the volume of 1860, is on our table, but we have not time to review it, or even to "notice" as it deserves. We reserve it for a future paper. It is a charming number.

CHAPTERS ON WIVES is the title of a work by Mrs. Ellis, author of "Mothers of Great Men," published by Harper and Brothers. Every wife, especially every young one, ought to read it. And so ought every young woman who expects to become a wife. It comprises five stories, especially intended to represent and advocate the wifely virtues.

MISSISSIPPI HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

TO THE MEMBERS AND DELEGATES OF THE MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE:

DEAR BRETHREN—The ravages of death among our fathers in the ministry during the present Conference year, forcibly impresses the importance of taking steps at our approaching annual session to establish a Historical Society, before the last link is cut which binds us to the past. Soon no one will remain to tell the story of the early trials and triumphs of Methodism in our Conference. Bro. Jones interests and thrills us weekly with the theme; but his pen will soon be still, and none charged with the preservation of his papers, they will be forgotten. Brethren, let us have a Historical Society in our Conference organized at our next meeting.

I would suggest, in addition to the ordinary business of such societies, we take in hand the duty (assigned in some Conferences to a monumental committee) of securing suitable monuments to the memory of such men as Winans, Drake, and others whose virtues, characters and services, endear them to the Church, and designate them as models for younger ministers. I do not mean to erect marble columns, with epitaphs, to be seen by a few who may chance to pass the sacred resting place of the dead. That I think more befitting kindred and friends, whose taste should give law in all such matters. I would have a painting, by the best artist that can be employed, giving life and character true to the original, impressing the beholder with some prominent characteristics of the man. Thus, he being dead shall yet speak, and the name of the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance. Services would entitle him to a niche in this temple but has some friend or friends in the Conference, rich and liberal men, who would be glad to offer the desired painting as a token of sanctified regard. Or if none is offered, an annual contribution of $1 per member would secure them.

They can be kept by the Secretary of the Society in some public place, in a central position, say the Depository in Vicksburg—or in Jackson—or any where designated by the Society, where their library, records, papers, etc., are kept.

I hope these suggestions may be carefully considered, and that other brethren may favor us with their views on the subject, through the Advocate, before Conference.

W. L. BARTON.

A NEW BOOK.

TO THE PREACHERS OF THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE, AND TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:

DEAR BRETHREN—Many of you are aware that the undersigned has been preparing a book styled, "An Exposition of the Pretensions of Baptists to Antiquity." The writer takes this method of informing you that the work is in press, and will be ready for sale, by the time you can send your orders to Nashville, Tennessee, Methodist Publishing House.

Will you please aid in its circulation? If you will, we will guarantee you will not regret it. "Desperate diseases," it is said, "sometimes require desperate remedies." One preacher, upon hearing a part of the manuscript read, said, "Put me down one hundred copies."—Well, we have it down, and he will soon get them, and circulate them, too.

The work will aid you in meeting those who are ever seeking, in all parts of our country, to make people believe that they, and they only, are the true Church of God, in regular succession from John the Baptist.

The work was written more especially for the common people, but we would not be surprised if others will be greatly benefited by it.

If the preachers of the Enfanla District will send me their orders, I will fill them, here.

JAMES A. CLEMENT.

Glennville Alabama, September 11th, 1860.

DEAN MILMAN'S HISTORY OF LATIN CHRISTIANITY.—Messrs. Sheldon & Company of New York have this able work in press, and were to commence publishing it on the 1st of October. Their edition will be a reprint of the last London edition, equalling it in typography, and surpassing it in form, at about half of the price. The work is recommended in the most decided terms by the Edinburgh, North British, and London Reviews. "No writer of our time," says the Edinburgh, "could delineate the several phases of Christian history with greater brilliancy and animation, or with sounder judgment and more solid learning." The work will be issued in eight volumes crown octavo in size, of which one volume will be issued every month, till completed.—Price, $1 50 per volume, in cloth; $2 in sheep.—The reader will find extracts from the Introduction on the first page of this paper.

DO YOU WISH IT?—We have been asked if the Advocate is to be enlarged at the beginning of the next year. If our friends enable us to do it, yes. If they respond to the appeal of last week, they will enable us to do it. If they wish the paper enlarged, they will respond. Do they wish it? We do, and we trust they do. Let us have a general and vigorous response, in the payment of accounts, and in large lists of new subscribers.

DR. MYERS.—We regret to learn that our brother editor at Charleston, as well as our other brethren there, have been afflicted during the past month with sickness. We are glad to hear that they are all recovering, however.

REV. MR. BEWLEY.

A frontier correspondent, says the Texas Herald, in whom we place complete reliance, writes: "I have the facts in relation to Rev. Mr. Bewley, of Fort Worth notoriety. He was neither tried nor hung. He prudently left at the commencement at the 'excitement.' The northern religious press will be sorry to learn that this imaginary, but no less prolific theme of "shrieking" editorials is suspended. One of the northern editors has in his last a Bewley article of several columns, addressed to President Buchanan; all the others have "put on" in a conveniently notorious manner, and acted out—as from the long practice of the performers might have been expected—in the most alarming convulsive style of the art.

SUNDAY FESTIVITIES AT MILTON, FLA.—A correspondent sends us a glowing account of the delightful celebration and pic nic at Milton, the first on Sept 2d, and the second on the Wednesday following. The Methodist Sunday School embraces about one hundred children; these were joined by the other Sunday Schools and the citizens; and processions, singing, speaking, praying, feasting, with young and old in holiday attire and spirit, were the order of the day. Well done for Milton!

DEATH OF MR. STITT.—The Southern Methodist Publishing House at Nashville has suffered a great loss in the death of its superintendent, Mr. A. A. Stitt. The General Conference officers, ministers, and Publishing House employees at Nashville, in a public meeting, paid a beautiful tribute to his memory. He was a Presbyterian and a good Christian. He was an accomplished gentleman, and one of the most finished mechanics in the United States.

BIOGRAPHY OF DR. DRAKE.—Prof. W. H. N. Magruder, Baton Rouge, La., is collecting materials for a biography of the late B. M. Drake, D. D. All who have any letters or papers, or are acquainted with any facts or incidents, which may be of value in the preparation of such a work, will please address Prof. M. as above. Our Church papers will confer a favor on the friends of Dr. Drake by copying this notice.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

ESCAPE AT THE MISSISSIPPI PENITENTIARY—ONE KILLED AND SEVERAL WOUNDED.—The Vicksburg Whig of the 25th ult., states that a plot which has been on foot for some time, by a number of convicts in the Penitentary, to escape therefrom, was attempted on Saturday night, but was suppressed with loss of life and wounding several others. By some means the keeper was apprised of the proposed attempt, and was prepared to meet it. At the first outbreak the guard fired upon them, killing one of the ringleaders instantly and wounding several others.

MARINE DISASTER.—The schooner Neptune's Bride was captsized in a gale at Rockland, Me., recently, and fourteen of the crew were lost on the surf in attempting to land a boat.

BARON RENFREW AT CHICAGO.—Baron Renfrew arrived at Chicago on the 25th ult. Some thousands of people had gathered to get a sight of the young lord, but no excitement or disorder occurred, and Lord Lyons expressed great satisfaction at the manner of the baron's reception.

NEW MEXICO.—The latest advices from Santa Fe are to the 10th ult. The Indians were still committing depredations wherever opportunity afforded. The mail party consisting of Mr. Devers and an assistant, who drives the mail coach between Santa Fe and El Paso, were attacked by a band of Indians at Gindel Muerto and barbarously murdered. The Indians, destroyed the the mail, tore the coach to pieces, and drove off the team. This occurred about the 1st inst. Rodgers, who was convicted of murder, was to be hung on the 27th instant. On the 30th of August a band of Navajoes attacked a rancho near Santa Clara, killed one child and took three into captivity.—This was done in daylight and they escaped with their captives without molestation. Don Marcus Sandoval, who resided in the county of Los Vegas, was shot dead in his house on the 26th ult., and the assassin escaped. It is reported that Col. Fauntleroy has employed the services of three hundred Utah warriors to fight the Navajoes. The independent volunteers' campaign is progressing finely. It is anticipated that twice the number of men called will report at the rendezvous. Fifteen hundred regular troops are ordered to march to the Navajoe country on the 1st of October, but as only six companies are now stationed there they cannot do much. News from the plains of Importance. The rancho where Peacock was murdered has been abandoned. The goods the Indians left have been moved to Council Grove.

CALIFORNIA.—The tenth anniversary of the admission of California into the Union was celebrated by the Pioneers in San Francisco on the 10th ult., by a partial suspension of business, a procession through the principal streets, an oration, and a grand ball at the largest public hall in the evening. The Mariposa gold mines on Col. Fremont's grant are reported to yield immensely since the completion of extensive quartz mills. The last week's yield was at the rate of nearly $2000 per day.

FOREIGN NEWS.

SYRIA.—Letters from Damascus say that the horrid butcheries in Syria, the details of which have been received in profusion, are now subsiding, and of late no further disturbances had occurred. The French army was still encamped at Beyront, ready to prevent the slaughter of the Christians by the reckless and blood-thirsty Druses. Advices from Constantinople announce the arrival of prisoners, sent to that city by Fuad Pasha, which had greatly excited the populace.

THE WAR IN CHINA.—When the steamship Persia left Liverpool, on the 15th ult., the Egyptian overland mail had arrived at Alexandria, bringing later advices from India and China. The delays caused by the French were still a matter of complaint. Trouble is expected at Canton, should the allies receive a check in the northwest. The rebels had taken possession of Loo-Klang, a town 25 miles from Shanghai.

GARIBALDI IN NAPLES.—Garibaldi entered Naples on the 8th ult., with his staff alone. Joy was intense. A Provisional government was formed. Naples was tranquil. Garibaldi had discovered a national committee illegally constituted, and ordered the Prefect of Police to punish them. He had consigned the fleet and arsenal to Admiral Persano, and proclaimed Victor Emanuel King of Italy. The capitulation of the fort was expected immediately. Garibaldi found eighty million livres at the Bank of Naples. A panic prevailed at Rome. The cabinets of Vienna, Munich and Dresden advised the King at Naples to take refuge in Germany.

FRANCE AND ITALY.—France, as the Pope's protector, disapproves of armed resistance, and should Piedmont accomplish aggression, France will withdraw from Sardinia her protection. France hopes Piedmont will respect international rights, which alone can preserve mutual alliance, and trusts Emmanuel will avoid political faults which would be misfortune for Italy.

INSURRECTIONS.—Insurrections had taken place at Pesaro and Urbino. Four hundred insurgents repulsed the Papal troops. The inhabitants of Bergold, Sinigaglia and other districts, also revolted and proclaimed Victor Emanuel King. The telegraphs and bridges were all broken down. Urbino was free. Insurrectionary movements in the Marches and Umbria were extending.

RUSSIA AND AUSTRIA.—Russia desires a perfect reconciliation with Austria, arrangements for a meeting are to be made, and measures taken for ending the present state of things, which Russia considers intolerable. A state of siege at Ancona has been proclaimed.

MISCELLANEOUS.—A Rome dispatch says King Francisco II. of Naples, has left Gaeta for Spain. The city of Naples is tranquil, and all the forts have surrendered. Garibaldi has transferred the Neapolitan fleet to Sardinia. Sardinia has published a memorandum, defending her course in regard to the Italian question. A telegram from Turin states that the journals of Italy have expressed their regret at the recall of the French Ambassador to Sardinia. The Paris Constitutional says that the recall of the French Minister is not a case of rupture between the two governments. Ardent popular demonstrations have taken place in Naples, and many parties in high standing have fraternized with the people. A telegraphic dispatch from Rome says that many desertions had taken place at Gaeta. An enlistment of volunteers had been ordered. Garibaldi declares that he will soon proclaim the annexation of Naples to Piedmont, from the summits of the Quirnal, at which time all Italy will be united in a national conquest. A reactionary movement with fatal conflicts had occurred at Ariton. Garibaldi ordered forces to that point to quell the disturbances. From Rome we have news of the hoisting of the tricolor flag at Tivoli, Gennaro, and Subiaco, but it is reported that the people generally did not support the movements. It is reported that Gen. Lamoriciere has ordered the sacking of towns in case of insurrection. This statement lacks confirmation. A strong Piedmontese force is watching the Austrians. The Emperor of Austria gave a grand banquet in honor of the birth-day of Alexander, Second Czar, of Russia. France adds two regiments to the French force already in the Roman States, and General Goyon is reinstated in command. Gen. Goyon left Paris on the 15th ult.

MONDAY EVENING, October 1st, 1860.

The movement in our market, generally, has been on a moderate scale during the week; though for some few articles a fair demand has prevailed. In cotton the business has been checked by the unfavorable condition of the exchange market, which has shown increased depression since our last report. Tobacco has moved off rather more freely at very full prices, but in Sugar and Molasses, with reduced supplies, only limited transactions have taken place. In Western produce we have noticed a dull and drooping market for Flour and Corn, while provisions have met with only a limited demand at easier rates for buyers. In freights there has been no material change.

COTTON.—With respect to prices we have to notice considerable irregularity in the range, especially for the middling and the lower grades, which form the bulk of the supply, while the better qualities have been held rather firmly at our previous quotations, even running lists of clean Cotton, of good quality and staple, generally selling freely at the outside figures, and occasionally above them, and low-running lists, especially when containing dust, much leaf, being difficult of sale at the inside rates, or even less.

A SABBATH DAY.

There was no service in our neighborhood chapel; and rather than spend a silent Sabbath at home, we concluded to drive a distance of seven or eight miles to——— church.

It was a bright summer morning; a few white clouds flecked the soft blue sky, and the breeze was fresh and reviving, as we seated ourselves in the carriage. We cross an ample lawn, "dappled close with shade," pass through a cultivated field, and ont into the public road.

Here is a little stream overshadowed by branching alders, whose glossy leaves are reflected in its clear water; now it loses itself in that thicket of low shrubs, and now it breaks out into the sunlight, making a soft, soothing music as it rippies along.

Here the corner of a pretty white cottage gleams out through a mass of foliage; and here is a quaint, old-fashioned building, surrounded by picturesque scenery.—Now we pass green lanes and zig-zag fences; now clumps of trees, that make grotesque shadows on the smooth green sward, as the sun glances through their thickly-woven branches; and now we turn from the dusty highway to the neat little church, situated at some distance from the road, in a cool shady spot, just on the edge of the woods.

We are early, and but few of the congregation have collected. That little building near is the school-house; its brown gable is partly hid by the green leaves and long drooping moss of an old oak: Sunday-school is held in it, and the sweet music of childish voices floats in at the window, as they hymn the praises of God. Now all is hushed again, save the drowsy hum of the wild bee, or the distant tinkling of a sheep bell. A holy calm steals over the heart.

"Know ye an hour of perfect peace,
An hour so calm, so light, so even—
When all our cares and troubles cease,
And we can think of God and heaven?
'Tis when in God's own house we meet,
Our guilty, thankless hearts to raise;
To worship at his sacred feet,
And render our imperfect praise."

A group of happy little faces brightens the door-way; and now the meek, pious pastor enters, and makes his way slowly and reverently in the pulpit. A hymn is sung, and my heart is touched with devotional feeling, as the sweet strain swells and dies away again in soft cadences. We hear an excellent sermon; the sentiment engages the attention so much, that we forget to criticise the language it is conveyed in. "We think but little of the shell, while we are admiring the beauty of the kernel." But how few preachers have learned the charm of delivery.

"'Tis the glance, the expression, the well-chosen word,
By whose magic the depths of the spirit are stirred;
The smile, the mute gesture, the soul-startling pause,
The eye's sweet expression, that melts while it awes;
The lip's soft persuasion, the musical tone,
Oh, such is the charm of the eloquent one."

After morning service is over, we partake of a repast, "all under the greenwood tree." In the afternoon we hear another good sermon, and then set ont on our return home. We have spent a delightful day, and I trust it will prove a profitable one to a spiritual sense.

As we near home, a troop of little darkies run down the dusty road to meet the carriage, and following close at their heels come, "Tray, Blanche, and Sweetheart, little dogs and all."

Now we are on our own pleasant gallery. The setting sun gilds the white gable of the mansion, and lingers to the tree-tops, as if loth to leave the quiet landscape. Now the last faint tinge of rosy light fades away; "the moon-beams slide softly in between the sleeping leaves;" the stars come out one by one, and our holy Sabbath-day is ended.

OLIVIA.

ICE-WRECKED.

With a fair breeze we sped down Channel, until, on the fourth day, the bluff Land's End was waning in the distance. As it faded from our view, some few tears were shed at the remembrance that it was our last sight of the native land we were leaving for ever, but they were quickly dried in the anticipation of brighter days to come; for here we were westward bound, out in search of occupation, but in the chartered ship of our employer, a man of large fortune, who was about to establish an immense farm, of which I was to be manager, in one of the far western districts of Canada; while the other passengers, skilled artisans and laborers, all held suitable engagements.

Our hearts were free from anxiety for the future, and full of cheerfulness and hope, and as we bowled along over old Ocean, there were few evenings when the pleasant echo of music did not float by on the waves, as the young people danced and sung beneath the stars, and the joy ran about and laughed [illegible] sing merry songs. And best and pleasantest of all was the manly face of Mr. Grant, our principal, as he watched the happiness of those around him.

We had nearly crossed the Atlantic, and were beginning to look eagerly for our first sight of the New World, when a sudden change occurred to the temperature, and the balmy days of April were followed by a May cold and cutting almost as winter. At length we entered the broad estuary of the St. Lawrence, and then the mystery was solved, for its entire surface was checkered with masses of ice; evidently the broken-up winter covering of the river above being swept by the current out to sea. Nothing could exceed the beauty of the ice-fields as they flashed and sparkled like gigantic gems in their setting of azure sea. Many were of great size also, like floating islands, and the heaped up blocks upon their surface gleamed from a distance like cities of dazzling crystal.

The wind was in our favour, and our good ship sped up the Gulf, threading her way through the channels of the floating ice-fields, while hour after hour her passengers stood watching with unwearied eyes the splendid scene around them. Even when night came, there was the same eager throng of gazers, for those large frozen plains glittered in the moonlight with a strange spectral beauty none of us had ever seen before.

After a time, a mass of ice larger than common appeared floating down the stream. Subsequently, we learned it was part of the cone the spray forms every winter before the Falls of Montmorency. On it came, gleaming palely against the deep-blue sky like a castle of spotless marble, rising in tower, and turret, and massive buttress, and enriched by the most delicate tracery. Every eye was fixed upon it in its breathless admiration, as it swept majestically by until, as it passed between us and the wind, by its loftiness it momentarily becalmed us. Suddenly, the stationary ship received a severe shock, which vibrated not only through all her timbers, but through every one of the one hundred and forty human beings who formed her living freight. Never shall I forget the shrieks of terror that followed, quick as an echo, upon the shock, as women, well-nigh frantic with fear, clasped their children to their bosoms, believing that the ship had struck upon a rock, and that their last moment was come. A cry from the bow, that it was but a blow from the ice, somewhat relieved their fears, and they stood quietly by, while the helm was put down, and the sails drawn round, in the effort to free us from the huge mass of ice which still lay across the vessel's bows, pressing and grating audibly against her timbers. A minute more, and above the din of blocks and cordage, and the stamping of men's feet, there arose a wild cry that echoed far and wide over the surrounding ice-fields, and through every cranny of the neighbouring ice-castle—"The ship is sinking!"

It was an appalling announcement; and unfortunately it was a true one. The ice had struck us heavier than we thought, and its hard sharp edge, keen and relentless as that of a knife, pressing against the bows of our vessel—undefended as she was by the double timbers needed for ice-encounters—had cut them completely through, so that the water rushed in with the force and rapidity of a cascade.

What a fearful scene and confusion ensued! the shrieks and lamentations of women, the cries of children, and the silent anguish of men, as they beheld the fears and danger of those dearest to them. Oo none did the blow fall heavier than on me for I had a delicate wife on board, and of my two little ones the younger was an invalid. Meanwhile, no time was lost. There was no space to lower the boats, and the pale, terrified passengers were hurriedly passed down, by the bowsprit, upon the ice. It was touching to see some snatch a cloak or wrapper as they passed, the sole relic of all worldly possessions; while others, in their terror, departed without even that. A few provisions were next sent down, quickly followed by the crew; and then we stood a wretched, cowering group upon the ice-field that had wrought us so much evil, watching for the last moment of the good ship, which had brought us in peace and safety more than two thousand miles. It was not long in coming. Suddenly the bow bent low, as if to salute the waves, and the stern rose high into the air; then, with a rapid forward movement, the stately ship passed silently down into the bosom of the deep, every tall mast and tapering yard in its place, and every sail spread to its uttermost, and gleaming whitely in the moonlight, until each in its turn passed from our sight. For a few moments there was a troubled vortex, and then the moonlit sea rolled placidly on, and the gentle night-wind swept over the spot, bearing no trace of the fearful shipwreck, which in scarce ten minutes from the time the ice struck our devoted vessel, had left us exposed and helpless upon the broad sea, our only refuge that desolate field of ice, which, hard, inhospitable, and shelterless, pierced us through with its intense cold.

That night was one of infinite suffering to hardy men; what, then, must it have been to the feeble and helpless? It was terrible to hear the wailing of the children exposed so much rigorous cold, and the fruitless efforts of their distracted parents to shield them from it. A few loose, plastic sail spars had been thrown over from the ship, and the scramble to obtain them was like a struggle for gold. I was so fortunate as to secure one, and on it I placed my poor wife and elder child, rolled together in our only cloak, while through the live-long night I paced to and fro beside them, with the little one wrapped in the breast of my coat, striving in vain to still its cries; and as I walked, my feet clung to the frozen pavement beneath them, and the cold shot up through my limbs like an icy fire, causing intolerable pain.

As the night passed on, the cold increased, or else we felt it more; and many times, as I looked on the shivering beings crouched around me, I thought that few among them would survive till morning. But thanks, under Providence, to the efforts of the ship, who served out, at short intervals, small allowances of spirits, the day dawned on all save a few small children, my own dear babe among them. And truly, when I looked on the wide waste of waters around us, dotted here and there by silvery ice-fields, but unbecrred by a single sail and thought of our desolation, our misery, and probable fate, I felt it was mercifully called away from the evil to come. But the mother could not feel so, and amid her own sufferings, her tears fell fast on the sweet placid face that would never weep again.

With the morning, the ship's company and passengers were mustered, to ascertain if any were missing, and great was our consternation to find that our employer, Mr. Grant, was absent. Every inquiry was made, and every search among the crevices and crannies of our rugged ice-raft, but all in vain. In the confusion and misery of the night, none had missed him, nor was any trace of him to be found, and we were at length compelled to believe that our kind friend and master had either perished in the wreck, or else in his passage to the ice. However it happened it was a new calamity, and one that, despite our own extremity, grieved us deeply; and besides our regret for the individual himself, there came the remembrance how all our prospects had perished with him, and that even should we be rescued, we must commence the world again friendless and destitute.

Meanwhile, many were the eager eyes continually scanning the horizon in the vain search for a friendly sail. As the day wore on, the sun shone brilliantly out, and his beams flashed in a thousand dazzling rays on our ice-raft, until we were almost blinded by their radience. Yet they shed a warmth through our chilled frames for which we were most thankful, and in many spots they melted the ice, which ran in little rills, enabling us to quench our thirst, without filling our mouths with ice. Twice in the day, a little biscuit and raw pork were distributed to us, and thus sadly and sufferingly passed the day, till a second night of misery set in. This proved far worse than the former, for ere long, wild gusts began to howl over the ocean-wastes, out among which we now had drifted; and heavy waves lashed and raged around us and dashed themselves against our refuge; and though they had not power to put it into motion, we knew not how soon they might sweep over it, or shatter it in pieces. It was a fearful night, and so exhausted and despairing did it leave us, that we scarce could rouse ourselves to exertion, until a sailor's cry of 'Sail ho!' awoke fresh hope.

How many tearful eyes brightened, and heavy hearts throbbed quick and gratefully, as they watched that sail speed on towards us before the last breath of the expiring gale! As she drew near, the only fear was lest she should not have space for all. Nearer and still nearer she came, until we would see the men upon her decks, and then—we scarce could believe our eyes—she passed us by, unobserving or unheeding the signal we had raised upon a spar, and the dark group of human beings clustered round it. If unheeding, Heaven forgive them, for it was a fearful depth of despair into which to fling back so many of their fellow-creatures. The women sank down too heart-stricken for words, and the men lifted up their voices in bitter indignation at the cruelty that could thus leave women and children to perish. Death in one of his most fearful forms did indeed seem pressing close upon us, for our scanty stock of food was exhausted. Many flung themselves at length upon the ice, utterly indifferent to all outward objects; while others prayed earnestly over the dear ones for whom all earthly hope was past.

Suddenly a loud shout rose above the plash of the waves and the murmur of sorrowful voices, and echoed cheerfully over our frozen resting-place. Every eye turned seaward, and there, but a few fathoms from us, lay a large vessel, which, absorbed as we were in our misery, had approached us unperceived. Her bulwarks were filled with sympathising faces, and to our feeble cheer of welcome, there came back so hearty a response, that it sent a glow through our shivering frames.

Never was kindness greater than that which we poor ice-wrecked voyagers received from the crew and passengers of that ship, crowded though she already was. To their care and attention we owed not only our own lives, but those of the dear ones who seemed about to die; and never can we feel sufficiently grateful for their good offices, or the many sacrifices they made on our behalf.

The ship was westward bound, and on our arrival in Canada, the account of our misfortunes brought us many offers of employment. Years have passed since then, and the world has gone well with us, but nothing can erase from our minds the haunting remembrance of the fearful days and nights we passed upon that miserable ice-field.

KINDLING OF THE BEACONS IN JANUARY 1804.

In January 1804, the First Consul, Napoleon, had made all needful preparations for an invasion of England. Hundreds of vessels were gathered in the ports of Normandy and of Holland, to serve as transports. A gallant and abundant army lay encamped at Boulogne, ready at any moment to embark. On the other hand, the English people had come forward in vast multitudes as its mounted volunteers, to defend their country. Every county had its [illegible] infantry regiments, and its [illegible] companies of active heroism, and a resolution to die in the last ditch, rather than surrender to a foreign enemy.

There is always something ludicrous in volunteer military service, till it has been put to the proof. The question always arises—Will these amateur-soldiers really show themselves, in the hour of danger, as possessed of the right stuff? Although there is no proper reason for this infirmity of faith, since history tells many tales of hearths zealously defended by their owners, yet the question will arise. Fortunately for our country, and for humanity, the volunteer spirit of 1804 was never put to trial, Bonaparte having finally given up his design. But yet we were not left without some means of judging how the volunteers would have behaved in the event of a landing of the French, for a false alarm brought out the troops of a large district, and that with a degree of promptitude and apparent zeal that left nothing to be desired.

All along the coasts, beacons had been prepared to give the alarm, in the event of any appearance of a descent in their neighborhood. These communicated with other beacons in the interior, so that in a very short time the whole of a large province might have been roused. There was a daily expectation of seeing these fires kindled; and men's minds had been wrought up to a pitch of nervous apprehensiveness on the subject. It was at this juncture, on the evening of the 31st of January, that the man attending the beacon Hume Castle, in Berwickshire, saw what he thought a kindled beacon on one side of the hills of Northumberland. What he really did see was never thoroughly ascertained. The common story afterwards circulated was, that a family across the Border was signalising their entry upon a new house, by the festivity called a housekeeping, and the blaze of lights in the windows effected the Hume Castle watchman as a kindled beacon. He immediately kindled his own fire, and the signal was repeated all along the valleys of the Border. Had the example been followed at St. Abb's Head, Lothian would have instantly received the alarm, and it would have then been communicated all over Scotland. But the watchman at that place rightly considered that the alarm of an invaded coast should not have come from the interior of the country, and he accordingly abstained from firing his beacon. As it was, the whole of the valley of the Tweed was roused, and that most effectually.

The alacrity of the mustered at the appointed places was surprising. Within two hours of the kindling of the fire at Hume Castle, the Roxburgshire yeomanry filled the market-place of Kelso. At an early hour next morning, the Dunse volunteers were on the march to Haddington, and the Selkirkshire yeomanry and volunteers on the march for Dalkeith. The Berwickshire yeomanry were not less prompt to their movement upon Dunbar. Men rose from sick-beds, and rode to the rendezvous through all the inconveniences of bad weather and foul ways. A young man with a wounded hand in a very painful state, stopped on duty for two days at Jedburg without flinching. Many who had not been previously enrolled, shouldered their muskets, and accompanied their friends. Baggage and provisions were brought forward with nearly equal promptitude. To borrow some interesting recollections of Sir Walter Scott: 'The men of Liddesdale, the most remote point to the westward which the alarm reached, were so much afraid of being late in the field, that they put in requisition all the horses they could find; and when they had thus made a forced march out of their own county, they turned their borrowed steeds loose to find their way back through the hills, and they all got back safe to their own stables. Another remarkable circumstance was the general cry of the inhabitants of the smaller towns for arms, that they might go along with their companions. The Selkirkshire yeomanry made a remarkable march; for although some of the individuals lived at twenty and thirty miles distance from the place where they mustered, they were nevertheless embodied and in order in so short a period, that they were at Dalkeith, which was their alarm-post, about one o'clock on the day succeeding the first signal, with men and horses in good order, though the roads were in a bad state, and many of the troopers must have ridden forty or fifty miles without drawing bridle. Two members of the corps, chanced to be absent from their homes, and in Edinburgh on private business. The lately married wife of one of these gentlemen, and the widowed mother of the other, sent the arms, uniforms, and charges of the two troopers, that they might join their companions at Dalkeith. The author was very much struck by the answer made to him by the last-mentioned lady, when he paid her some compliment on the readiness which she shewed in equipping her son with the means of meeting danger, when she might have left him a fair excuse for remaining absent. "Sir," she replied, with the spirit of a Roman matron, "none can know better than you that my son is the only prop by which, since his father's death, our family is supported. But I would rather see him dead on that hearth, than hear that he had been a horse's length behind his companions in the defence of his king and country!" The author mentions what was immediately under his own eye, and within his own knowledge; but the spirit was universal wherever the alarm reached, both in Scotland and England.

The account of the ready patriotism displayed by the country on this occasion, warmed the hearts of Scottish men in every corner of the world. It reached [in India] the ears of the well-known Dr. Leyden, whose enthusiastic love of Scotland, and of his own district of Teviotdale, formed a distinguished part of his character. The account, which was read to him when on a sick-bed, stated (very truly) that the different corps, on arriving at their alarm-posts, announced themselves by their music playing the tunes peculiar to their own districts, many of which have been gathering-signals for centuries. It was particularly remembered, that the Liddesdale men, before mentioned, entered Kelso playing the lively tune—

O whn dare meddle wi' me!
And whn dare meddle wi' me!
My name it is little Jock Elliot,
And whn dare meddle wi' me!

The patient was so delighted with this display of ancient Border spirit, that he sprang up in his bed, and began to sing the old song with such vehemence of action and voice, that his attendants, ignorant of the cause of excitation, concluded that the fever had taken possession of his brain; and it was only the entry of another Borderer, Sir John Malcolm, and the explanation which he was well qualified to give, that prevented them from resorting to means of medical coercion.

Although this exhibition of the volunteer spirit was confined to a province, it was generally accepted as a satisfactory proof of the soundness of the national heart on the occasion. Every body was rejoiced to think that, if real danger should arise, there would be no lack of courage to meet the enemy, whatever might be the chances of the encounter. So happy an affair did the False Alarm thus prove, that those wise people who see further than their neighbors, were all convinced that it had been got up deliberately, in order to put the volunteers to a sort of test. But this was a mistake of the very wise people. The whole affair originated simply in the misinterpretation of some accidental light, as above narrated.—Chambers' Journal.

MONUMENT TO THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

The London Times, of the 31st of July, says: "A statue to James Hogg, the celebrated Scottish poet, was publicly inaugurated on Thursday, on the banks of St. Mary's Lake, at the head of the vale of the Yarrow, one of the finest and the most picturesque streams on the Scottish border. Hogg, who was born in 1772, and died in 1835, is best known for his beautiful poem, "The Queen's Wake;" and for his ballads, some of which rank as household words in his native land. The hill country of Selkirkshire, known by its traditional name of The Forest, was the early and the principal scene of his music, and he has, like Scott for the Trossachs and for the Tweedside, gained a poetical popularity for the Lake of St. Mory's, and its companion sheet, the lock of the Lowes, and for the twin streets at Ettrick and Yarrow. Hogg enjoyed the friendship not only of Sir Walter Scott, but of Wordsworth, whose muse the brace of Yarrow also inspired, and of the late Professor Wilson, the celebrated Christopher North, who, with the shepherd, contributed the well-known papers, the "Noctes Ambrosianæ" to Blackwood's Magazine. The subscription for a statue to the poet was justituted and successfully carried out by the Rev. Charles Rogers, of Stirling, and the work was entrusted to Mr. Currie, a sculptor whose ability had previously been exhibited in the Selkirk statue to Mungo Park, the Abyssinian traveller. The monument is situated in the centre of a sloping bank, immediately opposite St. Mary's cottage, and immediately between St. Mary's Lake and the lock of the Lowes. The site chosen is the spot on which Professor Wilson, in his Noctes, so far back as 1821, predicted that the Shepherd's monument should stand. There was a large assemblage at the inauguration, at which three daughters of the poet were present. Mr. Glassford Bell, one of the Sheriff substitutes of Lanarkshire, delivered an eloquent and stirring inaugural address, to which he reviewed the life, character, works, and friendships of the bard.

DID JESUS SING?

At a gathering of children on Chrisimas day, a gentleman present related a very interesting incident:

A little girl, three years of age, was very curious to know why Christmas greens were so much used, and what they were intended to signify.

So Mr. L. told her the story of the babe of Bethlehem—of the child whose name was Jesus.

The little questioner was just beginning to give voice to the music that was in her heart; and after Mr. L. had concluded the narrative, she looked up in his face, and asked, "Did Jesus sing?"

Who had ever thought of that? If you will look at Matthew, twenty-sixth chapter and thirtieth verse, you will there find almost conclusive proof that Jesus sang with his disciples.

Is not that encouragement for us to sing—not with the understanding only, but with the heart also?

The Bishop of Ripon (England) has addressed a letter to a clergyman in his diocese, strongly condemning the practice of employing professional singers in churches.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MISS EMMA A. WALLACE died at the residence of her uncle, Col. R. A. Baker, near this place, 31st July last, of typhoid fever, in the eighteenth year of her age. She was a native of Sumpter county, Ala., and only daughter of W. A. and Caroline M. Wallace, of Louisiana. Being an only daughter, she was peculiarly a centre of attraction and endearment to her fond parents and relatives. No pains or expense was spared to give to her natural endowments those charms which would realize the fondest hopes and desires of friends. She was a pupil in dear old Centenary, possessing with success her education to completion. She promised as fair to live long as any one.—She was just blooming into all the freshness and beauty of womanhood when the destroyer came. But she had not neglected the work of preparation; she professed religion and joined the Church in October, 1856, and continued a meek, unassuming christian to the last. I met her in class the week before she was taken sick. She said, with emotion, that during the session she had grown rather cold, and did not enjoy religion as she used; but that during vacation she was resolved to live nearer to God, and be more faithful. When it was feared that she could not recover, and was apprized of the fact, she had a severe mental struggle. To be willing to die far away from home, and not see her dear pa and ma, was difficult to attain; but God helped her, and she was happy and resigned, and sweetly fell asleep in Jesus. I sat by her to the last, and could see the last beams of the setting sun from the window of her room the same instant that her sun of life, with more serenity and glory, went down to rise, I doubt not, in an eternal and unclouded day.

DR. JOHN T. SIMMONS was born in Montgomery county, Alabama, August 11th, 1827, and died near Melrose, Nacogdoches county, Texas, August 11th, 1860—his 33d birth day.—Like too many, he neglected to make a dedication of himself to God in the days of his youth; but when God wasted the vigor of his manhood by lingering disease, he thought upon his ways returned to God, and found abundant pardon. For about six weeks before his death, he rejoiced in the sweet consciousness of his acceptance with God. Said he, "I know there is a reality in experiental religion." Many, and pathetic were his exhortations to his relatives and friends to turn to God. "Oh," said he, as we opened the Bible to read, and pray with him for the last time, "that is the Bible my mother gave me—it is the precious treasure which saved me." He presented it to his wife, and died, believing that God would, through grace, save her and his little daughter, with him in heaven. Said he, "write my obituary, that the friends of my youth may know that I have gone to rest." Three weeks before his death he identified himself with the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Goodman, July 21st, 1860. Brother Wiggins died in a short time after his attack with inflammation of the brain; he was a Christian; he was much beloved by his relations, and highly respected by his acquaintances and neighbors.

MRS. SARAH A. BROWN, wife of J. W. Brown, and daughter of Alexander Tinnin, died Sept. 8, 1860, aged 34 years and 11 months; she has left behind a husband and six children. She joined the M. E. Church end, professed religion in 1841, at the old Lauderdale camp ground, in which she lived a faithful member. She was a zealous and warm hearted Christian, and loved her Church, her ministers, her Bible, and her God. When she was taken for death her husband saw that she was going, and called upon all the Christians and friends that surrounded her bedside to kneel with him in prayer, that she might be enabled to give a clear manifestation of her acceptance with God; and, wonderful to say, when her husband rose from his knees, she opened her eyes and looked upon him, and attempted to speak, and with a smile, died.

MRS. EMMA COLLIER, wife of William T. Collier, and daughter of Rev. J. Gregory, of Pickens county, Ala., died July 8, 1860, in the 21st year of her age. She died hoping the graces of God. Heaven was her morning and evening star. When she thought her hour had come, she called Brother Collier to her bedside, and said, "I see my way clear, angels attend my bed." He asked her if she wished nourishment? She said, "I will breakfast in Heaven," and requested him and all her friends to meet her in Heaven, where pain would be no more.

A BROTHER.

MRS. SARAH CURTIS, wife of Elijah Curtis, died July 22, 1860. She was born March 9th, 1778, in Anson county, North Caroline. She embraced religion in the year 1800, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which she lived a consistent member until her death. Her last illness was long and painful. She spoke of her departure, said she was ready, but willing to wait and suffer until her change came. As the time drew near, her confidence seemed to grow stronger. When her speech had almost failed, she was heard to whisper, "ready, ready." For 60 years she demonstrated the power of transforming grace. Eternity alone can unfold how many were influenced to seek salvation through her example. The precious savor she shed in her family will always cause them to call her blessed. She has left a husband lingering, in his 84th year, waiting the coming of his Lord.

CROAKERS.

There is a class of professors of religion who are very properly denominated croakers. They are a kind of fault-finders, generally; nothing seems to please them. They seem to see every thing through a jaundiced medium.—And if we were to judge of the state of the Church and ministry by their representations, we should conclude that christianity had fled from the land, and the Church and ministry were all arrant hypocrites. They are always looking at the faults of their brethren; they are hyper-eyed to discover every defect, while they are blind to their virtues and good works. They find fault with every preacher that is sent to their circuit or station.—Like the hypocritical pharisees, "they bind heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers." If the preacher is lenient in the administration of discipline, they complain of his want of strictness, and say the Church will be ruined unless the "rules" are enforced. If he is strict in enforcing the rules, they take sides with the offenders and censure the preacher. If the preacher denounces sin, and exposes vice unsparingly, they condemn him as too harsh. If he is mild and persuasive, they regard him as too compromising. So far from co-operating with the Church in her efforts to do good, they are a real clog to her energies; and it would be a great advantage to the cause of religion, if they were entirely removed from her pale. They give aid and comfort to the enemy; they paralyze the influence of the Church; they weaken the hands of the preacher; and, while they are nominally on the side of the Church and religion, their entire influence is against them. Their children lose confidence in the Church of their parents, and in religion generally; their wicked friends are confirmed in their unbelief; their own spirit is soured; and if they are not hypocrites already, they will backslide and lose the spirit of religion.

Croakers, to a large extent, come under the class referred to by Jesus in the sermon on the mount; "And why behold'st thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye; but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?" to whom he also said, "thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye." They see no imperfection in themselves; they look not at their own delinquencies, and flatter themselves that they are perfect standards of righteousness, when perhaps far more defective than those whom they so unsparingly condemn.

"O, wad some power the gittie gie us,
To see oursel'es as ithers see us;
It wad frae monny a blunder free us,

The elements that compose a first class croaker are large self-esteem, unbridling egotism, good gifts, very little grace.

These croakers are sometimes found in preachers who have located, and become soured because they do not occupy the prominence in the Church which they did when actively employed in the work.

Some of them are lay-men who think they are overlooked and not appreciated by the Church.

Some of them are old ladies who have the dyspepsia.

Some are itinerant preachers who have been disappointed in not being made Presiding Elders, or Bishops, perhaps.

He is not a croaker who affectionately tells his brethren their faults; who tells people the consequences of impenitence, and faithfully warns sinners to flee the wrath to come; who proves the sincerity of his love to the Church and ministry by co-operating in every good work, defending them from the aspersions of their enemies, and doing all in his power to give them influence and success.

ANTI CROAKER.

CHRISTIANITY UNDER THE TURK.

Every one of our readers must have read more or less of the horrible massacres that have occurred on Italy by one set of Ottoman subjects upon another, which [illegible] as opposed to the bloodshed. But as all may not be aware of the exact relative positions of the tenets of Ottoman subjects, we give a short sketch, condensed from an able contribution by M. Jolin Lemoinne to the Revue des deux Mondes, some little time since.

A vast chain of mountains traverses a portion of Syria, from North to South, under the name of Lebanon; it divides into two branches, which are separated by a broad and fertile valley. The western branch retains the denomination of Lebanon, while the eastern chain, opposite, and nearly parallel to it, is called Anti-Lebanon. The population of this mountainous district is mainly composed of the Maronites and the Druses. The Maronites occupy the most central valleys and the highest ranges of the principal group of Mount Lebanon, from Beyrouth to Tripoli in Syria. Their origin and their settlement on the Mount, date from the earliest centuries of the Christian era.

At the epoch when the eremitical spirit was at its height, there lived on the banks of the Orontes a sanctity named Maroun, who, by his fastings and austerities, attracted the veneration of the neighboring people. It appears that in the quarrels which had already broken out between Rome and Constantinople, he sided with the Western party. His death, far from cooling his partizans, gave new strength to their zeal; it was rumored that his dead body worked miracles; his disciples raised a tomb and a chapel in Hamah, and before long there grew up a convent, which acquired great celebrity in that part of Syria. Meanwhile, the disputes between the two metropolitans grew warmer and warmer, and the whole empire became involved in the dissensions of the princes and the priests. Towards the close of the seventh century, a monk belonging to the convent of Hamah, named John the Maronite, acquired, by his talents as a preacher, great influence throughout the country, and became one of the strongest supporters of the Latin party, or the Pope's partisans. Consequently, the Pope's legate at Antioch consecrated him Bishop of Djebail, and sent him to preach in the Lebanon. The missionary made rapid progress, and was followed by nearly all the Syrian Christians. Little by little, instead of founding a congregation, he was in a condition to found a people. The Latins who had fled for refuge to the Lebanon, entrenched themselves in the free mountains, and formed there a society which was civilly, as well as religiously, independent. John kept these mountaineers in regular and military order; he supplied them with arms, and they soon became masters of all the hill country, as far as Jerusalem. The schism which divided Islamism at that epoch, facilitated their success.

For several centuries, their history remains vague; they lost a great part of their possessions, and were circumscribed within their present limits. Although about the year 1215 they were reunited to the Church of Rome, from which they had never been widely separated, still they for a long time remained under the authority of their patriarchs. In consequence of the events which caused the Crusaders to lose possession of the Holy Places, the attachment of this people to the Church of Rome was greatly weakened, and the authority of the patriarchs thereby increased. But at the beginning of the fifteenth century, the Court of Rome, by able negotiations, induced the Maronites to acknowledge its superiority definitely and in 1445, and in the pontificate of Eugene the Fourth this acknowledgment was friendly renewed. Since that time, Rome has contrived to keep the Maronites within the pale of her communion by prudent concessions and compromises in respect to discipline, which we shall shortly mention. Nevertheless, Rome seems to care little about the fate of her afflicted members in the East. In his last allocution, Pius the Ninth speaks long and loudly of the hard treatment which certain Italian bishops have suffered, in not being allowed their own way in stirring up the affection against Victor Emmanuel; but he cannot find time to say a word in favor of the massacred Maronites. Perhaps his Holiness may consider the Church discipline which has been conceded to them much too Lutheran in principle to be published as an example to the religious world.

The Maronite form of government is quite traditional and reposes entirely on manners and customs. The people have always retained a great independence; and at the same time that their religious belief kept them united amongst themselves, the nature of their country, which gave to every village and almost to every family the means of resistance by their own proper strength prevented the establishment of a feudal and central power. They live scattered over the mountains in villages, hamlets, and even isolated houses. The nation may be regarded as divided into two classes: the people, and the sheiks or notables. The sheiks exercise a sort of feudal power, and administer justice; but that justice, summarily administered, is not without appeal. The highest jurisdiction belongs, or rather did belong until lately, to the Emir and his divan. Nevertheless, there is a conflicting jurisdiction between this authority and the ecclesiastical authority. The patriarch of the Maronites alone retains the right of decision in every case where the civil law may be at variance with the religious law, such as marriages, dispensations, and separations. The civil authority is obliged to be very careful how it treats the patriarch and the bishops, for the influence of the clergy is immense.

The whole nation of the Maronites is agriculturalist; every one lives on his own personal labor; and the sheiks are only distinguished from the people by a shabby palisse, a horse, and a few advantages in respect to food and lodging. Property is as sacred there as it is in Europe. M. Lamartine says: "The slopes of these mountains which face the sea, are fertile, watered by numerous streams and inexhaustible cascades. They produce silk, oil, and wheat. The heights are almost inaccessible, and the naked rock every where pierces through the mountain side. But the indefatigable activity of the people, whose only safe asylum for their religion was behind these peaks and precipices, has rendered even the rocks fertile. Stage by stage, up to the topmost crests, as far as the eternal snows, they have constructed with blocks of stone the walls of terraces, up to which they have carried the small quantity of vegetable earth which the water had deposited in the ravines, and have converted the whole of Lebanon into a garden covered with figtrees, mulberry-trees, olive-trees and corn. The traveller cannot recover from his astonishment when, after having climbed for whole days along the peaked buttresses of the mountain, which are nothing but enormous blocks of rock, he suddenly finds, in the hollow of an elevated gorge, or on the plain of a pyramid of mountains, a handsome village built of white stone, inhabited by a rich and numerous population, with a Moorish castle in the midst, a monastery in the distance, a torrent which rolls its foam at the foot of the village, and all around a horizon of vegetation and verdure in which pines, chestnut and mulberry trees support the vines or overhang the fields of maize and wheat. These villages are almost perpendicularly suspended one over the other; you may throw a stone from one village to the other; you can hear and understand spoken words; and the slope of the mountain nevertheless compels so many zig-zags and sinuosities to trace the path of communication between them, that it takes an hour, or even two, to go from one hamlet to the other.

Although the Maronites look up to the Pope as their spiritual chief, it is nevertheless by discreet concessions that the Holy See has maintained her supremacy over the Catholics of Mount Lebanon. She has dispensed with the celibacy of the Maronite priests—that is, of those who belong to the secular clergy; the bishops and monks have to follow the rule observed by the Roman Catholics of Europe. The priests, moreover, can only marry a single woman, and not a widow; nor can a priest marry a second time, in the event of his being left a widower. A Maronite clergyman's wife may therefore expect to be doubly dear, doubly cherished. It appears that this privilege of the Maronite clergy, far from being injurious to the regularity of sacerdotal manners, has proved extremely favorable to morality. Every traveller who has visited the country agrees in admiring that the little Church isolated in the mountains, presents a most faithful image of the primitive Church.

As to their liturgy, the popes have also conceded much. The mass is celebrated in the Syriac language, which the people in general do not understand; but at the gospel the priest turns towards the people and reads the text aloud in Arabic. The communion is administered in both kinds. The host is a small round unleavened cake. The portion of the officiating minister is marked by a stamp; the rest is divided into small pieces which the priest puts into the chalice with the wine, and which he administers to each individual with a spoon that serves for the whole community. The priests live by the altar and by the labor of their hands. They practise either agriculture or trade. The members of the superior clergy, the patriarchs and the bishops, are in easier circumstances. They collect from their flock a personal poll tax, to which the cures and the monks have to contribute as well as the laity. While they recognize the Pope's supremacy, the Maronite clergy have reserved the right of electing a patriarch, or batrok. This patriarch is elected by the bishops and approved by the Pope's legate to Mount Lebanon. The legate resides at the monastery of Antora. There are a very, [illegible] on a mule, and followed by a single sacristan. The majority live in convents, and they are only distinguished from simple priests by a long crimson robe with a red girdle. They exert undisputed influence throughout Lebanon, and could raise the people with a word. Besides the numerous clergy, Mount Lebanon possesses many monasteries for men and also for women. The three religious orders in greatest veneration are the Libanians, the Antonines, and the Halebys or Aleppines. The French Lazarists have a college at Antora which formerly belonged to the Jesuits, who have still two establishments on the Mount. There is at Rome a Maronite college, founded by Gregory the Thirteenth, which has sent out some celebrated Oriental scholars. Thanks to these educational advantages, the Maronites have often become what the Copts are in Egypt and the Persians are amongst the Afghans—the writers and depositaries of the correspondence of the Turks, and especially of the Druses. Their monastic rule is generally that of St Anthony, which the monks practise rigorously. They are clad in coarse woollen cloth; they never eat meat; they observe frequent and severe fasts. They lead a laborious life, tilling the ground and working at trades. Every convent has a shoemaker friar, a tailor friar, and a baker friar. The nuns also are industriously occupied.

Until lately, the Maronites always enjoyed great liberty in the exercise of their worship. They are the only Christian people subject to Mussulman rule, who have been allowed to go in procession outside their churches with crosses and banners in front, and the priests decorated with their sacerdotal ornaments. It is well known what horror the Turks entertain for bells; nevertheless, throughout the Mount the Maronite bells pealed without hindrance or interruption. One of the most tyrannical vexations which a late Turkish governor could inflict on the Maronites, was to stop the ringing of all but wooden bells. The Maronite population may be reckoned at something more than two hundred thousand. They could easily raise thirty thousand fighting men. Nevertheless they are weaker than the Druses, who are much more warlike, and who exercise over them a sort of military predominance, which is so firmly established that, in spite of their religious enmity, several of the great Maronite families, in order to maintain their influence in their tribe, were obliged to put themselves under Druse protection, although the Druses are less numerous than themselves.

The Druses are naturally bloodthirsty and vindictive although they have great apparent generosity, and exercise boundless hospitality. The Maronites are hospitable, but less so than the Druses; which may be accounted for by religious causes, and by the mistrust which they feel from their isolation amongst infidels—sheep in the midst of wolves. The Druses receive a stranger according to the precept of the Mussulman law: "The first duty of hospitality is to abstain from asking a stranger whence he comes and in what faith he has been brought up; but it is a duty to ask him if he is hungry, if he is thirsty, and if he has clothing."

The Druses occupy the southern part of Mount Lebanon, the eastern slopes of Anti-Lebanon, and Djebel Sheik. There are thirty-seven towns and villages entirely inhabited by the Druses, in Lebanon, and two hundred and eleven villages by Druses intermingled with Christians. In Anti-Lebanon, the Druses by themselves inhabit sixty-nine villages or towns; a great number of others are heterogenously peopled by Druses, Maronites and schismatic Greeks. Like the Maronites, the Druses may be divided into two classes; that of the sheiks and emirs, and that of the people. Their general employment is the culture of land; every one lives on his inheritance, from the produce of his mulberry-trees and his vines. The Emir unites in his person the civil and the military power, and receives his investiture from the Turkish Pasha. He collects the tribute which the Mount pays to the Porte: this tribute, called Miri, is imposed on the mulberry-trees, the vines, the cotton and the corn. The emir keeps no regular troops, but retains in his service a long following of clients. In case of war, every man capable of bearing arms must serve. Throughout the Levant, the Druses are spoken of as bold, enterprising, and brave even to rashness. They are excessively touchy on the point of honor, and never pardon an injury. Their domestic morality is extremely severe: they have only one wife each, but they may repudiate her and marry again. Infidelity on the woman's part is punished with death, and that by the hand of her own relations. The husband sends her back to her family with a poignard which he received from her on the wedding day. The father of the brothers cut off her head, and send the husband a lock of bloody hair. The maxim of the Druses is, "Blood always follows dishonor." The authorities never interfere in these acts of domestic justice.

The origin of the Druses is a matter of controversy; one of the national traditions makes them the descendants of a European colony left in the East after the Crusades. It is not rare to hear them boast of belonging to the Gallic race; but it is probable that, like the Maronites, they are an Arab tribe of the Desert, who, having embraced one of the religious parties which arose in the East at the time of the great Mussulman schism, fled in the mountains, and entrenched themselves there, to avoid persecution. As to their religion, that word can scarcely be applied to the corrupt mixture of Mussulman dogmas and Pagan superstitions which constitute this people's creed. The Druse practise neither circumcision, nor fasting, nor prayer; they observe neither feasts, nor times of abstinence. They are divided into two castes, the okkals or initiated, and the jahels, or the ignorant. The highest order of okkals are distinguished by white turbans. It is said that the secret assemblies of the initiated, resemble the ancient mysteries of Eleusis. Ten marriages of brothers and sisters is permitted. Their call-worship appears clearly established by M. de Sacy, in his great work on the religion of the Druses. They have great faith in amulets, which represent to the initiated masonic signs. An Englishman stuck one of these symbolic relics in his button-hole, as if it were a decoration, and showed it to a Druse chief who happened to be in London. The Druse turned white with rage, and told the Englishman that if they had been on Mount Lebanon he would have killed him on the spot. In short, the most marked character of this people's religion is, that it accommodates itself to any circumstances. The Druses are true Pagans. They will consent either to be baptized or circumcised, in case of need; but at the bottom they remain Druses, and nothing but Druses. Whenever the Mount is not threatened by foreign domination, the Druses turn oppressors, and persecute the unhappy Maronites. Just now, they carry fire and flame into the Christian villages; and to conciliate the Porte, they offer to turn Mussulmans, exactly as they once turned Christians to expose the protection of the European powers.

Such are the two races of men, whom the Turks, instead of governing, oppose face to face, until the feebler party shall be exterminated. Mehemet Ali did govern them with an iron hand. It is to be hoped that some one else will soon undertake the task.

TRIAL AND DEATH OF SOCRATES.

The personal reasons for his prosecution are not far to seek. Anytus, a politician, and in power, was one of the assailed; and, besides, he had a private grudge, because Socrates had advised him to train up his son for some other profession than his own, which was that of a leather-dresser; and Plato shows us that he had gone away in fierce rage from the conversation recorded in the Meno. Lycon was a public doctor, and Meletus a bad poet, who had come in for a share of the ridicule of Aristophanes; both had their full share of exposure from Socrates, as he went his rounds searching for wise men. The indictment was fixed in a public place called the King's Portico; and, on one morning, Athens had a new theme for talk, as a crowd of the citizens, with various emotions, stood around a tablet on which were the following words:—

"Meletus, son of Meletus, of the Deme of Pitthis, lays this charge against Socrates, the son of Sophroniscus, of the Deme of Alopece.

"Socrates is guilty of crime. He does not acknowledge the gods whom the state acknowledges, and he introduces other and new gods. He is also guilty of corrupting the youth. The penalty—Death."

HIS DEFENCE.

The day of trial soon came. The friends of Socrates, who had urged him to prepare before hand, were present; and it is even said, that one had prepared a speech for him, and also that Plato had commenced a defense, but was not permitted to proceed. But Socrates had been warned by his Monitor to abstain from preparation, from which it appeared to him that it was good to be undefended. His accusers opened the pleadings against him, by expanding the charges in the indictment, and urging some of those arguments to which we have referred above; and then came that noble reply, which in substance, if not in the exact words, Plato has given us. After enumerating all the sources of discontent against him that occurred to his mind, Socrates proceeds to refute the charges by positively denying the justice and truth of the representations, and reason of that peculiar course of life which he had led. Then turning to Meletus, he proceeds, by his usual course of cross-questioning, to prove that his charges of corrupting the youth, and irreverence towards the gods, are contradictory and absurd, and goes on to declare, that he will not desist from his course, even with the doom of death before his eyes. He then refers to the acts of his public life, and calls to witness against him, if they will, those whom he has trained, but who are all at his side as friends. One passage in this grand defence reminds the Christian of another scene, enacted nearly four centuries and a half subsequently, in the council chamber at Jerusalem; and though we hasten to close, we must not withhold a brief extract. He supposes his judges to set him free on condition that he shall cease from his accustomed course, and thus replies:—

"If, I say, you should dismiss me on this condition, I should reply:—O Athenians! you I love and cherish, but I must obey the God rather than you; and so long as I breathe and have my faculties, I can not desist from seeking for wisdom, and exhorting you, and urging to those of you who come in my way, and saying what I have been accustomed to say: O excellent friend! can you, being an Athenian, a citizen of the first and most famous of cities for wisdom and power, help being ashamed while you make riches your highest aim, and reputation, and distinction, and give no thought nor care to the pursuit of truth, and the improvement of your soul? And if any one argues with me, and says that he does care for these things, I shall not go away, nor quit my hold of him; but I shall examine him and test him; and if he does not appear to me to have acquired virtue, but only to say that he has, I shall reproach him as thinking most of the smallest things, and least of the greatest. This I must do to all, young and old, who come in my way; and to strangers and citizens; but to the citizens most, as being more nearly connected with me. For this is what the God orders me to do, ye well know. And I do not think that any greater good can be given to the city than my obedience to the God."

The closing words of his defence, in which he deprecates all supplication to his judges, as an endeavor to persuade them to violate their oaths, and thus effectually teach them that there were no gods, are thus nobly uttered:—"I believe in the gods as none of my accusers does; and I leave it to you and to God to judge concerning me as may be best for me and for you." Such a grand and unbending style of defense could not succeed, and accordingly we find that, when the votes were taken, there were 281 for a verdict of guilty; the minority was 275; so that he was condemned by an excess of six votes. Another course of defence might have saved him; but no other would have been suitable to his character. According to their law, he was then required to propose an alternative penalty; and here again his conviction of his being a benefit to the city makes its appearance. He proposes that, he shall be supported in the Prytaneum at the public expense, as the due return from the city for all his self-denying labors for its welfare. But then, thinking that this might appear too proud, he passes others in review, such as imprisonment, or fine, or exile, or keeping quiet, and speedily rejects them all. Plato and a few others, however, induced him to propose a fine of thirty minæ; which is done, and again the votes are collected for the penalty, when the sentence of death is carried by the majority. Socrates, nothing moved, addresses to his judges a few more words, in which he discourses on whether death is an evil or not, urging some probable reasons why it should appear to him a good, expressing the conviction that it is better for him to die, and have done with the things of this world; yet intimating in his closing words, that no certain conviction to this effect was wrought in his soul. "And now it is time that we separate; I go to die, you remain to live; but which of these comes to the better result, is hidden from every one but the God."

HIS NOBLE BEARING.

"When he had finished his defence," Xenophon informs us, "he went away with a radiant look, and a steady step, such as suited the tone which he had taken." He comforted all around him, assuring them that his death was only what must be at some time. Under ordinary circumstances the execution would have followed soon after the sentence, but the festival of the Theoria, in which a sacred vessel was sent to Delos, intervened; during which, until the return of the vessel, it was not lawful to put any one to death. Socrates was, therefore, imprisoned for thirty days; and this time was spent in his first efforts at poetry, and in conversations with his friends. One of the latter, the Crito, translated in this volume, shows that a man should obey the laws, even when they seem to be against him. It professes to be an argument of Socrates in reply to his friend Crito, who urges him to escape. We have not time to dwell upon it; but hasten to the closing scene. At length the vessel returned; and on that morning many of his friends assembled to see him, and converse with him for the last time. They found his wife there, whose passionate lamentations soon led to her removal; when Socrates, full of cheerfulness, entered into conversation, with his friends; the results of which (perhaps, with much addition) Plato has left to us in the Phædo. The entire discourse turns upon the question, which was so doubtful when he last addressed his judges, the immortality of the soul, and its final destiny. We can not enter into a description of this argument now, or attempt even the most condensed analysis; but refer the reader to the volume before us, from which he will obtain a clear and compressed view of the whole. It is a singular kind of discourse to occupy a man on the day of his death; but it has a parallel in Baxter's Dying Thoughts. Both display the same keenness of logic and severity of metaphysical argument, each suited to the style of the time. One of the chief arguments used to prove the soul's continued existence is, the supposition of its pre-existence; an argument which most writers regard as purely Platonic, and not such as Socrates could admit. But are we so sure of this? Is not that doctrine of reminiscence, by which Plato proves the pre-existence, contained in germ in the profession of Socrates, that he followed the art of his mother; that he was not a bringer of truths to men, but simply assisted at their delivery of truths of which they were already pregnant? It Socrates did not treat the doctrine of reminiscence as Plato has expounded it, at least the disciple had the suggestion of the master. And if any one shall object, as some have done, that there is too strong a tinge of enthusiasm in it, let him, but reflect, and he will find such an enthusiasm to be a characteristic of all the highest order of minds. We have no objection to allow that Plato expands and polishes his master's thoughts: but we have the strongest objections to allow, without any authority than has yet appeared, that all must be Plato's except the barest, baldest commonplace. This doctrine of pre-existence, whether true or false—and we certainly are not its advocates—is a main pillar in this argument, and in the arguments afterwards adduced on the same subject by Cicero, in the Tusculan Questions. Nothing can exceed the calm certainty with which Socrates, in this conversation, expresses his conviction of the soul's immortality, and that it is good for him to die. It does not lie in particular passages, but pervades the whole. When Crito asks about his burial, he playfully replies: "Even as you will, if only you can catch me, and I not give you the slip;" and after he had taken a bath, bidden farewell to his wife and children, and drunk the poison, still cheerfully talking with his friends until he felt the death-cold reaching his heart, he said to Crito:—"Crito, we owe a cock to Æsculapius; discharge it, and do not neglect it;" and then breathed his last. By these last words he conveyed his undying conviction, that he was leaving behind him a world of trouble, and a body of disease, to realize unmingled health and felicity: using for illustration the custom of persons on recovery from sickness, to sacrifice a cock to Æsculapius, the god of health. No other interpretation of these words is in harmony with the whole context; no other possesses the slightest rational claim to our regard.

HOPE OF IMMORTALITY.

Thus died this great man, favored by God in his last moments with a light of immortality never, so far as we know, vouchsafed to any other pagan man. We have diligently searched for a testimony, in all pagan antiquity, of that living hope, blooming in the season of distress, and affording increasing comfort as the hour for its realization draws near. Poets sang it, and Socrates tells us it was the belief of some; but where are the thinkers who had a firm conviction of it? Aristotle speaks of death as "most terrible, as putting an end to all things;" that "neither good nor evil can happen to any man after it;" and that "it is absurd to say that a man can be happy after death, since happiness consists in activity." Cicero, who argues from the ground of Socrates respecting the pre-existence of the soul, but goes farther, and speaks of it as unoriginate and unborn, reaches but a trembling conclusion, calling the doctrine of immortality "the surmise of future ages;" and declares that what he shall speak of it has only the likelihood of truth, and that he would deliver nothing as fixed and certain; and after adducing the opinions of several philosophers, he concludes by saying even of these, it was a great question." But even this shadow of a shade of conviction, formed amidst the amenities of his Tusculan Villa, and the circle of admiring friends, forsakes him when the day of calamity falls upon him, and leaves him, as his letters to his friends abundantly prove, utterly helpless and comfortless. Seneca speaks of immortality as "that which wise men promise, but do not prove;" and Pliny, who perished, A.D. 79, in the eruption of Vesuvius, says, "that neither soul nor body had any more sense after death than before it was born;" and after some sad remarks on the miseries of men, he adds:—"The vanity of man, and his insatiable longing after existence, have led him also to dream of a life after death. A being full of contradictions, he is the most wretched of creatures; since the other creatures have no wants transcending the bounds of their nature. Man is full of desires and wants that reach to infinity, and can never be satisfied. His nature is relic, uniting the greatest poverty with the greatest pride. Among these so great evils, the best thing God has bestowed on man is the power to take his own life." Plutarch, his contemporary, says, that "to restrain men from evil ways, they must be kept under the superstition of the dread of hades;" but to those who have cast off their fears must be proposed "the fabulous hope of immortality;" and that it is one great benefit of philosophy, that it helps to look upon death, which so many fear, "as nothing to us." Such expressions of thinkers the most eminent in all pagan antiquity, successors too of Socrates and Plato, prove but too clearly that philosophy has failed to strengthen or sustain man's natural convictions or spontaneous aspirations after immortality; that the arguments even of the Platonic Socrates were insufficient to that end; and naturally lead us to the conclusion that He who "brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel;" who lighteneth every man that cometh into the world, and whose increase of gifts is in proportion to the improvement already made, had, by His forerunning rays, touched the soul of this faithful man in his unjust imprisonment with the light of that grandest consolation, and led him to welcome death as the passage from sickness to health, from trouble to repose and joy.

LIFE IN JAPAN.

In the following extracts of a letter from R. H. Dana, Jr., to the New York Evening Post, the reader has the best picture, we have seen, of the civilization and state of things in Japan.

EFFECT OF FOREIGN TRADE AND INTERCOURSE.

"I was so fortunate as to be able to visit all the ports now open to foreigners—Nagasaki, Kanagawa (which includes Yokahama) and Hakodadi—thus visiting each of the three islands, and circumnavigating the group. The effect of foreign trade and intercourse is already obvious. Kanagawa, the port of Jeddo, and now the chief port for foreign trade, was opened to foreigners in July, 1859. I was there nine months afterward. I found a town grown up at Yokahama with almost the fabulous growth of a California city. What in June, 1859, was a little collection of Japanese cottages, with a few rural temples, farm-houses, and groves on the hill-side, is now a town of some five or six thousand Japanese inhabitants, with streets broad and straight, a strong police, a fire department, street barriers and gates, fire-proof store houses, two moles of solid masonry jutting into the harbor, and innumerable shops for the sale of lacquer work, porcelain copper-enamel, and engravings and cuttings in ivory, wood, stone and crystal, books, maps and pictures and all kinds of Japanese curiosities, as well as the necessaries of daily life, and the solid staples of commerce. All this is the work of Japanese capital and skill. Nor have the foreigners been inactive. They have built and are building, their lodging-houses and fire proof go-downs (store-houses) planting trees and shrubs in their little enclosures, and gathering about them all they can command of Western, or are willing to adopt from the Eastern, civilization.

The French Emperor has taken part in the English war in China, made treaties and established showy embassies and consulates with stalls of cultivated men, both in China and Japan; but as far as I can learn, there is not a French merchant in China or Japan, or a French colonist or householder.

JAPANESE EXPORTS—NO IMPORTS.

Rice is the staff of life in Japan, and its exportation, as well as that of wheat, is prohibited. To China the exports are drugs and medicines, fish, flour, rape-seed oil, sea-weed, and various small articles of food and crockery, passing under the general name of chow chow. The amount of tea exported from Japan the last year is about one million of pounds, and of silk, four thousand bales; and the prices of these articles have risen fifty per cent. in the markets of Japan since July, 1859, to the great advantage of the Japanese producer and merchant. But the trade of Japan is solely a trade of exports. As yet they buy nothing. Lowell and Lawrence, Lyons and Manchester and Leeds are spread before them in vain. Silks and furs and cottons they have of their own, though of their cottons we know but little, and a fabric resembling flannel, but no woolen or linen, and their cotton fabrics bear no comparison with ours. But they are cheaper. The prices alone seem to stand in the way.

Gold, which was so plentiful at the opening of the trade as to be valued but little above silver, giving great profits to the foreign traders, who bought gold koinags for a dollar apiece and sold them in China for four dollars—the gold has now risen to its European value, and the confusion and mistakes of the government as to coinage and currency are coming to an end—confusion and mistakes increased by the unreasonable and fraudulent demands of many of the foreign merchants, and natural enough in a people who had lived by themselves for twenty centuries, trading in oval and square coins of gold and silver, and suddenly found themselves beset by strange round coins, belonging to all nations, with unknown images and superscriptions and varying weights and values.

THE POLITICAL AND SOCIAL SYSTEM.

It is true, indeed, that Japan is still virtually a sealed book. The cover, the preface, and a few uninterdicted chapters alone are open to us. But some things we do know. The world knows that Japan is under a feudal system of the straightest sort and most powerful character; that this is surmounted by a monarchal power, vested in the Tycoon, and somewhat controlled by a Council of State; and that the Mikado, or Spiritual Emperor, believed to be of divine ancestry, has now no secular power. The Tycoon and the great feudatories, the Daimios, own the land which is held under them, in strict feudal service, by subinfeudation—the eighteen greater Daimos moving through the country with trains of soldiers, civil officers and servants, to the number of three, five and ten thousand each, and living in state at Yeddo in three, five or ten palaces at a time.

These princes are the civil and military chiefs, the judicial magistrates, as well as the land owners of the empire. Great as their power is, extending often to life and death, while they have tenants, soldiers, subjects and servants, they have no slaves. There are universities, academies, common schools, degrees in belles-letters and the natural sciences; yet, a military and feudal people, they do not rank learning so high as do the Chinese. The greater nobles, the lesser nobles or gentry, and the civil and military officers and priests, rank first in the order and state there. The doctors of science, medicine and belles-letters rank next, if they have no office; and last of all come the merchants and artisans, forming an inferior order.

Having had no foreign commerce, they have had no class of powerful merchants or manufacturers, and they do not distinguish between these and the retail traders and artizans. Even the common soldier and the common soldier's son with his two little swords, out-ranks them. What will be the effect of an extended commerce on the system? Will it be the old story of cities and burghers and guilds against castles and coronets? Already the effect of the infant commerce is felt in the increase of prices, the demands for products, and the rise in the value of labor. Will this raise the dignity of the merchant, and diminish the retinues of the nobles? It is said that the quick-sighted Japanese are suspecting this, and that a party is forming among the nobles to counteract it. And some suppose that the assassination of the Prince Regent by the emissaries of the Prince of Mito was something more than private revenge. Will the aristocratic institutions fall before these inovations, as in France, or accommodate themselves to them, as in England.

MORAL CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE.

The social and moral condition of the Japanese presents curious problems, and what seem to us to be anomalies. That sense of propriety which suggests neatness in the person and the house, the table and the bed, is to be reconciled with an absence or ignorance of modesty unequalled among any people who have made the first steps in civilization. We are to understand how it is a people who in all cases punish adultery in the wife by death or perpetual ignominy, and in the upper classes even [illegible] wives or, even the gentry and nobles—from the jorogas. No people are more neat in their persons, bathing daily—the poorest of them—in winter as well as summer, and warm baths are as frequent here as drinking shops in England or America. Yet the sexes bathe together, and the baths and the platforms on which they dry and dress themselves are as open to the sight of every passer by as our butchers' shops.

Not only is the veil between the sexes rent, but the veil which protects other decencies of life. The maximum seems to be that whatever is necessary to be done, or is known to exist there need be no attempt to conceal. Again, while you are relieved from the offensive sights of abandoned women who beset the streets of English and American cities, the jogoras are legalized and made as respectable as possible.

SCHOOLS—LEARNED CLASSES.

Though a military, feudal people, yet common schools are provided everywhere and for all. The coolie, hammering stone in the quarries of carrying bales on his back, can read and write, and carries a piece of paper in his bosom and an inkstone and pencil at his side.

The profession of the law and the science of jurisprudence they have not. No intellects trained to forensic life compete with the hereditary or military officials. The magistrate is the political or military officer, and has only the parties before him, and finds the law in a written code, and if not there, in his own breast. The only learned class, except the priests (who are never politicians), are the doctors of medicine, science and belles-letters.

LIMITED FIELD FOR MISSIONARY EFFORT.

Missionaries, strictly speaking, there are none. Since the utter extermination of Christianity in blood and fire, in the 17th century, missionaries have been prohibited. By the late treaties they allow foreigners to build churches and practise their worship within the limits assigned for their residence; but they tolerate no preaching or teaching to the natives, nor the circulation of religious books. Two Roman Catholic clergymen, the Abbe Girard and the Abbe Wernel, are residing in Japan, sent by the society "Les Missions Etrangeres," but confine themselves to learning the language and religious habits of the people, to the removing of prejudices and the gaining of personal influence, in the hope of better days. Two of Bishop Boon's clergy, for the American Episcopal Church Mission at Shanghai, are at Nagasaki and there are two missionaries of the Dutch Reformed Church of the United States.

All these confine themselves within the limits I have named, and so strictly that they do not explain their faith even to a Japanese who comes voluntarily for inquiry, knowing that such an act might peril the Japanese and end their own residence here, or render it useless. The people at home must not delude themselves into the belief that any strictly missionary work is doing or can be done in Japan. No clergymen are of any service here, but scholars and gentlemen—men who can master the language and literature of Japan, get an insight into the genius of its institutions, gain personal influence, remove prejudices, and prepare the way for the future.

MORBID MEMORY.

There are very few thoughtful persons to whom the question has not presented itself, "what is the nature of the operation of that extraordinary psychological phenomenon, memory?" With a very slight effort of will we are enabled to recall, at a moment's notice, long past events with startling vividness. We fold up and carry in our cerebrum the scenes and incidents of years of travel; we summon at will the faces of thousands of persons, who have been seen by us only for a moment; we invert our mental vision, and there upon the tablet of the brain we see as vividly as in a camera, the groupings of scenes that have occurred in eventful periods of our lives. How are all these myriads of images written upon the grey matter of the brain, and so ordered, sorted, and grouped that we can select exactly those we want from the immense store, without disturbing the remainder? Inscrutable as the mystery seems to be, we may yet gather some light from a study of the same phenomena in a state of disease. A very valuable practical work on "Obscure diseases of the brain and disorders of the Mind," by Dr. Winslow (whose researches in the science of mental and cerebral pathology are so well known), some chapters of which on morbid conditions of memory, open to the general reader entirely new ground.

Doctor Winslow is a thorough believer in the indestructibility of mental impressions. Ideas once registered in the brain can never be obliterated, he effaced; they may be latent for the better part of a life-time, masked by succeeding ideas, but under certain conditions are liable at any moment to re-appear in all their magical freshness. But how account for the persistence of memory, if the very tablet of the brain, in connexion with other portions of the body, is continually undergoing change, and with so a certain time is most certainly entirely renewed? How remember, if the very remembrancer is annihilated? In order to explain this apparent difficulty, Doctor Winslow points to the wonderful manner in which family peculiarities are handed down from generation to generation. A certain stamp of nature given by one member of a family will continue through a long descent, as we may see in many a portrait gallery; nay, little peculiarities such as moles, twists of the fingers, a drooping of the eyelids, seem quite persistent. Some persons, for instance, will have certain marks on their nails, which however cut off will continue to perpetuate themselves to the latest moment of life. The natural inference is, that in the process of growth the old and decaying particle is succeeded by a new particle, exactly corresponding with itself. The newer vesicle of the brain thus stamped with a certain image is succeeded by a new generation of vesicles as certainly a copy of that which went before them as a photograph is a duplicate of that which it images. In this manner, in consequence of the wonderful assimilative power of the blood, the brain is always changing, but in a state of health, is ever changeless, and the ideas impinged upon it remain ineffaceable. But when disease commences, it is easily understood what vagaries may arise with respect to the memory. Dr. Winslow's work presents us with some most extraordinary examples of the aberrations thus taking place, which amount to psychological curiosities of the most interesting kind. We are all familiar with the fact, that in the gradual decay of memory in old age, the images of our youth seem revived within us.

The ideas stamped upon the brain in early youth, although long apparently forgotten, come back with the tottering step of second childhood; but there is reason to believe that in certain affections of the brain the memory retreats from us in a sequential manner. Thus, an Italian gentleman residing in New York, and who had acquired the French and then the English language, happening to be attacked with yellow fever, it was observed that in the commencement of his illness he spoke the tongue he had learned last

THE ELDEST SON OF THE CHURCH.

The Emperor of the French, in addition to the remarkable political influence he has attained, has also become master of the PAPAL QUESTION, which, notwithstanding the almost certainty of a united kingdom of Italy, remains enveloped in darkness and mystery. Napoleon is the arbiter of the destiny of the Pope, and what he intends to do with him is a question now painful in the intensity of its importance both to the Protestant and to the Catholic world, and in the suspense with which its definitive answer is awaited. He says he will "protect the Pope in the possession of the immediate city of Rome." But having suffered the political government of the States of the Church to be taken away from him, will he not allow the political government of the City of Rome to pass from his hands also, and protect him only as the spiritual head of the Catholic Church, residing at Rome? There is strong presumptive evidence of the truth of this view. Napoleon is wise enough to know that the temporal power of the Pope is "the abomination of desolation standing in the holy place" "where it ought not" to stand, and sagacious enough to know that his instrumentality in destroying this abomination, at the same time that he supports the Catholic religion, will immortalize his name and reign. He knows also that the absence of liberty of conscience, wherever the ultra Papal doctrine prevails, is the darkest stain upon christian civilization; and he intends, as we think, to be the champion of religious liberty in the Catholic world.

There is also evidence of the truth of this view in the personal relations of the Emperor and the Pope. Napoleon has never been crowned by the Pope; the reason of the delay is, as we understand it, the Pope refuses to go to Paris, and the Emperor refuses to go to Rome. Again, the Emperor recently nominated the Abbe Maret to to be Bishop of Vannes, and the Pope still refuses to permit him to be consecrated. M. Maret is admitted to be one of the most pious and learned men among the French clergy; but he is not an Ultramontist. In his lectures, as Professor of Dogmatics at the Sorbonne, he takes ground against the intervention of the Popes in the general politics of Europe. It was, he says, a very good thing in the middle ages, and served to curb the brutality of semi-barbarian princes, but that such dictation is absurd at the present day. This does not suit the Pope. He holds to the old Popish doctrine that the Roman pontiff has divine authority to exercise supreme control over all the governments in the world, even in the United States, where Protestants have defended him by denying it. Here, there is no political power to nominate a Bishop, and every Romish Prelate in the United States is the Pope's own unrestrained choice, and believes in the doctrine denied by M. Maret, that the Pope has the right to control civil government. This is seen in the fact that while Italian Bishops are supporting Victor Emmanuel in the granting of religious liberty, and while Italian monks and priests are encouraging and even fighting in Garibaldi's army, American Bishops are contending for the temporal power of the Pope, and writing letters of allegiance to that power, while Romish citizens are cursing Garibaldi and Victor Emmanuel openly on our streets, with "gnashing of teeth." And —but, hush! this will be called political partizanship in a religious paper!

FATE OF GEN. WILLIAM WALKER.

All our readers now know that Gen. Walker, after taking Traxillo, was ordered to surrender by Commander Salmon, of the British sloop of war Icarus; that he left with his men, was pursued by the Honduran troops, and that he successfully defended himself; and that he was afterwards forced to surrender to Capt. Salmon, who was accompanied by a force of British marines, and by the Honduran troops under Gen. Alvarez. It must be remembered that Walker surrendered to the British captain, and not to the Hondurans. Yet he was treacherously turned over by this British captain to be murdered by the half-breed barbarians, who curse and cumber that fair portion of Central America. Entirely aside from all questions growing out of the merits of filibusterism, or ont of Walker's claims and course, this was an outrage upon humanity, and upon every feeling common to Americans and Englishmen. Capt. Salmon is the responsible murderer of his brother of the same blood, and that without the shadow of provocation, so far as Englishmen are concerned. His only crime in the eyes of this Briton was his helplessness, he being too brave, and too much devoted to the dream of his life—the regeneration of Central America—to claim the protection of the American flag. Walker's failure in Central America is due to British intrigue, and gold and arms. Next in responsibility for Walker's failure, and for his death, is our own Administration. The secret history of this whole Central American affair, with the motive of Walker, and the relations of the Administration to him and his cause, is yet to be written; but it will be written.

Gen. Walker failed, and died a martyr to his cause, through foreign intervention; as Garibaldi would have done, with similar intervention. Had Walker succeeded, as he would if left alone, he would have been lauded in this country, as Garibaldi is in Europe. But he failed, and, as usual, many are found to denounce him. Had Garibaldi failed in Sicily, as he would have done with similar intervention, the same men would have denounced him. Condemnation after failure costs nothing. No wonder men follow success instead of excellence. The world worships success, and damns failure without regard to motive or principle. Unsuccessful excellence is the world's unpardonable sin. But enough. A regenerated Central America will yet arise as Walker's deserved monument.

THE CAPITAL OF THE KINGDOM OF ITALY.

Italy is now virtually a nation. Victor Emmanuel will soon exchange his present title for one more appropriate to his enlarged dominions. He will no longer be King of Sardinia, nor will he be King of Naples, but he will be KING OF ITALY. Where will be the CAPITAL of that kingdom? Turin was barely important enough to retain its place as the Capital after the annexation of Lombardy, Tuscany, Parma, Modena, and the Romagna. Their respective capitals, at least some of them, were rivals of the insular city of Turin for the honor. Naples is now another important rival for the honor. We can imagine no city so likely to unite all rival claimants in its choice, as ROME, the Eternal City itself. Garibaldi, though he has proclaimed the annexation of Sicily and of Naples to Piedmont, declares that he "will only proclaim Victor Emmanuel King of Italy from the heights of Rome itself." This is significant. It implies that the temporal government of the Pope, after all, is the great enemy of Italian liberty, unity, and nationality, and that until that is broken down, the work is but partially accomplished. "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is DEATH." It implies also that in Rome, the seat, for a thousand years, of the Power which claimed the crown and the keys of heaven, earth and hell; which claimed the control of all the kingdoms and governments of the earth; which claimed to govern and dispose of the minds, consciences, relations, pursuits, and bodies of men, whether living or dead; that Rome is the proper Capital of the new Kingdom of Italy, established upon the basis of civil and religious liberty.

AN INCENDIARY JOURNAL.

The Christian Advocate and Journal must be utterly reckless from superabundance of religious bile. In an article on "Rev. Anthony Bewley," it quotes from our article of some weeks since on the "Conspiracy in Texas," and prefaces the quotation by saying that, in the extract, we are "alluding to such men as Bewley and his colleagues." At that time, we had not heard of the Bewley affair at all. We expressly alluded to none others than the conspirators who were inciting the negroes to insurrection, arson, rape, and murder, and had supplied them with arms and poison. The existence of the conspiracy is beyond question. Are "Bewley and his colleagues" "such men"? Then, though it is said he was not, yet he ought to have been hung. We have not expressed any opinion on the alleged hanging of Bewley. We determined not to do so until we were certain of the facts. Had he been hung, upon conviction of connection with the conspiracy, he would have suffered as justly as John Brown did. Had he been hung upon mere suspicion, because of his being a Northern Methodist minister, it would have been wrong; yet, the fact that such ministers, when laboring officially, in slave-holding territory, are not above suspicion, is a sad shame upon the Northern Methodist Church. We doubt, however, if the Christian Advocate and Journal would not have spoken just as it has even if Bewley had been hung upon clear conviction of conspiracy. "Mobocracy" would have been its cry. And if Bewley had not been hung by the people, but according to the sentence of a court, still, the court would have been charged with being the mere instrument of the "guilty and bloody spirit of slavery!" There is no honesty in abolitionism; and English abolitionism, naturalized in America, is simply the "remains" of the toryism of the Revolution. The Christian Advocate and Journal, under present auspices, would not condemn John Brown to-day, nor justify his execution.—Would it? It has been asked again and again to define its position in reference to these things, and we now repeat the request.

WOMAN'S "PECULIAR INSTITUTION."

A FEW WORDS ABOUT SEWING MACHINES.

We have long believed that the invention of the sewing machine was one of the greatest blessings conferred by providence upon a laboring world. It is, for women, what the steam engine and the telegraph are for men.—Because it does not benefit men directly, its praises have not been proclaimed like those of other inventions. It only benefits the women! How many lives might have been prolonged, and made more comfortable, among our hard-working grand-mothers and great-grand-mothers, if they had had the benefit of the sewing machine. We have always held a sort of romantic theory that in the higher civilization of "the good time coming," God's plan was that white women were to be relieved of all servile work. When their appropriate culture shall be understood, and shall have become common, and they shall take their appropriate places in the family, at the fountains of christian civilization, where personal grace shall lend its help to refinement and piety, they shall (so we had dreamed) be freed from those hard, wearing, and inappropriate conditions of servitude to which they have been peculiar to barbarian ages, and from which christian civilization has been gradually liberating them.—This was our dream, but we did not see how it could be realized. Our benevolent system of slavery—benevolent alike to black and white—would accomplish it, for the rich, but what would accomplish it for the poor? When the sewing machine was invented, we saw our way clear.

This is the first time we have ever said anything about sewing machines in our whole editorial life. We have delayed, because we had never owned and tried one.—And we delayed to own and try one, for the reason that the invention had not been perfected, and, consequently, many who had bought were disappointed. At last we have, after much examination, found one that will certainly not disappoint any one that tries it. It is the WHEELER AND WILSON MACHINE. We have not a word to say against others. But we know this will satisfy. It is simple in construction, easily understood, rapid in operation, does not get out of order, and makes an unexceptionable stitch. We speak from experience, and for the benefit of our friends throughout the country. If your wife has not a sewing machine, send to S. H. Peck, 120 Canal street, New Orleans, and get her one.

MR. ARTHUR'S BOOK.

REV. MR. ARTHUR'S book on Italy is receiving high consideration in England. The London Morning Post says:—"This volume, which was issued but a few days ago from the press is well worthy of the most careful study by all to whom the fate and fortunes of the most interesting people in Europe are objects of especial regard. We have no personal knowledge of the writer, but his pages reveal an intimate familiarity with both Oriental and Transatlantic scenery and manners. He is well known by his missionary labors in Mysore, and his volume itself contains the most satisfactory evidence that he is in the habit of regarding modes of opinion and belief, widely different from his own, in that spirit of calm and comprehensive toleration which, whilst it in no degree detracts from true Christian zeal, incalculably enhances the opportunities of true Christian usefulness. On the value of the official documents illustrating the work, and the opportuneness of their publication, this journal possesses a more than ordinary right to speak. They are entirely extracts from the voluminous evidence on the character and policy of the Papal Government, collected by the decree of Farini, the Dictator of the Æmilia—a work only undertaken after its necessity had been strongly and repeatedly urged in our own columns. As to the narrative portion of the book, the author considers that its merit lies in reporting the opinions of persons of all classes, utterly freely to a stranger, who, not being a person of consequence, was the more likely to hear their real views. Now a work written of such a country, at such a time—a faithful picture of Italy in Transition—a work honestly complying with the self-imposed condition of reporting the opinions of persons of all classes, is absolutely invaluable."

REVIVALS.

Rev. J. H. Mims writes us of two protracted meetings in Southern Louisiana; one at Cane ne Torture Church which resulted in 22 conversions and 30 additions to the Church; and another at Plaquemine Brule, resulting in 6 or 8 conversions and several additions to the Church. These meetings were held by Revs. J. W. Mann, D. Watkins, Henry White, C. A. Frazee, and others. We rejoice to find the good work extending in South as well as North Louisiana.

Rev. C. C. McCrary writes us of an interesting meeting at Mount Pisgah, La., resulting in several conversions. There have been 75 accessions to the Church.

Rev. B. L. Gale writes us of a most gracious revival at the camp-meeting on Belmont circuit, Alabama Conference, at which 75 were converted and 53 added to the Church. Truly, Bro. G., and Belmont circuit, have cause for joy and gratitude.

THE FRENCH PROTESTANT PRESS.

The French Protestant Press, says the Methodist, though far inferior to the English and American in extent of circulation, in material resources, or in popular influence, is yet a great power in the community, and is rapidly growing. Each of the State Churches (the Reformed and the Lutheran) has its organs; and as the Reformed Church is divided into the orthodox and the rationalistic parties, there is a newspaper to represent each of these tendencies. The organ of the orthodox Reformed is L'Esperance, a quarto weekly of eight pages, (price $1 80 per annum,) edited by Dr. Grandpierre.—To give our readers an idea of how very different a thing a French religious paper is from an American one, we state the contents of L'Esperance for August 10th, 1860. The first page is taken up with an Appeal in Favor of the Christians of Lebanon, by Dr. Grandpierre. The three following pages contain a trenchant review of Humboldt's correspondence with Varnhagen von Ense. Half the journal is thus taken up with two articles.—The whole of the next page is devoted to the dedication of a new church in a provincial town. The remainder of the sheet is taken up with correspondence, (one letter,) three book-notices, and a collection of news items, chiefly religious. The whole could be condensed into a page or a page and a half of fine type in the Methodist. But it must be confessed that our French contemporary has one advantage over most American journals: every word in the paper is in its place; every article is thoroughly well written; and there is nothing which any well-informed reader would wish to skip.

So much for externals. The spirit of L'Esperance is excellent. It contends for orthodox truth, and for practical and experimental religion, with steady consistency, but is not bitter or severe in its controversy with the rationalism that infests the national Church. M. Grandpierru is a man of the purest character; an excellent preacher and pastor, and a cultivated scholar. He is a man of peace, but at the same time is a man of truth. The Reformed Church holds him in deserved honor as its chief pastor in Paris; and indeed his name is held in high esteem among all religious denominations in France.

The organ of the rationalists in the Reformed Church is Le Lien, a weekly of four small folio pages, (price $1 80 per annum.) It contains about one fifth of the matter given in a number of the Methodist. The number for August 25th, 1860, is distributed as follows:—The first page gives an article by Reville, a Protestant pastor in Amsterdam, on "modern theology." Next follows a review of Saisset's Philosophie Religieuse, occupying a page and a half. The rest of the paper is devoted to correspondence, (one letter,) and to a column of items (four items). The Lien is edited by the younger Coquerel, (Athanasius,) and boasts of its "liberality" of spirit and management. It abounds in vigorous and spirited writing; devoted (alas!) to what we can not help considering a very bad cause. Thus Reville's article, in the number before us, makes a statement of the "substance of modern theology," which might pass for a summary of the doctrines (or no doctrines) of Theodore Parker. It denies the inspiration of the Scriptures; the doctrinal infallibility of the New Testament; the doctrines of the Trinity, incarnation, original sin, redemption, and eternal punishment. On the other hand, it affirms the religious inspiration of individual men; the immanence of God in his works, pantheism; the revelation of the word in the world, in nature, and in history;" the final restoration of all men, etc. These he calls the positive doctrines of "modern theology," to vindicate it from the charge of being a bundle of negations only.—The Coquerels do not go so far in infidelity as Pastor Revilla. Yet we find in the number before us no word of dissent from his statements, nor a word of commentary upon them. A liberal journal truly is Le Lien.

The Independents (Union des Eglises Evangeliques) have an excellent organ in the Archives du Christianisme, edited by the Rev. F. Monod, (eight-page folio sheet twice a month, price $1 60.) The distribution of the matter is very much the same as in the journals above mentioned. The paper boldly advocates the largest religious liberty, maintains evangelical doctrines in the true sense, and urges the need of experimental piety as the only salt and stimulus of the Church. It opposes the union of Church and State with great earnestness, but cultivates friendly feelings with the ministers and members of all the Churches.

French Methodism is represented by L'Evangeliste, (monthly quarto, eight pages, price seventy cents a year.) It does not give so much of its space to controversy, and to scientific theology, as the Protestant journals above named, but aims (as true Methodism does every where) to spread Scriptural holiness through the land. The number for September 1st, 1860, contains a neat abstract of the doings of the last General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America, and also of the last English Wesleyan Conference. It is now edited by the Rev. J. Hocart, but as that excellent minister is soon to leave Paris, the journal will hereafter be conducted by the Rev. Lue Pulsford. The Evangeliste has already found its way into many American families, and we commend it to our readers, as affording pleasant family reading and a good exercise for children in French.—It costs, here, postage and all, one dollar a year. We shall be happy to receive and forward subscriptions.

There are also several journals, published in Paris in behalf of special religious interests. For Missions, the Journal des Missions (once a month) and the Petit Messager des Missions, (once a month.) For Sunday-schools and the youth, the Magasin des ecoles du dimanche and the Ami de la Jeunesse, (each once a month.) For orthodox theology, the Revue Chretienne, a monthly octave of 64 pages, edited by E. de Pressensé, (price $2 a year.) The number for August, 1860, contains articles on "The French Moralist," "Jeanne D'Albert," "Bacon and Materialism," with a copious list of book-notices, and a good summary of religious intelligence, home and foreign. A new journal, La Croix, (eight pages, twice a month, price 70 cents.) is the best printed of all the papers named. It is devoted to "the spread of the Gospel, and the revival of Christian life in the Church."

Besides the Paris publications, there are a number of provincial journals devoted to the interests of Protestantism. L'Eglise Reformee is an 8vo of sixteen pages, appearing twice a month at Nismes. It contains, like most of the French papers, a practical department and a literary department—the former generally consisting of some edifying essay or biography, and the latter of criticism. The Bulletin du Monde Chretien, published at Fontainebleau, (monthly octavo, twenty-four pages, $1 a year,) is the echo and representative of the "Evangelical Alliance" in France. The Temoin de la Verite (eight pages, 4to, twice a month, price 80 cents a year) is published at Saintes, and is an earnest advocate of evangelical religion. Another paper of the same class is La Vie Chretienne, Beaumont, twice a month, 70 cents a year;) and still another, the Bulletin Evangelique de la Basse-Bretagne, published at Brest, (monthly, 60 cents a year.).

We shall hereafter give a somewhat detailed account of the Roman Catholic press of France. Journalism there, as here, is, next to the pulpit, the great moving power of the age, and it is a matter of interest to all intelligent men to get accurate information as to its character and influence.

REV. DR. DIXON, the English Methodist who visited this country a few years ago, is now totally blind. He continues to preach regularly. He is one of the first men among Methodist preachers in Great Britain; and he sympathizes deeply with Southern Methodism.

AUTHORS AND BOOKS.

Nothing in literary criticism is meaner than a rash accusation of plagiarism. Some years ago the London Athenæum, a journal which has long been noted for the virulence with which it pursues a luckless author who has incurred its displeasure, devoted many columns for several weeks to what it called the plagiarism of Alexander Smith. It cited several hundred passages from a great number of poets, from before Shakespeare to the present time, and opposed these to passages from Mr. Smith's poems. In some cases the language was nearly similar. In others the same idea, or kindred thought was differently treated. In yet more no resemblance could be detected by any but the jaundiced eye of an angry critic. And thus it was proved that Alexander Smith was a more vulgar thief (?). Not at all, I think—for if anything was proved by such an amount of perverted research, it was either that the unfortunate Smith was as patient a man as his reviewer, and had sat down basely to manufacture spurious poetry, which not even his critic would have been absurd enough to maintain, or else the more reasonable conclusion, that two men, thinking poetically in the same direction, are not at all unlikely to happen innocently on the same thoughts, which, if they both treat in the best manner, can scarce fail of being expressed in ways and language so far similar as easily to alarm the jealous rage of a "lly-dirt critic," as this species of animal has been called.

Not long ago the London Saturday Review, a very readable, but frightfully smart paper, after praising justly Mr. Parke Godwin's History of France, as an able, exhaustive, and eloquent work, proceeded to accuse Mr. Godwin of plagiarism, and cited, to prove its charge, half-a-dozen passages, done over six lines, in which it found some phrases or expressions, common enough, in themselves, but which some other historian had used before Mr. Godwin. It seems almost laughable—such a charge so absurdly maintained; but it ceases to be laughable when you remember that the character of a literary man is like the credit of a bank, which the whisper of an ignoramus, or the insinuation of a blackguard may temporarily shake.

To charges such as this the best writers in all languages are easily subjected, and the wider a man's range of thought and the greater his power of expression, the more likely he is to incur the suspicion of this class of small critics. Just now these gentry are much outraged at discovering that Lord Macaulay's celebrated "New Zealander," whom they have all used on every imaginary occasion, as the most picturesque representation of the year 3,000 (when, I hope, "lly-dirt critics" will have become extinct animals), that this gentleman did not in fact originate in Macaulay's fervent brain.

A Mr. W. Bolton writes to the London Times to expound as follows a new theory of the origin of the celebrated passage:—"The publication of the articles on the 'Wellingtoniad' and on Mitford's 'Greece,' containing the first supposed sketches of the New Zealander, was in 1824, when they both appeared in Knight's Quarterly Magazine for November. The writer seemed fond of his illustration, for we find it again repeated in 1829 in his first article on Mill (works i., p. 314), and again in the famous passage in his review of Austin's Ranke, in 1840, which, to use his editor's words, 'was the subject of allusion two or three times a week in speeches and leading articles,' and still does occasional duty. Now, sir, honor to whom honor is due; and after reading the following passage your readers will see that that honor is due to another, no other an one than the lamented poet Shelley, who, in Dec. 1819, five years before Macaulay's article on Mitford appeared 'Peter Bell the Third' to T. Brown (Moore):—'In the firm expectation,' says he, speaking of the longevity of the poem in question, 'when London shall be an habitation of bitterns, when St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey shall stand shapeless and nameless ruins in the midst of an unpeopled marsh; when the piers of Waterloo-bridge shall become the nuclei of islets of reeds and osiers, and cast the jagged shadows of their broken arches on the solitary stream, some transatlantic traveller will weigh everything in the scales of some new system of criticism, and the merits of the present work be recognized. I am, &c.' It has been for a long time a matter of surprise to myself that such a complete, but perhaps unintentional transcript of the ideas and words of Shelley by Macaulay should not long ago have been pounced down upon by the critics." Of course; only they did not happen to be ready to pounce upon the lion till he was dead. Another critic asks—Where is the germ of the preceding passage to be found? Most likely in the following lines of Kirke White, published many years previously:

> "O'er her marts,
> Her crowded ports broods silence; and the cry
> Of the low curlew, and the pensive dash
> Of distant billows breaks along the void;
> Even as the savage sits upon the stone
> That marks where stood her capitol, and hears
> The bittern booming in the woods, he shrinks
> From the dismaying solitude."

And then goes on to say Lord Macaulay was not the only illustrious author who had a similar idea. The celebrated Sismondi was thoroughly a master of the English language, and in his "History of the South" will be found the annexed passage. We adopt the translation given by the Edinburgh Review, vol. xxv., p. 54:—"Who knows, if some centuries hence, this same Europe, where the reign of literature and science is now transported—which shines with such lustre—which judges so well of times past—which compares so well the successive influence of ancient literature and morals, may not be deserted and wild as the hills of Mauritania, the sands of Egypt, and the valleys of Acatolin? Who knows whether, in a country entirely new,—perhaps in the high lands, where the Oronoko and the Amazon collect their streams—perhaps in the now impenetrable inclosures of the mountains of New Holland—there may not be formed nations with other morals, other languages, other thoughts, other religions; nations who shall again renew the human kind; who shall study, like ourselves, the times past, and who, seeing with surprise what we have been, and have known, what they shall know—that we have believed like them, in durability and glory,—shall pity our impotent efforts, and shall recall the names of Newton, of Racine, of Tasso, as examples of the vain struggles of men to attain an immortality of renown which fate denies them." We do not say that the thoughts contained in the above were suggested by the following lines of Kirke White, but they are so similar in spirit, if not in form, as to make the comparison between them a literary curiosity:

> "Meanwhile the Arts, in second infancy,
> Reeling some distant clime, and then, perchance,
> Some bold adventurer, filled with golden dreams,
> Steering his bark through trackless solitudes,
> Where, to his wondering thoughts, no daring prow
> Hath ever plowed before,—espies the cliffs
> Of fallen Albion. To the land unknown
> He journeys joyful; and perhaps descries
> Some vestige of her ancient stateliness!
> Then he, with vain conjecture, fills his mind
> On the unheard-of care, which had arrived
> At science in that solitary nook,
> Far from the civil world; and sagely sighs
> And moralizes on the state of man."

It seems a pity that this only mixes up the matter. For now, seeing it is quite impossible for even a convention of small critics to determine who stole from who and which is to be the thief.

In literature there is little news. Messrs. Tribner & Co., of London, have just published a work in the Spanish language, which is of interest to American collectors, and all interested in the history of America. The title is: "A Collection of the Titles of all the Maps, Plans, Views, &c., relating to Spanish America, Brazil, and the Adjacent Islands, chronologically arranged, and preceded by an introduction upon the Cartographical History of America, by E. Uricoechea, M. D., Ph. D., Professor of Chemistry, in the College of Our Lady of the Rosary, &c., &c." Its title, however, gives no good clue to the contents. It is, in fact, an annotated catalogue of a vast number of maps, plans, &c., relating to South America. There is, for instance, a full account of 178 maps of America in its entirety; 61 maps of North America; 100 maps of California, Florida, and Texas; 235 maps of Mexico; 285 maps of the Antilles; 120 maps of Central America; 150 maps of South America in general; 130 maps of Guayanas; 179 maps of New Grenada; 53 maps of Venezuela; 20 of Ecuador; 193 of Brazil; 16 of Bolivia; 138 of Peru; 119 of the Argentine Confederation and Uruguay; 126 of Chili; and 126 of Patagonia and islands in the Pacific. The dimensions of these maps are in most cases specified, and any peculiarity in them pointed out and minutely described. This valuable work was commenced by its author in Brussels, then enlarged in Spain, and finally completed in Paris.

Charles Hemans, the son of Mrs. Hemans, the poetess, has just published in Florence, but in English, a work with the title, "Catholic Italy: its Institutions and Sanctuaries." The "part" now issued treats of Rome and the Papal States.

The new work of Timothy Fitcomb's, New York, will be issued in October: T. T——r. e., Dr. J. G. Holland, seems likely to become the Martin Farquahar Tupper of America. I hope he will "blow over."

Messrs. M. Ellinger & Co., of New York, who deserve mention for keeping the most curious and really valuable stock of old books in foreign and ancient languages to be found in the United States, have issued a prospectus in which they state that they are now printing a new edition of the Babylonian Talmud, with all the Commentaries. This new edition will not only contain the full corrected text of the Mishnah and Gemarah, and all the Commentaries contained in former editions, but also modern ones, as the Mecharshar, Mebraun, the annotations of Akiba, Eger, Maimonides, etc., and also the compendium of the Babylonian Talmud, by Alphasi. The work will be published each month, at three dollars per volume.

Their new catalogue of second-hand books in Arabic, Ethiopic, Hebrew, Syriac, Turkish, the classical languages, and the languages of modern Europe, is now ready for gratuitous distribution. Messrs. Ellinger & Co. have also for distribution a catalogue of pamphlets printed between 1515–1525, which are interesting and valuable as giving contemporaneous information concerning the Reformation by Luther, Melancthon, Zwingli, and other actors in that drama.

Messrs. Rudd and Carleton have in active preparation editions of the first English translations of Michelet's famous books, which have breathed a new life into the study of Natural History. "The Bird" (L'Oiseau) and "The Insect" (L'Insecte). They are from the skilful hand of Dr. J. W. Palmer, to whom M. Michelet's "Love" and "Woman" were indebted for their presentable English dress. The forthcoming works are amenable to one of the objections sometimes urged against the two last mentioned books. They combine the highest results of scientific investigation with the brightest and tenderest traits of an imagination, which proves that if M. Michelet were not one of the first historians, he would be one of the great poets of the nineteenth century. He has a family connection with America, his father-in-law residing for a long time in Louisiana, where he was a naturalized citizen, and married a Southern lady.

According to the last Leipsic Catalogue, which has just made its appearance, 380 new books were published in Germany during the first six months of the present year.

Mr. Bentley is preparing for publication a work full of interesting gossip about the fashionable and literary is the autobiography of Mrs. Delany, a name familiar to the readers of the Diary of Madame D'Arblay, like whom she was attached to the person of Queen Charlotte. Born in 1700, a daughter of Bernard Granville, afterwards Lord Lansdowne, she married en secondes noces Dr. Patrick Delany, the once well-known writer and intimate friend of Dean Swift. Mrs. Delany's birth, connections, and court employment qualified her to be the historiographer of fashion, and her literary tastes led her to correspond with the intellectual celebrities of more than one generation, for she died at the advanced age of eighty-eight. Her letters were much admired in her life-time, and those to Mrs. Frances Hamilton, published in 1821, are full of interesting anecdotes of the royal family. The volumes which Mr. Bentley is about to publish will include her correspondence with many of the most distinguished personages of the eighteenth century, and will comprise letters from Swift, John Wesley, Young, of the "Night Thoughts," &c., &c. The work will, in fact, be a supplement from a lively female pen to the Walpole correspondence, published by Mr. Beatley. It is to be edited by Lady Llanover.

Agricultural Capabilities of the Pacific State—Sacramento—Old Acquaintance—Camp-meetings—Methodist Singing—An Inviting Field.

The time will come when California will be as distinguished for her fruits and agricultural products as for her mineral wealth. Her mines seem inexhaustible and doubtless new discoveries are yet to be made, but her capacity for cereal crops is very partially developed. Lands which yield from thirty to fifty bushels of wheat per acre and from seventy to eighty bushels of barley, are too remunerative to lie idle long. As a grazing country, it has declined and will continue to decline. The wild oats once so luxuriant have deteriorated in height and quantity. The increase of stock, and close mowing, in a few years more will exterminate them. When the new open valley shall be inclosed, and the labor of the skilful husbandman shall be applied to her soil, this Pacific State will become the granary of the world. Her exports of wheat will astonish those who have thought of her only as the land of gold. Much of the precious metals which her people dig from the gulches and the mountains, and which she sends to the East by the million every month, will return to her coined and stamped and ready for use.

Considering the length and breadth of this great country, there are but few large streams, and yet well nigh all the most interesting points of the State may be reached from San Francisco by water. Her bays, rivers and creeks and lakes, are all more or less navigable. The waters of Feather River are so constantly plied with boats that at the lowest stage navigation continues, for the water and sand are so mixed that they are always fluid enough to allow a passage. On one of my trips up the river, the boat was ploughing along through a sand bed, with only a few inches of water upon the top, when I remarked to the Captain, that he was certainly making his last trip for the season. He replied, by no means, we never cease to run on this river; if, however, no boats were to pass in two days, and thus give time for these sands to settle, it would all be over with us till the rainy season comes on. But you see, sir, we keep moving and keep things stirred up, and so we can always squeeze along.

Sacramento is a beautiful city of 15 or 20,000 inhabitants. It is built on a plain running back from the river, and in location, size, wide streets, buildings and trees, greatly resembles Augusta, Georgia. This was the first point in the State I visited after our arrival, and here I met different times I spent several pleasant days, formed new and renewed old acquaintances. To Capt. Littleton and family, we are indebted for many kindnesses on our first visit and indeed every succeeding one. We were strangers and they took us in and treated us on all occasions with generous hospitality. Much to my surprise, I found an old pupil of mine, Mrs. Harris now, formerly a Miss Bryan of Ga., and her husband and herself would have me to spend some time with them. Old acquaintance made this habitation more like home than ever the heartfelt kindness of entire strangers could do at other places I used to parsonage and preachers I found another home with Bro. and Sister Evans. All these and others gave more than a cup of cold water, for Christ's sake, as well as through courtesy, to a stranger—the Lord reward them an hundred fold here and forever.

I attended seven Camp-meetings in California and was deeply interested in them, not only as a Minister looking to great moral results, but as a man who, familiar with such gatherings in the east, saw them here under new aspects and surroundings.

Camp-meetings here are very unlike any thing of that name elsewhere. A place is selected near to water if possible; if not a running stream, wells or pumps are brought into requisition, and the next essential is a grove of live oaks. These are necessary that, with their umbrageous tops, they may help to form an arbor in the first place, and then they are convenient to shade the tents. The grounds are not laid off square or oblong, or indeed in any way. They are innocent of all shape. One man pitches under one tree, another under another, and so on; the thickest shade is chosen for the preaching place and the preachers' tent is always just up to the pulpit, "the stand." If among the interlacing branches, there are any breaks through which the sunshine streams down, some brushes or planks are put up, seats of various kinds are provided, straw laid down and all is ready. The tents are made by setting a few poles about eight feet long in the ground and surrounding them with cotton cloth. If the shade of the tree is not dense enough, cloth or brush or planks is put on the top. There are but few tenters, seven is the most at any one place I visited; three, two, one and none, and yet the congregations were large at all of them by day or night. The P. Elders, I believe, generally carry their own tents. Some of the preachers too I noticed had tents of their own, and carried sticks, cloth and all in their buggies. To feed the people two arrangements prevail. In some cases, the people in the circuit furnish the provision and hire a man or men to cook, and every body eats at the same table, free of cost, to the eaters, but at a heavy expense to the providers. These meetings cost from seven hundred to one thousand dollars. At another place a public tent is put up, and a contract is made with some man to furnish the table at so much a head, say twenty-five cents a day, and this I believe is the more common method.

Another peculiarity of these meetings is, that a time is set to begin without any understanding as to the time of ending. They last from four to fifteen days, according to circumstances. I attended one where the P. E and a visiting preacher were the only tenters, and the preacher in charge was the cook for the whole congregation. The irreligious people of the neighborhood furnished the provisions. Many of these things seemed to me very awkward and inconvenient, but I soon became accustomed to them and really enjoyed them. They strikingly illustrate the old saying, "where there is a will there is a way." The preachers and people in C. have a will to work for God and by all means to save souls, and like Paul not waiting for things "made ready to their hands," they got at it careless of time or expense or inconvenience. The blessing of God rests upon them like dew. I have seen the power of God upon the people in awakenings, conversions, and in the baptism of the Church. On these occasions, there is a heartiness, a freedom from constraint, a free gushing or religious emotion that is refreshing. A false and foolish civilization has not yet crushed out all the pious independence of the life, and the free enjoyment of spiritual influence without "progress" of the times. It would "regenerate our camp-meeting time preachers to hear the singing about the altar at one of those extemporaneous Camp-meetings in California. It is not a fossil, but a living type of the better days—what Beecher calls "genuine old Methodist thunder." A little more of the same sort in the east, would reform the false taste, the pernicious fastidiousness of those who are doing their best to deform the singing of our people.

As it comes in my way, this is as good a place as any to say, that to substitute the praise of God by music is as wicked as it is unmethodistic. The difficulty with us is not want of science, but want of religion. This is the secret which underlies all our complaints. I have seen many a dumb Church grow vocal with song—while revival fire was burning. No education in notes, no artistic training of the voice will supply the lack of heartfelt piety where God is to be praised. A courageous, free, lively religion will always find expression in the simple melodies of the Church, while operatic music—stiff, formal, soul-less singing will freeze and kill "the things that remain, that are ready to die." Pardon this digression. The religion of our people in California is of the right kind, active, fearless, stirring. They can weep without shame, sing and pray without constraint, shout, defying the world and the devil. The only capital defect is one incident to their circumstances. In the midst of a new country, the people excited by gold and speculation, surrounded by novel scenes and circumstances, society unsettled, sometimes transient, in many places perpetually changing, the Church has not been as systematically organized as it ought to be. The most of the preachers, too, have been inexperienced, untrained themselves and of course have relied upon revivals and protracted efforts here and there to the neglect of discipline, class-meetings and the indoctrination of their converts. (A change for the better is begun and I trust will go on to perfection.) I mention this here not because it is a fact merely in California, but because it is to my judgment a common error. We lose in one way very much of what we gain in the other. On this point I hope to enlarge before very long, for I think it vital. My main reason for the statement above, is to show the necessity of sending more experienced men to the Pacific Conference. There is not in the bounds of Southern Methodism a more inviting field than this. No place where a man can do more permanent good in a greater variety of ways. Men, educated men, men of long and varied experience, who understand our Church polity, and deeply imbued with the love of Christ, can do immense good, by training the preachers, preaching to the people, as a counsellor in Church enterprises, in Conference business, in moulding the institutions of an incipient empire.

Before I am done writing and talking for California, brethren will find out that I am in earnest. I have lost this year by chill and fever, but my spirit in relation to our interests there knows no chill, and my desire to help our struggling Church on the Pacific coast keeps up to fever heat.

EVANGELIZATION IN ITALY.—The whole of Sardinia, including the duchies of Parma, Modena, and Tuscany, with Lombardy and the Romagna, is now open to the Bible and Protestantism. There is a population there of eleven millions, to whom a pure and free Gospel may at once be carried. In order to give form and vigor to the work of evangelization, a new organization has been made, entitled the "Italian Church." It has at its head two excellent men, the Rev. Dr. De Sanctis of Turin, and Rev. Signor Muzzarelli of Genoa. The latter was once a lawyer at Naples; the former was once a great favorite of the late Pope; both are excellent men, and will exert a good influence in shaping the action of the new Italian Church, which is extending its operations very greatly.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

OCTOBER 10, 1860.

REV. J. A. CLEMENT'S BOOK.

Mr. Editor—I have been favored with the perusal of a new book on Baptism, now passing through the press, at Nashville, by Rev. James A. Clement, of the Alabama Conference.

The book is intended especially for the common people, and is in many respects well adapted to its purpose. The writer is, by his antecedents, the very man for the work. He has mingled with the people and knows their wants; has met the enemy not only in the open field, but has chased many a guerilla chief from his ambush in the Chaparral; knows not only the writings of the leaders, but, what is more to his purpose, all the methods by which they compass sea and land to make one proselyte."

Baptist writers have been very fond of quoting the admissions of Pedobaptists against themselves. This is a two-edged sword that may cut both ways. The reader will remember the old adage, "those who live in glass houses ought not to throw stones."

Mr. Clement can use heavy guns, but he is impatient of the restraints of the camp, and the slow movements of the "regulars;" he evidently prefers, in advance of the regular army, to put himself in the midst of the enemy, seize captives and bear them rejoicingly into his own camp. Many such excursions he makes, and returns unharmed, and with the spoils of victory. We will give two specimen quotations, the latter of which is also a specimen of the argument ad hominem, and must be judged accordingly; for it must be remembered that the polemic writer has more license here than elsewhere. If the guns of the enemy are captured, he is stopped from complaining if they should be turned against himself.

He begins with the Baptist claim to antiquity, and shows that if they assign the regular line of succession from John the Baptist, they have no less paternity in Judaism, and ought not to blame others if they find a warrant for infant baptism in the same source. Moreover, to make good their claim, that they are regularly descended from, and have right to the name of, Baptist, they make an amusing exhibit of philological dexterity. "Baptist" means immersion; "baptize" means to immerse; and "in Jordan" means immersion. Putting the definitions together, we have, "John the immerser, immersed immersion." How one should think this too silly to believe, let him ask the Baptist pastor "if Baptist means immersion, if baptize means immerse, and if in Jordan signifies immersion," and he will soon be satisfied. There is an argument that Baptists have been wont to parade as unanswerable. Assuming that baptism signifies a burial, they say, "If you sprinkle a little sand on the face, could that be called a burial?" He retorts, "who ever saw a Baptist minister plunge or dip a man. Why, say you, I have seen it many a time." Now have, have you? Well, let us see. The preacher led the subject down into the water until it was about waist deep, then he plunged or dipped him. Just so. But stop a moment. Did he dip or plunge the lower part of him, say from the waist down to the feet? Maybe you had never thought of that before in all your life. But, say you, "the person was wet all over." Wet all over? There now, is that another meaning of baptize? Wet all over! Well let us try the meaning of "to baptize" will occur in the Bible: "He that believeth and is wet all over shall be saved;" "I thank God that I wet all over many of you, except Crispus and Gaius, &c."

Sometimes the writer is diffuse, and some of his expressions are not to my taste. Its literary blemishes will not, however, hinder its accomplishing, to a large extent, the object of its publication. It will circulate and do good, where more methodical and rigidly logical works could not find access.

Finally, we could not in the short space we have allowed ourselves do him justice.

WM. A. MCCARTY.

* Rev Wm. P. Harrison, in "Theophilus Walton," uses this, and it was addressed before, by that able writer on baptism, Rev. Mr. Newton, of Mississippi. We have known personally, that reading the learned work of Mr. Harrison, quote this as the best remembered and most striking argument in the book. Thus far Mr. Clement is indebted to those authors, or else he drew from this same source. But from this point to the end of the quotation, he is unique and original.

LAUNER BLACKMAN.

Mr. Editor:—I am an old man and love old things. My book-case contains several good old volumes prized very highly by me. With your permission, I propose to copy a few pages occasionally for the public eye. The book from which I transcribe is, "Extracts of Letters," etc., published by Ezekiel Cooper, and John Wilson, for the Methodist connection: J. C. Totten, printer.—1805

The first letter in the book bears date June 24th, 1800, and the last, July 25th, 1801. One letter dated "Lexington Circuit, Kentucky, March 20th, 1804," signed "Launer Blackman," settles the lately agitated question of that man's name. I give the spelling as it is in the book. I now give one letter of his entire.

"Mississippi Territory, December 17th, 1801.—Brother Barnes and myself left Kentucky Conf., the 4th of October, and arrived at this territory the 4th of November. We had appointments given out. We have visited the circuit, and have found some kind friends and very attentive congregations, and numbers have wept under the word. The Lord was with us at our Quarterly meeting. Numbers I believe were powerfully awakened. We appointed a campmeeting at Washington, in Adam's county. It commenced last Friday, and ended to day.—On the Sabbath, I suppose it was attended by near two thousand people. I have reason to believe that five were converted, and twenty or thirty powerfully awakened at this camp-meeting. Methodism is in its infancy in this country; but I have no doubt that it will prevail in this as well as in other parts of America. The language of my soul is, victory or death. I had rather die than go to a circuit and not see souls converted to God. I can say, here is my time, my talents, my life, and all a sacrifice to promote the cause of religion. In coming to this country we had to endure hardships. We slept nine nights in the open air.—LAUNER BLACKMAN."

With a few exceptions, the letters are addressed to the Bishops. There are others from the Mississippi pioneer preachers. I hope it may add something to the interest already created by the "Colonel Letters," lately published in your paper.

KENTUCKY CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor:—The Kentucky Conference has just closed in Newport. The session was harmonious and pleasant, Bishop Early presiding. The Conference was strengthened by the accession of three excellent young men—all graduates. The report of the educational board was encouraging. Seventy-two thousand dollars had been secured for the college at Millersburgh. This institution will not be opened until next fall. It is needed and promises well. The preachers of this Conference were well paid during the last year, and will now go to their appointments with cheerful hearts. Since I left Alabama, I have been roving extensively and sight-seeing until I am satisfied. In another week I expect to be at my station in Demopolis, Alabama—once more to buckle on the harness.

IMPROVEMENT IN THE ENGLISH CHURCH.—The Established Church in England is increasing its attention to practical piety. Many of the Bishops act in concert also with other denominations, in evangelical, revival services.

THAT SUNDAY SCHOOL PUBLISHING FUND.

Another important reason why we need this fund is, that we may be able to cheapen the prices of our Sunday School books. The complaint is constantly coming up to us, Why dont you sell your Sunday School books as cheaply as those of the "American Sunday School Union?" Our answer is this; We sell them at a mere trifle more than it costs to pay for the type setting, stereotyping, paper, ink, printing and binding. That "Union" sells its own publications, often, for much less than they cost. How can it do this? Because it has just such a fund as that for which we now ask, to draw from, and so pay the difference between the actual cost of the book, and the lower price at which they sell it. Give us this fund, and then we shall be able to do the same. That is, to sell our books below their cost, and to give them away to those destitute schools, which cannot afford to pay anything at all for them.

How much more creditable it would be to Methodists, instead of buying other publications, because they are a little cheaper, to give liberally toward the creation of a Sunday School Publishing Fund of our own, which would enable us to supply our own schools, with our own books, on terms as low as the lowest.

How much will you give towards it? Any sums may be forwarded to the treasurer of our Society, Rev. J. B. McFerrin, D.D., Nashville, Tenn.; or to Charles Taylor, Columbia, S. C., Corresponding Secretary, of the M. E. Church, South.

THE ST. JAMES HOTEL.—New Orleans, growing as rapidly as it has done for several years past, has seriously felt the need of more extensive hotel accommodations. Though blessed with excellent hotels, she has not had enough of them. The erection of the St. James, therefore, is a public benefit. And a splendid hotel it is.—We have visited it and examined it throughout. It is an elegant building, and is most elegantly furnished.—There is, it seems to us, every imaginable arrangement for convenience and comfort, for gentlemen, ladies and children. We doubt if there is a superior hotel in the South. Its ventilation, so difficult, and yet so important in hotels in large Southern cities, is perfect. There is not a room in it which has not both a door into a hall, and a window or windows on the outside. The arrangements for separate reception rooms, parlors, and dining-rooms, is excellent. The bachelor's side of the house is totally separate from that intended for ladies and families. Ample bath rooms, a peculiarly appropriate feature in this climate, are provided. The furniture is rosewood throughout. Situated on Magazine street, not far above Canal, it is convenient to the levee, and to the business portions of the city. It is fortunate also in its proprietors—Messrs. Morse and Moore, the popular managers of the City Hotel. A better place to "tarry for a night," or longer, we are not acquainted with. It will open 12th November.

THE BROOKS HOUSE.—Our old friend Capt. Brooks, will soon have the finest boarding-house in New Orleans. It is situated on Camp street, next door above Odd Fellows' Hall, fronting that most beautiful spot in the City, La Fayette Square. It is five stories high, with large and elegant verandahs in front, and ample dining rooms, for ladies and families, and for gentlemen. It was a favorite house before, it will be much more so since the enlargement, which is now being rapidly completed. It has a large number of airy rooms, which are substantially and comfortably furnished. Capt. Brooks caters for his table himself, and always has as good as the market affords. Good boarding houses in New Orleans are the traveling public, and we take pleasure in mentioning this one.

THE HIEROGLYPHICS OF EGYPT.—It is well known that some remarkable confirmations of disputed historic statements in the Pentateuch have been derived from the deciphered inscriptions of the ancient oppressors of the Hebrew people. It is not so generally known, however, that now every species of Egyptian Hieroglyphic is so well understood that there is no inscription existing of which a true translation cannot, with time and patience, be obtained. This result is one of the greatest triumphs of modern philological research, and is due to the labors of Young, Champollion, Bunsen, and a dozen other investigators, some of whom have spent in this work the labor of more than half a lifetime.

PROTESTANT TEACHERS FOR ROMANISTS.—The Paris correspondent of the London News of the Churches says: "This is one of the peculiarities of our time—Romish parents make it a condition that their children shall be brought up in Protestant principles, which they regard as far superior to their own. I might give instances, but it is a general feeling, pervading thoughtful men of all ranks, that Protestants have an admirable system of education, giving a high sense of honor, a love for home, and a respect for domestic virtues, almost unknown elsewhere! Some of the Professors of Paris colleges have asked what system we adopted that always made our youths the best in their establishments?"

THE PEELER PLOW.—We see it stated in the papers that the profits of Rev. Mr. Peeler's plow for plantations has been thus far $400,000. Of this vast sum nearly $200,000 have been devoted to religious and benevolent purposes by the lucky inventor." One of our New York exchanges says that among Mr. P.'s latest benefactions is the gift of $25,000 to complete the Metropolitan Church of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, Washington City.

MEXICO WILLING TO RECEIVE LIGHT.—We learn that the Rev. Mr. Thompson, Agent of the American Bible Society, has recently made an excursion into Mexico, as far as the city of Monterey, and that he met with a cordial reception in his work of circulating the Scriptures. We understand that he found the way open for preaching the Gospel, and building churches. Should not the attention of evangelical churches be directed to the occupancy of Northern Mexico?

GOLD-HEADED CANES.—A writer in the Memphis Avalanche weeps over the desolations of Zion, and the danger of "souls," because some friends had presented a favorite minister with a gold-headed cane! The Lord have mercy on us! Our colleges are not yet all endowed; the other denominations do not get all the silly ones; Methodism needs a little more age, as well as a little more scriptural knowledge and grace. There is much work to do. We shall be cased "to death," if we are not careful.

FLIGHT OF THE JESUITS.—Like rats in a sinking ship, the Roman Jesuits have been pouring out of Italy for the last few weeks. The new home they seek is Germany, and especially the Kingdom of Wurtemberg, the country of the Schillers, Hegels, and other great thinkers.

FRUITS OF THE REVIVAL IN SWEDEN.—A writer from Sweden says the late revival there has been great and marvellous, and one out of fourteen, or 250,000 out of 3,500,000, are reckoned among the converts.

THE WAR IN CHINA.

Progress of the English and French Expedition—Advance of the Native Rebels—The Emperor Depraved—Curious State of Things in the interior of the Empire.

The special correspondent of the London Times writes from Shanghai on the 5th of July the following latest news from the whole China coast:

The whole British force has reached the rendezvous at Talienwhan. No casualty whatever occurred among the large fleet of men-of-war and transports, save that one of the latter, the merchantman, ran ashore in a fog and escaped without damage. But the Mandarins have driven all the junks and boats up to the inferior, and no fresh meat, and few supplies, can be procured for the large British force which only awaits the signal for action. Up to this moment no blow has been struck, no blockade enforced, no hostile measure taken against "the enemy," since the 27th of June, 1859.

We have no positive data to the number of men at the Taku Forts. These reports have been received from various quarters, and they agree in estimating the Chinese force at not more than 25,000 men. As to the army at Tien-tsin and Pekin, there is no reliable information. The Russian Minister, Gen. Ignatieff, states that the Chinese authorities do not believe that we have an army, and are preparing for an attack from the fleet alone.

The Chinese have succeeded in raising the Cormorant, sunk in the Peiho. They built a boat, into which they transferred the Commander's engines. But, alas! they would not work, and no one could set them going. Sir Sang-ho-lin-sin sent down four watchmakers from Pekin. "You are accustomed to machines," said he; "see if that barbarian machine to work, or I will cut off your heads." The unhappy watchmakers succeeded in lighting the fires and relieving the smoke to ascend through the funnel. This seems to have astonished their taskmaster, for, though the engines are not working, we have no account of the watchmakers' decapitation.

The Emperor is in a state of drunken, helpless imbecility. Among the many curious institutions of China, that of the Censorate is entitled to a high place. The Censors are entrusted with "the care of manners and customs, the investigation of all public offices within and without the capital, the discrimination between the depravity and uprightness of the officers employed in them." These officers exercise the right of reproof with extraordinary candor and plainness, though it is to be feared that their remonstrances are frequently unavailing. Some months ago, the Censor Sieh-yih-ching, addressed a memorial which was published in the Pekin Gazette, and circulated throughout the length and breadth of the Empire. Shortly before his degradation, Hsieh-wei-sing, the Governor General of his province, in conjunction with Wang-yu-ling, addressed a long memorial to the Emperor. They described in piteous terms of the state of the district, with the regular troops disbanded, the rebels victorious on every side, and Shanghai only preserved from assault by the presence of the allied forces.

They then discussed the dispute between England and China with considerable freedom, and in a manner which might have convinced Mr. Bright that there are two sides to this question. Sang-ho-lin-sin they denounce, as "only thinking of defence, and not versed in the history of negotiations and peace. While the commerce of China with the foreigner is a source of advantage to both parties, these quarrels are, on the contrary, a source of discontent to both. That the foreigner has no deep feelings of hostility, is evinced by his affording troops to protect the city." They describe the trade as ruined, the customs revenue as not forthcoming, and the local famine "roaming through the country eager to try conclusions." The only resource they have to suggest is "negotiation of peace without loss of time, so that the English and French may utterly put away hostile feeling. They would then probably lead their troops with whose aid the empire might be relieved from danger. This address was forwarded on the 13th of June, since which poor Ho has been discarded, and remains at Shanghai a prisoner and in chains, awaiting the arrival of his successor, who will send him to Pekin.

The rebels are making steady progress in this province. Indeed, there is no authority to oppose them. They have taken the walled city of Tsing-poo, on the banks of the river, about thirty miles from Shanghai. Rich Imperialists and rebels ravage and pillage the country in every direction; but they will stay their hands before they reach Shanghai. The Europeans are too strong for them, and there is an armed force of some 2000 men available for the defence of the settlement, independently of the Furious and one or two gun-boats.

APPOINTMENT OF A PROTESTANT PROFESSOR AT BOLOGNA.—The Leeds Mercury publishes the following as a "reliable communication recently received from Italy:"—"Our beloved King, Victor Emmanuel, has offered to Mazzarella (a distinguished Protestant preacher at Genoa) the Chair of Philosophy, at the University of Bologna, and I believe that he has already accepted it. Hereby the Kingdom's reward (so to say) for Mazzarella's literary productions especially for his work Critique on Spencer, the object of which is to lead the thoughtful to Christ. Such a fact shows that the object of the book has been understood and appreciated. The Government draws the sword to conflict against the hierarchy by imposing Mazzarella with the instruction of youth at the first university of Italy. Praised be God who prepares great things for poor Italy.

PREACHING AT MESSINA.—A letter from Messina states: "To-day there begins to preach in the Cathedral Church Father Giovanni da Casteivetrano, the same wariior-monk who ever since the battle of Catalafimi, has marched with the Garibaldian troops—and who, with dauntless valor, fought in tremendous ranks of Catalafimi, Palermo, and Melazzo. He is a good, honest friar, well calculated to address the masses. He calls a spade a spade, and particularly he is able to address the people in Sicilian dialect, whilst preachers who discourse in good Tuscan or Roman speech are almost unintelligible. Father Giovani is by no means overburthened respecting the abuses of the Papacy and of the Court of Rome. He preaches Christ's free word, and keeps repeating: 'I shall be glad if I can only reach Rome alive, in order to tell to the Pontiff that the path which he treads is not the path trodden by Jesus Christ.' Father Giovanni's virtues and straightforward honesty cause him to be loved and respected—I might even say venerated—by the whole army.

PRESENT CONDITION OF SPAIN.—Spain has long been looked upon as a used up country. Statistical returns, however, of the population, industry and property of the country, tell a different story. Spain is about twice the size of the State of Missouri, but on this area it has nearly fifteen times the population of that State, nearly fifteen and a half millions. There are four cities in the kingdom whose population exceeds 100,000—Madrid being the largest and numbering 284,150. There are five cities having a population ranging from 40,000 to 70,000. Spain's imports grew from $33,000,000 in 1850 to $77,000,000 in 1859. There are in Spain 431 English miles of navigable canals, 324 miles of railroads finished, 510 miles in progress, and 1576 miles more authorized. There are also 5913 miles of telegraph lines in operation. The public revenue of Spain for 1858 was estimated at $122,000,000; the total expenditure $121,000,000. About 1,000,000 of her children are in schools. The number of religious houses and nunneries has been reduced. A hundred years ago they were estimated at near 240,000, or nine to forty-three of the population. Now they count about 56,000, or one to two hundred and seventy-five.

TERRIBLE EXPLOSION AT PITTSBURG.—A dispatch from Pittsburg of the 21th ult., says that a most appalling calamity took place there on that day, at one P. M. The boiler in the marble works of N. N. Wallace exploded, killing several men—the number not ascertained—and wounding several others. The boiler passed through the building, reducing the back part to a heap of ruins, and striking the front of Robert Barker's clothing store, opposite Wide Liberty street, killed the proprietor, who was standing at the door. His head was nearly taken off. It then passed through the rare wall of the store into Seatz's lager beer hall, which it nearly demolished. A German named Wilpefer, who was in the saloon, was killed. The boiler passed through the halls and landed in the Presbyterian graveyard, back of the saloon.

CENSUS OF NEW ORLEANS.—By the United States returns we have a good idea of what the census of New Orleans is the current year, though the complete report has not been made out. The figures show the following population by District: First District, say 55,000; Second District, say 40,000; Third District, full returns 42,766; Fourth District, say 19,000; total, 170,766.

UNION OF TENNESSEE AND KENTUCKY BY RAILROAD.—There is to be a new bond of union between Tenn. and Kentucky. A railroad has been projected between Louisville and Memphis, and is now completed as far as Clarksville, Tennessee. On Wednesday it was opened. It is thought it will be completed through to Memphis in February.

WHAT THE JEWS HAVE DONE THE LAST YEAR.

The New York Jewish Messenger, of last week, sums up what the professors of the Jewish faith have accomplished during the past year, 5621 of their calendar. The editor says the Journal of Commerce, deplores the "lethargic indifference" which has characterized the Hebrew community of this country, but observes that this indifference is compensated, in some degree, by the establishment of the Board of Delegates of American Israelites, and adds: "The consummation of this measure, with the recent efforts—promising a successful issue—in organize a similar central body among our Italian co-religionists, and to carry out the design of a 'Universal Israelitish Alliance,' we consider a significant realization of the hope we expressed a twelvemonth ago, and—as constituting a great advance towards the union of Israelites throughout the world—we deem these matters of greater importance than a casual observer might be disposed to consider."

A similar hope, remarks the Journal, has been expressed for centuries; the dream of "United Israel" is the one sweet dream of every Israelitish breast.

The Messenger adverts with a spirit of gladness to the progress of liberal ideas and the tolerance extended toward the Jews of Europe during the year past. We here quote again:

"In Great Britain, France and Holland our co-religionists retain the same high standing which, in a free country, they are certain to secure. Distinguished honors have been paid to several Israelitish citizens of these sovereignties. From Russia we have intelligence of continued progress in liberal enactments, and the condition of our community is one of prosperity and advancement. In Poland, likewise, old prejudices are wearing off. Dr. Hirshfield, for instance, has been elevated to an important professorship in the Warsaw University. In Gallicia illiberal measures are yet being enforced. Austria has witnessed some little improvement in the position of her Jewish population during the past year, though whether it is likely to last we have our fears. In Prussia and the minor German states nothing worthy of peculiar mention has transpired, although, on the whole, the condition of things is favorable. The Grand Duchy of Hesse boasts of a Jewish mayor. Our Italian brethren are doing well. In Spain and Portugal Judaism is once more openly practised, where, since the close of the fifteenth century, it has been interdicted."

Jewish literature seems not to flourish here, but two books having been printed in Hebrew on this side of the Atlantic during the year past, though in Europe the Talmuds of Auerbach, Philipsohn, Stauben, &c., are eminently appropriated. A Jewish professor, Stern, is now attached to the University of Gottingen. Three Jewish papers have been started during the year, viz: At Tunis, Mayence and Odessa. The number of papers has decreased in this country, and the Messenger deplores the fact that "but one or two have any influence."

Five new congregations have been organized during the year, viz: "One at Portland, Oregon; one at New Brunswick, N. J.; one at St. Joseph, Mo.; and two in this city. The number of consecrations of new synagogues rather exceeds the average. Places of worship have been dedicated at Fort Wayne, Ind.; Milwaukie, Wis.; Macon, Ga.; Paquenine, La.; Montreal, C. E.; Philadelphia, Penn.; two at Cincinnati, Ohio; Brooklyn, L. I.; and three in this city."

The Hebrew Benevolent Society has established an Orphan Asylum in New York. One also has been established in Charleston, S. C. No mention is made by the Messenger of any other benevolent institutions under Hebrew auspices.

The recent disturbances in Morocco and Syria did not affect the Jews particularly. In Morocco they received a ready protection from Mourish vengeance, and are now peacefully enjoying their usual immunities. In Palestine the Hebrews were not disturbed at all by the contending factions of Moslems and Christians. The Messenger says in closing its summary:

"We cannot claim that our community, as a whole, has progressed as it should. There has been, we are obliged, to our regret, to confess, no improvement in the religious spirit of our co-religionists; and on this point we forbear to speak at length. Their political status is probably better than when we entered on the year which has just come to a close; their social position about the same.

LITERARY GOSSIP.

A VALUABLE WORK.—A valuable contribution is about to be added to the history of our State. The Baton Rouge Gazette says: "We have on our table the first proof sheet of a work now going through the press, from the pen of Hon. John N. Carrigan, State librarian—a translation of valuable MS. documents and papers, relative to the first settlements in the Mississippi valley by the French, including the states of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa and Illinois. From the glimpses we have had of the work during its progress, we feel satisfied that it is the fullest and most complete history of the aborigines, their manners and customs, laws and religion, that has ever yet found its way to the press. The work is to issue from the press of Bloomfield, Steel & Co. . . ."

Decided to the Lord Jesus Glory, which is exciting great interest, "Hunting Down," will appear almost simultaneously in England and America.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, October 8, 1860.

Our market generally has exhibited but little animation during the past week, though the business in Cotton forms an important exception to this remark, the movement in that staple having been stimulated by the apprehension that the crop has suffered extensive injury from the violent storm which passed over our City and neighborhood on Tuesday, the 2ears, thus far, being justified by accounts from a portion of the Cotton region. The Sugar crop is reported to have been greatly damaged, and Planters in some sections, have suffered additional heavy losses in the prostration of their sugar-houses, purgeries, &c. In Tobacco very little has been done during the week, and the transactions in Sugar and Molasses continue on a very limited scale. Western Produce of nearly all descriptions has been dull, and in Grain we have noticed a considerable decline.

COTTON.—With respect to prices we have to notice considerable irregularity in the range, especially for the middling and the lower grades, which form the bulk of the supply, while the better qualities have been held rather firmly at our previous quotations, even running lists of clean Cotton, of good quality and staple, generally selling freely at the outside figures, and occasionally above them, and low-running lists, especially when containing dust, much leaf, being difficult of sale at the inside rates, or even less.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	— @ —	Good Middling	11¼@11⅝
Ordinary	7 @ 8	Middling Fair	11⅝@12

The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ⅛ to ¼c per pound.

☞ MRS. WINSLOW, an experienced nurse and female physician, has a Soothing Syrup for children teething, which greatly facilitates the process of teething by softening the gums and reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants. We have put up and sold this article for over ten years, and can say to the world and feel confidence and truth of it, what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—Never has it failed in a single instance to effect a cure, when timely used. Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medical virtues. We speak in this matter what we know, after ten years' experience, and pledge our reputation for the same, after ten years' experience, and pledge our reputation for the truth of what we here declare. In almost every instance the infant is suffering from pain and exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered. This valuable preparation is the prescription of one of the most experienced and skilful Nurses in New England, and has been used with never-failing success in thousands of cases. It not only relieves the child from pain, but invigorates the stomach and bowels, corrects acidity, and gives tone and energy to the whole system. It will almost instantly relieve Griping in the Bowels, and Wind Colic, and overcome convulsions, which, if not speedily remedied, end in death. We believe it the best and surest remedy in the world, in all cases of Dysentery and Diarrhœa in Children, whether arising from teething or any other cause. We would say to every mother who has a child suffering from any of the foregoing complaints—do not let your prejudices, nor the prejudices of others, stand between your suffering child and the relief that will be sure—for we absolutely assure—to follow this medicine, if timely used. Full directions for using will accompany each bottle. None genuine unless the fac-simile of CURTIS and PERKINS, New York, is on the outside wrapper.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

From the Press, Philadelphia, Aug. 1, 1860.

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE.—To have a favorite piece of china chipped or broken, a pet book with its binding torn, a nice piece of furniture fractured, is a terrible and temper-destroying nuisance. Not without remedy, as we can testify. Mrs Spalding's Prepared Glue, which is advertised in The Press to-day, can affect a remedy. We recently devoted several hours to its practical application—a sofa, two carved chairs completely restored, many odds and ends of china and glass made fit for use, a tattered map made as good as new, several dog-eared copies rescued, and an old fable edition of Herodotus and Homer printed in the year 1500, whose antique boards (literally boards) were split, made strong enough to last for another century or two. We might have mended any quality of children's broken toys, but carved in after an odieg an hour over the worst

Children's Column.

"NIL DESPERANDUM."

MEDAL SPEECH DELIVERED AT EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE, VA., JUNE 5, 1860, BY D. H. PARKER.

Life has been beautifully represented as a vast and fathomless ocean, bearing upon its bosom the fierce conflicts of mortals, and ever hurrying on man, with his stupendous achievements, from age to age, to the port of his destination. Nor is its bosom always unruffled, nor its tide always trustworthy; as on its main is lashed by the furious tempest, and oft beneath a silvery surface lies a monster more destructive than were the fabled Symplegades to the unwary mariner.

Then he who would ride unhurt upon its boisterous current must embark with a ship well manned, determined to be dicomfited by no lowering tempests or unpropitious gale, but like the prudent and undaunted pilot, mocking every danger that would intimidate him, with crowded canvass move gallantly on to the desired haven; or else he is foredoomed soon to be lost sight of, or to be borne along by the resistless current.

Energy is now the great watchword of all human attainments, and truly has it been said, "he that is born without energy at this day, is born too late." It is that strong and unconquerable spirit—that Titan of the soul—which, grappling with dangers and laughing at impossibilities, has given to the world its benefactors.

The warrior, animated by this sublime principle, has stood without faltering amid the shock of battle, saved and founded empires, and won victories, in the very jaws of defeat. The statesman has established and organized governments, given to the world its laws civil, political and religious, and bound together the whole human family as one common brotherhood. The philosopher it has introduced into the great laboratory of nature, conducted him through all its labyrinthian ways, pointing out new beauties and grander problems, until he stood amazed and contounded at the unfolding wonders of creation.

"Nil Desperandum" has been the talisman and constant watch-word of all the army of the great and good who have stood forth to vindicate the rights and promote the welfare of the human race, and is worthy a place in the vocabulary alike of the most youthful aspirant and of the prondest sage. Its elements are, an unbending will, an unyielding tenacity, a firm and decisive purpose, such as is ascribed to the beautiful ideal of Longfellow—

"A youth who bore 'mid snow and ice,
A banner with the strange device,
Excelsior!"

He mounts the ragged Alps, his brow, though sad, gleaming with the light of lofty thought; his step firm and elastic; through falling snows, along unseen paths, midst intense darkness, beside the most horrible chasms, cheering his spirit and startling the ear of night with his battle cry, "Excelsior!" and proving himself superior to the love of ease, the blandishments of passion, and the sternest ontward difficulties,—finally attains its lofty summit, to him the maximum of all human excellence; and, with an air of pride and triumph, surveys beneath its awful gorges past, and himself the hero of the feat.

"Nil Desperandum!" To this sublime sentiment may be traced all those mighty achievements which stand as landmarks along the receding highways of the past: the triumph of christianity over the darkness of heathenism, the scoffs of infidelity, and the mandates of a haughty and corrupt priesthood; of liberty over despotism; of science and philosophy over the foolish medioys of a superstitious age. For it was not till the immortal Luther, inspired with this sentiment and the divinity of his cause, had thundered his philippics in the face of the Roman Pontiff, and challenged the hellish tortures of the Inquisition, that "the bolts of paganism were broken, the pope's bulls harnessed, and Catholicism made to recede before the resplendent light of our holy christianity."—Nor was it till our own immortal Washington, "proclaiming his faith in Divine Providence, and the ultimate success of his cause, had bearded the English lion in his den, and anbjugated the most powerful nation on the globe, that the jubilees of freedom were sounded, and a "government erected developing combinations of beauty and strength which has become the study of statesmen, the hope and delight of the friends of liberty throughout the world." Nor yet was it till Kepler and Galileo had brooked successfully the tides of drudgery and poverty, the ridicule of a court, the denunciations of the Romish Church, yea, the clanking chains of a dark and gloomy dungeon, that they stood before the world, its great intellectual Pharos, the expounders of truths which have heralded their names and their fame to the remotest corners of civilization; and 'this same unconquerable spirit, this moral heroism, has given birth to all that line of illustrious worthies who have lived to bless mankind, whether they scaled the rugged steeps of philosophy, or electrified nations with the flashes of their eloquence, or enraptured the world with the charms of poesy, or attained that eminence only by the resolutions of an unconquerable will, which knew no such word as fail.

Nor is it less true of our own boasted age. The electric wire, the power of steam, the strength and symmetry that pervades our institutions, all proclaim the workings of that same herculean energy that has marked the progress of the world from its earliest dawn; so that even now he who would reach that height where "fame's proud temple shines," must have inscribed and emblazoned upon his shield and his banner, and stamped in ineffaceable characters upon his heart, "Nil Desperandum!" ever reminded that—most wrapt in clouds and snow;

Ha who surpasses or subdues mankind, must look down on the hate of those below;
Though far above the sun of glory glow, and far beneath the earth and ocean spread,
Round him are icy rocks, and loudly blow contending tempests on his naked head.

THE INDIA-RUBBER ARTIST.

We have all of us laughed at the grotesque appearance made by toy heads of vulcanized India-rubber. A little lateral pressure converts its physiognomy into a broad grin, whilst a perpendicular pull gives the countenance all the appearance that presents itself when we look into the bowl of a spoon held longways. The pressure removed, the face returns to its normal condition. Of the thousands of persons who have thus manipulated this plaything, it perhaps never struck one of them that in this perfect mobility lay the germ of a very useful invention, destined to be, we believe, of great practical value in the arts. If we take a piece of sheet vulcanized India-rubber and draw a face upon it, exactly the same result is obtained. This fact, it appears, struck an observant person, and out of his observation has sprung a patented process, worked by a company in London, under the name of "Electro Printing Block Company," for enlarging and diminishing at pleasure, to any extent, all kinds of drawing and engravings. It must be evident that if a piece of this material can be enlarged equally in all directions, the different lines of the drawing that is made upon it in a quiescent condition, must maintain the same relative distance between each other in its extended state, and be a mathematically correct amplification of the original draft. The material used in a sheet of vulcanized India-rubber, prepared with a surface to take lithographic ink; this is attached to a moveable frame work of steel, which expands by means of very fine screws. On this prepared surface lines are drawn at right angles; these are for the purpose of measurement only. The picture to be enlarged is now printed upon its face in the usual way, and, supposing it is to be applied four fold, the screw frame-work is stretched until one of the squares formed by the intersection of the lines measures exactly four times the size it did while in a state of rest. It is now lifted on to a lithographic stone and printed, and, from this impression, copies are worked off in the usual manner. If the picture has to be worked with type, the enlarged impression has, of course, to be made from block-plates, the printing lines of which stand up like those of a wood-cut. This is accomplished by printing the picture with prepared ink, upon a metal plate. The plate is then subjected to voltaic action, which eats away the metal, excepting those parts protected by the ink. The human hand, with unlimited time, could never reproduce such fac-similes. Where it is required to make a reduced copy of a drawing, the process is inverted; that is, the vulcanized India-rubber sheet is stretched. In the frame before the impression is made upon it. It must be evident, that on this being allowed to contract to its original size, it will bear a reduced picture upon its surface, from which the copies are printed.

The application of this art to map-work is very apparent, as well as to engraving of every kind; and, moreover, it can very profitably reproduce types itself in an enlarged or reduced form. This is a fact of great importance to Bible societies, for enormous sums are spent in producing this work in all imaginable sizes. The clearness and beauty with which a page of type can be reduced is such as will surprise any one.

But, it will be asked, what advantage does this method present over a resetting of the page in the usual manner? Two very important ones—speed and price. Let us suppose, for instance, that it was desired to make a reduction of a royal octavo University Bible to a demy octavo. The price in England of resetting the type alone would be £800 and the "reading for corrections" another £300 at least. Now, an identical copy could be produced by the process employed by the "Electro-Printing-Block Company" for £120; there would be no charge for "reading" as the copy is a fac-simile. Where there are many rules, marginal notes, and different kinds of types, as in Polyglot Bibles, the advantage of reproducing by the India-rubber process would be of course proportionately greater. Any society possessing one standard Bible, have thus within their reach the means of bringing out as many different sized editions as they like, from the large type fitted for the eyes of very old men, to the diamond editions that require a microscope to read them.

We may mention another power possessed by the new method, which will prove very valuable for publishers. It sometimes happen that when a new edition or work is called for, some of the original blocks, or stereotyped impressions, are to be found wanting. Heretofore drawings and engravings would have to be made; but now all this difficulty is obviated, by simply taking the page out of the old book, and reproducing the block required from it. This actually occured with respect to the well-known work "Bell on the Hand," the missing blocks of which have been reproduced from some old printed pages. It is scarcely known yet how many centuries may elapse ere the lak of old books becomes so dry that it can not be transferred by the new process; but it is quite certain that a couple of hundred years does not so far dry it as to render it incapable of giving an impression so that we may have the earliest folio copies of Shakespeare's plays reproduced with exactness, in more available sizes, through the medium of a few sheets of India-rubber. It seems the other day since this extraordinary substance performed the solitary duty of rubbing out pencil marks; now there is scarcely a manufacture in which its agencies are not employed, and it bids fair, as we have shown, to revolutionize one branch of the fine arts, and to add largely to the sum of enjoyment among the refined and educated classes of society. When the first savage tapped the India-rubber tree, how little did he dream that the turgid stream that flowed from the bark was destined to work such changes in certain branches of trade, and to add a new and most important civilising agent to the pale-faced nations!—Once a Week.

CONSUMPTION CONTAGIOUS.

Eminent French, English, and American physicians advocate the doctrine that "consumption is catching."—Morgagni, one of the greatest medical lights of his time, was such a firm believer in the opinion, that he never would assist in the examination of a person who had died of the disease. Some of the most distinguished writers, as well as some of the most celebrated and successful practitioners in that disease, have eventually died of it themselves, among whom were the great Laennec, Mortan, Wooster, and not forgetting the empiric St. John Long (so said).

A large number of persons evidently consumptive will be found on inquiry to have had a husband, wife, sister, or child to have died of that disease. Statistics seem to show that a wife whose husband is consumptive is more liable to consumptive disease than a healthy husband with consumptive wife; the reasons of this, if true, will suggest itself to the thoughtful.

Introducing the matter of small-pox into the system prevents small-pox. Laennec, inoculated himself with consumptive matter, but it did not "take." He subsequently died of consumption himself. He made this experiment to show that consumption was not inoculable.—MM. Alberti and Hilett thought that cancer was not communicable by the matter of cancer, and to prove it they tried to inoculate themselves with it, but it did not take. Both of them died afterward from cancer.

It is most probable that consumption is not of itself communicable, that it cannot beget consumption in one who has vigorous health and is perfectly free from all taint of the disease. But if any person who has not a vigorous constitution, whether inclined to consumption or not, lives, eats, and sleeps with a consumptive, as a man and wife do, as a sister is apt to do with a consumptive sister, or a mother with consumptive children, such persons will very generally die of consumption themselves, not from its communicability per se, but from the foulness of the atmosphere about a consumptive, from warm rooms, decaying lungs, large expectoration, sickening night-sweats, and bodily emanations; but the same amount of exposure to air made foul in any other way would light up the fires of consumption in one of feeble vitality or broken constitution. It is best, therefore, that the nurse of a consumptive should possess the most vigorous health, and to make assurance from infection doubly sure, the most scrupulous cleanliness possible should be observed and carried out in every conceivable direction, extended to every minutiæ, and maintained with the most inveterate constancy through every hour of the twenty-four, not allowing any excretion, not even a single expectoration, to remain about the person, bed, or room, for one instant. An incessant ventilation should be going on in the chamber, the best method for which, under most circumstances is simply to keep a fire on the hearth and an inner door open. Even in midsummer, this is better for the patient as well as for the nurse, than a room closed all the time from an almost insane dread of taking cold.—Hall's Journal of Health.

THE MONEY KING.

A French writer thus speaks of the Baron James Rothschild: Monsieur de Rothschild is an indefatigable worker. He rises early, looks after his own affairs himself. He receives visitors after he has prepared the day's work for his mirmidons. On certain points he is unbending, but he is a good man, though not easily moved. He has the perspicacity of a man who has made the largest fortune in Europe. His views on financial mattters are always sound; he has a genius for foreseeing events. His judgment of men is unerring, and consequently he knows with whom and how to deal. Nothing turns him aside from a purpose he has once formed; his views are always clear and forcibly expressed. The hours devoted by him to work are occupied until the last minute. He then withdraws himself entirely from business, and resorts to the pleasures of life.

Baron Charles Rothschild, consisting of the Baron James, doubtedly the most royal and powerful of these Israelite European families. They have absorbed most of the gold and silver of the world, and no nation can go to war in Europe without their sovereign permission. They lent the Emperor of Russia forty millions for the Crimean war; they lent the British government seventy-five millions; Turkey, Austria, Sardinia, Prussia, and Egypt have all looked to their pockets for the sinews of war. The Emperor of Austria, at the last accounts, was trying to obtain a fresh supply from this inexhaustible fountain, and even the great Napoleon is eager to propitiate the branch of the house in his empire. It is said that the great banker has been offered the sovereignty of Jerusalem, but having all the sceptres of Europe in his coat pocket, he magnificently disdains the proposition. The Philadelphia American has a story, that the Baron James was quietly leaning against a column in the Exchange (which column from long occupation by him, is recognized as the Rothschild,) when a gentleman of mysterious deportment approached him and intimated that he came from the neighborhood of the Tuileries, to confer with him respecting the disposal of the Holy City. The Baron is said to have replied in terms by no means courteous; in fact, he consigned the ambassador and his master to a place not mentioned to ears polite. It is supposed that he at once perceived a scheme to extract out of his pocket the expenses of the Syrian expedition, on pretence of restoring the Jews. The Baron is not convinced that this is the set time for restoring the Jews, nor has he seen any prophecy which declares that they shall be restored at his expense.

HUMOR AND MUSIC.

When humor joins with rythm and music, nad appears in song, its influence is irresistible; its charities are countless; it stirs the feeling to love, peace, friendship, as scarce any moral agent can. The songs of Beranger are hymns of love and tenderness. I have seen great whiskered Frenchmen warbling the "bonne Veille," "Soldats, au pas, au pas," with tears rolling down their mustaches. At a Burns festival, I have seen Scotchmen singing Burns, while the tears twinkled down their furrowed cheeks; while each rough haud was flung out to grasp its neighbor's; while early scenes and sacred recollections, and dear, delightful memories of the past came rushing back at the sound of the familiar words and music, and the softened heart was full of love and friendship and home. Humor! it tears are the arms of gentle spirits, and may be counted, as sure they may, among the sweetest of life's charities—of kindly sensibility, and sweet, sudden emotion, which exhibits itself in the eyes, I know no such provocative as humor. It is an irresistible sympathizer; it surprises you into compassion; you are laughing and disarmed, and suddenly forced into tears.

I once heard a humorous balladist, a minstrel with wool on his head and an ultra Ethiopean complexion, who performed a negro ballad that I confess moistened those spectacles in the most unexpected manner. They had gazed at some dozen tragedy queens dying on the stage, and expiring in appropriate blank verse, and I never wanted to wipe them. They have looked up, with deep respect be it said, at many scores of clergymen in pulpits, and without being dimmed; and behold, a vagabond with a corked face and a banjo sings a little song, strikes a wild note which sets the whole heart throbbing with happy pity. Humor! humor is the mistress of tears; she knows the way to the fons lachrymarum, strikes in dry and rugged places with her enchanting wand bids the fountain gush and sparkle. She has refreshed millions more from her natural springs than ever tragedy has watered from her pompous old urn.

INCIDENT IN SYRIA.

Just before the slaughter, Abu Monsoor, one of the leading Protestants, a man of faith and prayer, seeing that there was no hope of escape, called out in a loud voice to the assembly, composed of a few Protestants, and multitudes of Greeks and Maronites, saying something like the following words:

"My dear brethren, the time is short. The Druses are coming upon us, and we are all going like sheep to the slaughter. Death is before us, and we shall soon leave this world and stand before God. In whom will you trust? There is no Savior but Jesus Christ. Look to him, call upon him, trust in him, and he will save. Repent and believe, and he will not cast you off. Let every one call on the Lord Jesus, the Savior."

A great multitude of them called out with him to Jesus Christ to save their souls, as none could hope for escape from the the death of the body. Abu Monsoor, and others of the Protestants, then continued, and as Abu Monsoor was praying, he was killed by the Druses, and literally hawed to pieces. Many women were killed by the firing of the Druses upon the promiscuous crowd, though the Druse leaders gave orders that no woman or girl, or boy under ten years should be injured.—The dead bodies lay in heaps, and the few who finally escaped as by miracle, concealed themselves under piles of the slain.

HOW TO PREVENT SORE SHOULDERS IN WORKING HORSES.—An exchange says: "The plan we have tried and never found to fail, is to get a piece of leather, and have it cut into a shape so as to lie snugly between the shoulders of the horse and the collar. This lends all the friction, as the collar slips and moves on the leather, and not on the shoulder of the horse. Chafing is caused by friction; hence this remedy is quite a plausible one, and is much better than tying slips of leather or pads of sheepskin under the collar."

THE INDIAN SUMMER.

Look forth on the forest ere autumn wind scatters
Its frondage of scarlet, and purple, and gold:
That forest, through which the great Father of Waters
For thousands of years his broad current has rolled!
Gaze over that forest of opaline hue,
With a heaven above it of glorious blue,
And say is there scene, in this beautiful world,
Where nature more gaily her flag has unfurled?
Or think'st thou that e'en in the regions of Bliss,
There's a landscape more truly Elysian than this?

Behold the dark sumac in crimson arrayed,
Whose veins with the deadliest poison are rife!
And side by her side, on the edge of the glade,
The sassafras lauel, restorer of life!
Behold the tall maples, turned red in their hue,
And the mascadine vine, with its clusters of blue;
And the lotus, whose leaves have scarce time to unfold,
Ere they drop, to discover its berries of gold:
And the bay-tree, perfumed, never changing its sheen,
But for ever enrobed in its mantle of green!

And list to the music borne over the trees?
It falls on the ear, giving pleasure ecstatic—
The song of the birds and the hum of the bees
Commingling their tones with the ripples erratic.
Hark! hear you the red crested cardinal's call?
From the groves of magnolia?—from tulip tree tall?
The mock-bird responding?—below in the glade,
The dove softly cooing in mellower shade?
While the oriole answers in accents of mirth
Oh, where is there melody sweeter on earth?

In infamy now the cold slanderer slumbers,
Who falsely declared 'twas a land without song!
Had he listened as I, to those musical numbers
That liven its woods through the summer-day long—
Had he slept in the shade of its blossoming trees,
Or inhaled their sweet balm ever loading the breeze,
He would scarcely have ventured on statements so wrong—
"Her plants without perfume, her birds without song."
Ah! closet-philosopher, sure, in that hour,
You had never beheld the magnolia's flower!

Surely here the Hesperian gardens were found—
For how could such land to the gods be unknown?
And where is there spot upon Adrian ground
So like to a garden a goddess would own?
And the dragon so carelessly guarding the tree,
Which the hero, whose guide was a god of the sea,
Destroyed before plucking the apples of gold—
Was naught but that monster—the mammoth of old,
If earth ever owned spot so divinely caressed,
Sure that region of old was the Land of the West?

THE WAY OF THE WORLD.

Man may swear, gamble, profane the Sabbath, be obscene in speech and licentious in conduct—they may abscent themselves from home and spend whole nights in lasciviousness, lust, excess of wine, revellings, banqueting, and abominable indulgences—and yet not lose their place in society, but be recognized as honorable men. But let a woman follow their example, and she is driven, like Eve, from the social paradise. If even the breath of suspicion blow upon her vestal robe, it is soiled. If she lapse but once from the path of virtue, she "falls like Lucifer." No penitence, however protracted, can replace her on the pedestal from which she fell. No tears can wash away the stain upon her fair name. You might as well attempt to reconstruct a broken vase, or to restore the tints and fragrance of a faded flower;

"The white snow lay
On the narrow pathway
Where the lord of the valley crossed over the moor,
And many a deep print
In the white snow's tint
Showed the tracks of his foot-steps to Eveleen's door.
The next Sun's ray,
Soon melted away
Every trace on the path where the false lord came!
But none shall see the day
When the stain shall pass away—
The stain upon the snow of fair Eveleen's fame.

And yet that proud lord will lift his head in society as if he were as pious as an angel, while the victim of his hellish arts is, like Cain, a vagabond upon earth. And even the virtuous woman, who would shrink from her presence as from a pestilence, will give him her hand and heart as if he had never sinned.—Philip Slaughter.

A FEARFUL PICTURE.

The Syrian correspondent of the Boston Traveler writes that more than ten thousand human bodies still lie upon the sides of Mount Hermon, in full view from the Sea of Galilee and the Mediterranean, upon the plains of Sidon, the ancient Phœnicia, blackening in the sun, and their blood still cries out to heaven for vengeance. It is an Oriental custom to leave the murdered dead unburied until justice has been satisfied; and, although in Syria the effect of the climate upon a dead body requires its burial within twenty four hours of the decedies ment's spirit from its earthly tenement, these of preservation. In the court-yards or complete state the barracks, and wherever the Christian has fallen, there lies the body now, still awaiting the vengeance of heaven upon the oppressors and the slayers of the Christians of Mount Lebanon. Without entering into an explanation of the physical causes which have produced this mummification, it is sufficient to say that the testimony of all confirms the statement. Wolves and hyenas have, of course, done their work, but in all inclosed premises the presence of the unburied dead remains a silent appeal to Him who declared, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord."

THE PROSPECTIVE KING OF MADAGASCAR.

The cruel, persecuting Queen of this island, who before the birth of her son had promised to leave the crown to her nephew, a military man and a bitter persecutor, recently became anxious to transmit the kingdom to her son. She resolved to decide the matter in what she and her subjects would regard as the most sacred way, and accordingly had two jars filled—one with earth from her husband's grave, and the other with jewels. She then decreed that the two candidates should come into a chamber where the jars were, and that he who should lay his hand on the jar containing the ashes of the king, should be the future sovereign. The result was that her son, who is a devoted Christian and a friend of the missionaries, having providentially fulfilled the requirement, was immediately recognized as her successor. It is hoped that his life, which has been conspired against, may be spared, that the native Christians of that island, who have had to endure such a great fight of afflictions, may find in him as their king a nursing father and protector.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MARTHA A., daughter of Peter and Sarah Brown, and wife of Z. R. Kea, all of Dale county, Ala., was born May 12, 1832, and died of erysipelas, Sept. 3, 1860. Sister K. was married to her now bereaved husband Sept. 15, 1849, and learns to his care seven little children. She joined the Methodist Episcopal Church at about twelve years of age, and professed religion some time after, under the ministry of the Rev. W. P. Miller of the Alabama Conference. Although she did not make a profession of religion until after she joined the Church, yet her mother thinks she enjoyed it before that time. She was an affectionate wife, a good mother, a kind friend, and an excellent Christian woman. Those who knew her best say that, when a child she was gentle and obedient, and after becoming a Christian "she ever adorned the doctrines of God her Savior in all things." A few days before her death she seemed to be permitted to hold communion with the invisible world: she thought she saw and conversed with her Savior and a little brother who had gone before. From that time she was very happy and frequently shouted God's praise. She took affectionate leave of her husband, children and other friends in hope of meeting them again, ere long, on the other shore.

W. A. MONTGOMERY.

SISTER AMANDA M. WEST, consort of Dr. C. Boggus, departed this life on the 14th inst., at her residence in North Rapides, La., in the 39th year of her age. She was a native of Arkansas, having been born in Clark county, March 18th, 1822. She was married to Dr. Boggus on the 24 September, 1839, and soon after connected herself with the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which she lived an exemplary life, (so far as the writer could learn), to the hour of her departure. We are informed that she bore her long and severe affliction with Christian fortitude. And when she was satisfied that her time was near, she began to sing that glorious old hymn, "Come thou Fount of every blessing," and thus singing, she embarked joyously for "the other shore," to await her dear husband and children.

JOSEPH E. BRADLEY.

IDA J., daughter of Rev. D. W. Dilehay, died on the 13th September, at Bethel parsonage, Wilkinson county, Mississippi, aged six years, nine months and twenty-days. The parsonage is on Bethel campground. On the first day of our camp-meeting, before Ismel had yet pitched their tents, little Ida "went to God," as she dreamed she had done about a week before, when in perfect health. We felt that the angels that came to encamp about God's people were in love with their little sister, and took her away to be with them forever. How bright will be the scenes, the gatherings, about these passenger graveyards on the resurrection morning! The chastened father and mourning mother, and saddened little brothers and sisters, know to whom they have committed all. We weep with them.

MISS JANNIE L. JOHNS died near Plaquemine, La., Sept. 22, 1860, after a protracted and painful illness, aged 22 years and a few months. The subject of many prayers, she was taught to pray from childhood, and had been for some time a probationer in the Methodist E. C., South. She desired the prayers of others, and prayed much herself for weeks before her death. Although she made no distinct profession of faith, still we trust that she had hope in her death.

HARVEY HARRINGTON, infant son of B. T. and Martha Denham, died of cholera infantum, August 20th, in East Baton Rouge, Parish, La., aged one year, four months and twenty-seven days. We laid it beside five children of brother and sister D., all of whom died about the same age, and looked up amid our tears and sorrow (in confident assurance of meeting again) to Him who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me."

LETTER FROM CHINA.

SHANGHAI, China, July 11th, 1860.

MR. EDITOR—I will now continue the account of my journey in the country, beginning at the city of Ing-Kong. We arrived there late at night, and were all early the next morning without going ashore. This city is in a state of utter ruin and decay. I have preached here quite often on former occasions. The people generally are peaceable, and quiet. There is nothing about the place that would attract the eye of an observer. But one is struck with wonder at the quiet of life about the place; the place looks as if it was about to be deserted. The whole place is filled with opium shops, and many of the inhabitants show, by their want and distress, the effect of the use of this poisonous drug. The streets are very narrow and filthy, and distressed-looking beggars met us on every hand. One part of the city looks to me to be the haunt of robbers and lawless men. I can never forget the first night I spent at that city, about four years since. That night there were a number of lawless Canton men in its suburbs, and the people fully expected some trouble with them that night. I had some apprehension of being disturbed, but I lay down and slept in their very midst, without harm, for the Lord watched over me and preserved me from the violence of the wicked. I have never formed a favorable opinion of the place, but always, when I can, I preach the blessed gospel of Christ to them. The wall of the city is broken in several places, and is quite overgrown with weeds and vines. The whole place seems quite antiquated, and is almost altogether divested of all signs of life. There is a pagoda at the east gate of the city, but it is too much decayed to allow of our ascending it. Many temples stand around it, but they too are deserted, and the gods of wood and stone sit alone in all their glory, covered with dust.

About eight o'clock on Wednesday morning, the 23d of May, while at breakfast, we passed the camp of about one thousand Imperial soldiers; each man seemed to be his own master, and were loitering about the camp. No one was standing guard. As soon as our boat approached, we were hailed and called to the shore. Each one seemed to take the responsibility of asking us questions, and after a few minutes conversation we passed on. They seemed delighted that we were able to converse with them in their own language. We gave them some books and left them all in a good humor. One or two cannon were pointing across the grand canal, and two or three smaller matchlocks were seen close by and mounted. We reached the city of Soo-Chau, at the east gate, about ten o'clock in the morning, after passing around one-third of the city. We got ready some books, and tried to make our way into the city. We did succeed, and got in through the gate, but were asked very politely by a Mandarin at the gate to stop a few minutes, as they wished to have some conversation with us. We were asked to walk into a room and to take a seat. We did so, and then we had some conversation with them about the impracticability of going into the city just at this time. They said they would be glad to see us at any time when peace was restored, and they hoped we would not try to go into the city now, as they could not be responsible for any difficulty which might occur. They were very polite and kind to us, and received our books with many thanks. We then returned to our boat through the gate as we came, followed by a great crowd of spectators, to the bank of the canal, which encircles the city; it is twelve miles in circumference. We then passed on to the north gate of the city, where we find the most populous part of the suburbs of Soo-Chau. From there we walked around and visited several places of interest. Saw multitudes of men, women and children in several boats. They fled from the city of Taw Yang, which was taken a few days since by the Insurgents. They seem to have fled without bringing anything with them. I gave them all the cash I had about my person. Preached on the hill outside of the city to a large crowd of people who had assembled themselves to see the strange "barbarians," from the ocean. Some of them seemed to be in a great state of alarm, especially the Nankin people. They earnestly besought us to save their lives—they were poor.

We then visited the poor-house, which is supported by the wealthy of Soo Chau, and found over eight hundred persons, blind, halt and sick of all diseases. In one of the rooms I saw one of them reading the New Testament. He was then reading in the book of James. I have often visited them, and left New Testaments and other books with them. I pray that this may be the beginning of better times in China. Should not this be the burden and desire of our hearts, in all our prayers to God? May the Lord have mercy on this poor heathen people in their blindness.

About four this afternoon great crowds of soldiers, who had fled before the insurgents, so blocked up the street which led to the city, that we could not approach the gate. As soon as it was announced to the authorities that these soldiers had arrived, the gates of the city were immediately closed against them. The whole city was in a stir at hearing such news, and seeing so many thousand soldiers fleeing precipitately before the insurgent party. Until late at night we could see these lawless soldiers pressing boats into their service. They came aboard of our boat in our absence, and took possession, but upon examination they found it in the service of some foreigner, and concluded to let it alone.

On Thursday 24th, when we awoke from our sleep, it was pouring down rain in torrents. In fact I was awaked by the rain coming in upon me. It was indeed a gloomy morning, and none of us felt like moving until the rain should abate. After we had breakfasted, we unmoored our boat and passed around under the walls of the city on our way to Qua Sau, a walled city seventy-two li from the city of Soo Chau—about twenty-four English miles. As we passed along the canal we observed the whole mass of the people were in motion, and all seemed fleeing in one direction. Some with children on their backs and some with clothes. Some were upon boats and rafts, and others on foot. The rain helped to increase their consternation, as it is a general saying among the Chinese that when it rains the insurgents make their attack upon the Imperial forces, and are generally more successful on such occasions. The confusion of this great mass of people is beyond description. As we proceeded, the rush of boats and the cries of the people running to and fro, still increased until it surpassed anything I ever saw. The canal was alive with boats, and on each side of the canal were thousands of men, women, and children plunging on through the mud and rain. When leaving the suburbs of the city, as far as we could see, the road was lined with Nankin people who had been for several years in Soo Chau and received for their support from the government about one cent and a half per day. But now they were going they knew not where, with poverty and misery before them. There were hundreds who had not a sufficient means of support for one day. Their misery is untold, and I could but mourn to see them in such a condition. They have no comforter as the Christian to go to. And oh, what a blessed privilege it is for us in all our troubles to go to Him who is "easily touched with our infirmities." Women with cramped feet would try to go through the mud and fall with their helpless children on their backs, and look up in despair to the passers by until some pitying hand would lend her assistance. I saw many fall and, as it were, faint away and almost trampled in the mud by the multitude. My heart was moved for these helpless creatures, yet the crowd and excitement was too great for me to attempt to relieve any. There must have been twenty thousand persons in sight. The misery which must necessarily follow the movement of this immense multitude can scarcely be imagined.—Many had their bodies, from head to foot, covered with mud, and despair seemed to rest on their countenances. I wanted to bring some of the most feeble aboard of the boat and thereby help them on, but the boatmen would not consent to it, for fear of a rush upon the boat. The whole of this day rain continued to pour down, and until night closed in we had before us continual scenes of sorrow and distress. We passed the night at a small village not far from the city of Qua Sau. Thousands of these poor Nankin people had already arrived, and all was confusion and disorder. I went around from boat to boat to see them and have some conversation. Their boats were all filled, and many hundreds were sleeping on the shore. I tried to comfort them, and pointed them to Jesus as our only hope of comfort in this life and in this life to come. Here I saw many of the Imperial soldiers who had been defeated in battle with the insurgents, and were now making good their escape, not knowing how soon they were to suffer at the hands of their own Imperial officers. Opium had well nigh destroyed all their energy, and we do not wonder at their defeat in battle. The most of their time they spend in smoking opium.

We were up early on Friday, 25th May, and found it to be very unpleasant and still raining. We saw on the banks of the canal signs of the deserted soldiers where they had encamped during the night, and in their hurry and confusion they had left many of their arms, horses, etc., all of which were being secured by the country people. By eight o'clock in the morning we were at the city of Qua Sau. Owing to the heavy weather, the lofty hill in the city, from which the place takes its name, was almost concealed from our view by the cloud which enveloped it. It presents a beautiful appearance as you approach the city in clear weather. When we reached the city, we found many thousands who had fled from Soo Chau; and here we saw the people of this city fleeing to the country, many of whom were weeping for fear. In one boat, especially, filled with women, children and furniture, scolded by two countrymen, they were keeping up a dreadful lamentation. We tried all we could to soothe by talking kindly, but finding all of no effect, we began to hand them some of our foreign bread and soon all were quiet and happy. We walked ashore, and at the foot of the large bridge near the West gate, I preached to hundreds of eager listeners. The bridge was crowded and also all the open space below the bridge. I had never before seen the people in this place listen with so much attention, and I trust many received the word gladly in their hearts and fully understood their condition as sinners before God.

I shall have to trouble you with another communication before this journey is ended, as this has taken up much more room than I expected.

J. W. LAMBUTH.

Thursday, 12th.—The city of Shanghai is now in the hands of the English and French. The English flag flies from the wall. Mr. Ward, our minister, has gone North in the man-of-war "Hartford." The English and French forces have all gone North. We know not what may be the news of to-morrow; perhaps that the Emperor has fled from his throne. All is excitement in Shanghai about the Rebels. I hope you will see some interesting communications concerning them in the "Herald," printed in Shanghai. My father has copies of them.

Saturday, 14th.—Our dear brethren, Bros. Wood and Allen, and their wives, arrived in Shanghai last night about eight o'clock, all wet. Brother Wood and sister Allen have been quite sick. They were two hundred and eight days coming from New York to Shanghai! Almost unparalleled.

JOHN CALVIN.

HIS CHARACTER.

Calvin was not only sadly deficient in patience, but also in tenderness and pity. He possessed a very small portion of those qualities in the wisdom that cometh from above, which are "gentle, easy to be entreated, and full of mercy." He had much of the holiness of religion, but very little of its sweetness and beauty. Indeed, beauty was a word he never understood the meaning of. The Spartans of olden times, notwithstanding their austerity, prayed their gods to grant them the beautiful with the good; but Calvin felt no such want—offered no such prayer. In giving Favil instructions about a wife, he said he was not at all particular about beauty or person; and he cared as little about the beauties of nature. He resided amid some of the sublimest scenes which this earth has to present. For nearly twenty years he lived on the borders of the lovely lake of Geneva; he could not look out of his window without seeing the glaciers of Savoy and Mont Blanc. But in not one of his letters is there the smallest reference to all this sublimity and beauty. He might never have walked out and seen the early beauty of morning, or the material grace of evening, or the solemn pomp and majesty of night; he might never have watched the Spring breaking forth from the icy covers of Winter, or have listened to the minstrelsy of woods and waters. If we were to judge from his letters, we might fancy that he had lived all his days in a sandy desert. Neither do you find in Calvin any love for pictures, or for the glorious strains of music. He took no interest in dumb animals, and very little in the joys and sorrows of human life. The earth was cursed, amusements were sinful, pleasures were godless, man's business was to cry: "Vanity of vanity, all is vanity. Ah! woe is me!"

CONTRAST BETWEEN CALVIN AND LUTHER.

Calvin as a very marked contrast to the great German Reformer. Luther's soul was full of music and gladness, as he gazed upon the beauties of nature. He believed that the earth was the Lord's and the fullness thereof; and did not think that he honored God's heaven by despising God's earth. He could see God in the light of the morning, of noon, and the stillness of night. One day, walking on the Leipsic road, he observed a beautiful field of wheat, when he exclaimed: "O God of goodness! this fruitful year is thy gift. With thee all is miracle. Thy voice brings out of the earth, and even out of the arid sand, those plants and beautiful ears of wheat which gladden the sight. O my Father! give all thy children their daily bread." Now, we continually meet with reflections of this sort in reading Luther, but never in reading Calvin. Luther was great in undress. We do not lose him in little things. See him going to the fishmongers to buy oysters for his favorite cat, being afraid lest the servants should take a dislike to it, from having continually to supply its wants; look at him, with smiling face, talking to it, and patting the head of his old dog, which he has had for sixteen years; go into his study, and see him laugh, body and soul, as he examines the caricatures of the Pope which hung upon his study walls; follow him from his study, into the skittle-alley at the bottom of his garden, with Melancthon; see him tuck up his doctor's gown, and say to his friend: "Melancthon, you can beat me at Greek, but I can beat you at skittles;" see him sit down to supper with Philip, Dr. Jonas, and a few choice friends, how he sets the table on a roar; with his broad humor and good-tempered mirth; listen to the sweet music coming from his German flute, with which he said he oftentimes drove away the devil; see him sit down to his desk, to write tales for his little Johnny, and then cracking a joke with Lord Cate, as he playfully called his wife; and above all, see him sitting by the sick-bed of his girl Madeline, weeping, and sighing, and groaning at her death: and as we see all this we clasp him to our heart; he is as great here as when burning the Pope's Bull, or standing before the Diet, at Worms. "He was open as the sky, merry as the sunshine, bold and fearless as the storm." We not only respect and admire him, but we love him, and should have been delighted to have sat down at his table and heard him laugh and sing, pray and preach, and do all to the glory of God. But it was far, very far otherwise with John Calvin. His heart never swelled with joy, as he gazed upon the snow-capped mountains, the everlasting hills, the mighty forests, the beautiful flowers, and outstretched ocean. His soul was never filled with music, as he listened to the song of the birds, to the rustling wheat, or the light tinkle of the brook, chanting its quiet tune. He had no eye for this beauty, no ear for this music. This world was a waste-howling wilderness—God's curse was upon it. He had no favorite cats, no faithful dogs, no flutes, no pictures, no skittles. He seldom smiled, and rarely laughed; and when he did laugh, it was a very weak, thin, sniggering, husky affair—not at all like the clear, loud, ringing tone of Luther's laugh. Calvin's sympathies were narrow and one-sided. Luther's were strong and many-sided. Luther had all Calvin's godliness without a bit of his grimness. Any ignorant man could disturb Calvin's life, and irritate his temper, by questioning or disputing any of his peculiar views.—But Luther was not to be so moved. One day, a man visited him from the Low Countries, to dispute about various things. Luther received him kindly, and afterwards remarked: "When I saw what a poor, ignorant creature he was, I said to him: 'Hadn't we better dispute over a can or two of beer?' Calvin would have been for sending the poor fellow to prison. Then, on manifold grounds we prefer the German to the Frenchman; and would far rather have lived at Wittenburg than at Geneva.

CALVIN AS A THEOLOGIAN.

It remains for us now to speak briefly of Calvin as a Theologian and a Reformer; and, as in some future paper we purpose to examine Calvin's theological system at length, we shall content ourselves here with a simple and brief statement of his distinctive views.

Calvin early saw the necessity for some work which should set forth the doctrinal truths of the Reformation in a clear and systematic form. And he rightly judged that he had the power to produce such a work. Hence, while he was yet a young man he wrote his Christian Institutes. He afterwards enlarged it, but made no substantial alteration. The ability displayed in this book is of the highest order—unquestionably it is a great book. It contains much that all Protestant sects agree with; and it contains also all Calvin's peculiar and distinctive opinions. The base of Calvin's whole system is the Augustinian doctrine of Predestination. The will of God is the absolute cause of all things. Far away in the past before the world was, God ordained, predestined everything to come to pass. So, that whatever is, is just what God intended it to be—that whatever is done, is just what God intended to be done; and this, not only by good men, but bad men. Calvin carries out this principle with a stern, unflinching logic, by its final consequences. Hence, he regards the distinction which some persons make, between God ordaining a thing to be done, and God permitting it to be done, as mischievous and absurd. Men can do nothing, he says, but by the secret will of God; and they can deliberate upon nothing but what he has secretly decreed. He maintains that God has predestined a certain number to be saved, irrespective of their want of faith or their evil works.—Hence, he says, that "some men are born devoted from the womb to certain death, that God may be glorified in their destination."—Institutes, vol. ii, p. 432.

And still further he says: "The ungodly, indeed, are punished with blindness on account of their wickedness, by just judgment of God; but if we seek the origin of their destruction, we must come to this, that being cursed by God, they can call forth and accumulate nothing but curses by all their deeds, words, and counsels"—Comment on Romans, 11: 7.

Calvin was well aware that to many this doctrine would appear harsh and stern. Indeed, he himself confesses, that "It is a horrible decree, that the fall of Adam, independent of any remedy, should involve so many millions with their infant children (!) in eternal death"—Institutes, vol. ii., p. 430.

Calvin also admits that many of the early fathers did not take this view, neither did many of the Reformers of his own day; even Melancthon—who was Calvin's intimate friend—said that the doctrine of Predestination, as then stated, was only the ancient doctrine of Fate or Destiny. Others said that it made God the author of sin. But Calvin maintained that such inferences could not be fairly drawn from the doctrine. He contends, that although men sins necessarily, yet he also sins voluntarily. Upon the whole, Calvin's theology is like himself, cold, rigid, logic, and stern. It is absolute fatalism, with this difference, that he bases it upon a scriptural instead of a philanthropic foundation. He said much respecting the awfulness of God's justice; but very little respecting the tenderness of God's great pity, or the depth of his wondrous love. Passing from a Greenland winter to an Italian summer, is not a greater contrast than turning from some chapters of Calvin's Institutes to some chapters in John's gospel. However, although there is a great difference of opinion respecting some of his theological dogmas, there can be none as to his distinguished merits as an expositor of Scripture. Divines of all schools have acknowledged the help they have derived from his works. Richard Baxter—who did not fully accept Calvin's doctrine of Predestination—says: "I know of no man since the Apostles' days whom I value and honor more than Calvin, and whose judgments in all this, one with another, I more esteem and come nearer to."

Even his great opponent, Arminius, a short time before his death wrote: "After the Holy Scriptures, I exhort the students to read the Commentaries of Calvin, for I tell them that he is incomparable in the interpretation of Scripture."

CALVIN AS A REFORMER.

And now one word about Calvin as a Reformer. In the opinion of some of his critics, it is here that his labors are seen to the most advantage. He unquestionably saved the Reformation. Luther went forth with a giant's strength to destroy the false; but he was comparatively weak in building up the true. But Calvin was just the man to organize, and consolidate that which was already gained. Had it not been for Calvin the Reformation would—humanly speaking—have perished in endless disputes and divisions. But through Calvin, Geneva became the center of a mighty influence that went through the whole of Europe, and is powerfully felt even in this day. From that little city hundreds of devoted ministers went forth, steeled by Calvin's Spartan discipline, ready at any moment to die in defense of the truth. After Luther's death, the Lutheran churches did but little to carry on the Reformation. But the Calvinistic churches have gone on and on, increasing continually, and it is impossible to estimate the good they have accomplished. Indeed, we owe our civil and religious liberty to these churches. For, who was it that bearded those tyrannical priests and despotical kings in England, and solved that great problem: which is most, one or a million—the king or the people? All the puritans light their lamp at Geneva? They were all baptized with Calvin's spirit. What city was it that John Knox looked to as the model of perfection? was it not Geneva? And both Calvin's doctrine and discipline he impressed on Scotland. In France, the whole of the Reformation bears Calvin's stamp and seal. Go across the Atlantic, and ask whose ideas had most filled the hearts of those Pilgrim fathers, who went forth in the Mayflower to plant the seeds of civil and religious liberty in the far West? And the reply is Calvin's. In fact, it was Calvinism—not Lutheranism—that every where did battle with Jesuitism, and was thus the means of saving Europe. And on that noble list of men, who by their toil, and suffering, and prayers, have handed down to us the precious boon of the Reformation, we must first write the name of Martin Luther, and second that of John Calvin.

Calvin, then, on the whole, we thus judge. He was a man of great intellect, of varied talents, of ripe scholarship. A man of iron will and firm purposes, exercising mighty influence for good at the most critical period of Europe's history—a man to whom all Protestants owe a mighty debt of gratitude. There was in his life a simplicity, a majesty, a consistency of purpose, which at once stamp him as one of the world's great men. God's glory was his great aim. Duty was the watch-word of his life.

He was a man of weak body, spare in diet, austere in habits, requiring but little sleep, and sadly deficient in muscle and animal spirits. His heart was cold, his temper keen, his disposition unlovely and ungenial. He was hard and intolerant in spirit, showing but little sympathy for those who had the misfortune to differ from him in opinion. Of that charity which heareth all things, which suffereth long, and is kind, he had a very small portion. In his efforts to do good, he always manifested too much of the law of law, and too little of the law of love. We admire him for his matchless talents; we honor him for devoting those talents to the cause of God and humanity; but love him we can not; his cold, stern heart repels us; his morose, violent temper warns us not to come too near. For the good service he rendered to the cause of truth and freedom, we thank him; but we have no desire to make his acquaintance, and are glad that he lived before our time.

THE MALAKANS.

This is the name of a large sect, now scattered all over the Russian Empire, although originating, like American Methodism, during the last one hundred years. Two servants of the Russian Ambassador in England, a man and woman, became converts to Christianity whilst residing there. Having left his service they returned to Russia. The man, Simon Metiejeff, was a tailor by trade. This praying Russian did not keep his light under a bushel, but let it shine; and residing in Tambaro, or Tambolf, a district embracing 4,800 square miles, with 1,550,000 people, he traveled about working and preaching as he had opportunity. Training other young men for the holy work, Metiejeff sent them forth upon the same errand of love and mercy.

These pious efforts were immediately blessed, when persecution followed, and the sectarians or heretics were exiled to far distant Siberia. Especially were teachers sent away, and some as late as the Crimean war. Others settled towards the Caucasus, a living wall, as it were, against the Circassians. These became very numerous, now not less than 30 villages beyond Tiflis, and containing 70,000 Malakans. Amidst persecutions, as is ever the case, the good seed remained, and this sect is now scattered all over Russia. Their number is estimated at present to be more than a million, and the blessed work of reformation is still going on. This people, after long continued and severe sufferings, bonds, imprisonments, stripes, exiles and deaths, for ninety years, have found some rest, since the last Crimean war. Government coercion is no longer resorted to. They are Trinitarians, in its fullest sense, and their attachment to the Bible great, proverbial, and almost exclusive. Most of them fear to read any other book, lest they may return to their former state, or as we Methodists say, "backslide." Soon after the sect became united, they were compelled to give up the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper. The laws of Russia prohibited these holy ordinances, except administered by a Russian Priest, and the communion must be observed only in a Russian Church. There are severe penalties for the transgression of these arbitrary and cruel laws. Under these circumstances the Malakans have adopted a purely spiritual baptism and communion, whilst abstaining from the usual outward rite. When a child is born, they assemble, and praying over it, commend it to God, and they meet from time to time for a "love feast," and eat what is called "holy bread."

About twenty-five years, ago, some of the Malakans in Tiflis and beyond, began to baptize their children again, but very secretly. Their spiritualizing or mystifying way of exploining the Scriptures has led them to understand the whole of the apocalypse mystically. They describe it metaphorically, as connected with their inward religious conflicts and experience. Even the promised millennium is entirely within. Recently, some seemed inclined to embrace more correct views. Their worship consists of prayer, and reading the Scriptures, with exhortation, if some one is present, having such a gift. If any is not able to pray extemporaneously, he is permitted to use a little prayer book. The Malakans greatly desire Christian fellowship, and feel the necessity of more instruction in divine knowledge. They are ready to keep their Bibles until death, believing all its sacred truths and ardently want the entire Scriptures in their own language.

This new people may be the grain of mustard seed in that immense region of the world where there are millions of our fellow-men amidst gross darkness, or superstitions ignorance. There are Jews in all parts of the Russian Empire, except the centre, whether they are specially excluded. Lutheranism is professed by the great body of Germania and Swedes, and the Poles are generally Roman Catholics. Still the Byzantine or Greek Church is the religion of the State, and has almost universal ascendency. It is strong in the affections of the Russian people, who assent to its dogmas and willingly perform its minute, ridiculous and superstitious ceremonies. Amidst all these errors, one bright ray of light shines forth—the free reading of the Bible by the laity, which is a fundamental usage of the Greek or Eastern Church. Nor can it be said that skepticism in any decided form has yet penetrated into the Eastern Church. Its creed is not exclusive, holding that whoever is baptized in the name of Christ will be saved; nor has it ever sought to encroach on the civil power or leave its proper sphere in political questions. These are liberal religious elements, which, we can not but hope, in God's hands, before long, will introduce a pure faith among the myriads of the Russian Empire. May the Malakans, their Bible reading, their piety and prayers, be the precious little leaven to quicken the gracious work!

A MOTHER'S CONCERT OF PRAYER.

THE MEMBERS OF THE NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN MATERNAL ASSOCIATIONS, TO CHRISTIAN MOTHERS OF EVERY NAME THROUGHOUT OUR COUNTRY.

Burdened with a sense of our responsibilities in reference to the spiritual welfare of our children—painfully conscious of our want of faithfulness, and oppressed with anxiety, lest, amid the prevailing worldliness and the temptations with which they are surrounded, our loved ones should be left without the precious hopes of the Gospel—we long for a closer bond of sympathy with those of like trials and cares. Especially do we long to have their fervent prayers mingle with ours at the mercy-seat, that the gracious Redeemer would claim our children as his own, and give us wisdom and grace to guide them in the way in which they should go.

Impelled by these feelings, and yielding to earnest and repeated requests from many others, we invite all mothers in our common Zion to meet together at such places as may be convenient to themselves, at three o'clock, on the first Wednesday of October, and join with us in a Union meeting or Concert of Prayer in behalf of ourselves and our children. The presence and power of the Holy Spirit is our only hope, and while we believe God has promised to bless the children of his servants, we are reminded that parental prayer and faithfulness is a principal means through which the fulfilment is to be realized. We can not suppress a fear lest, by our neglect or indifference, we ourselves should close up the avenue by which the blessings of the gospel are appointed to flow to the hearts of those committed to us.

Whether through our unfaithfulness or otherwise, the thought that any of our dear children should be left to perish is unutterably painful. Hence, we desire to share your supplications. We believe God has encouraged united prayer; and the history of the past furnishes many instances in which the earnest entreaties of associated mothers have been answered in mercy. Let us unitedly surround the throne of grace, and our feet that your Saviour will respond to ours in this desire, and we shall look forward with solemn and sacred interest to the hour when, through the intercession of our risen Redeemer, the prayer of faith from believing mothers, in all parts of our land, shall ascend to the Father of mercies.

Furthermore, having ourselves experienced the great benefit of associating together for mutual counsel, encouragement and quickening, we earnestly recommend that mothers, as they are assembled on the day referred to, shall take into consideration the forming of themselves into associations where none exists, or seek a reviving interest where a maternal association already exists; and that by meeting on the first Wednesday of each succeeding month, we may have a recurrence of this Concert of Prayer, mingled with conversation for mutual aid and sympathy. We invite you at least to join with us in a meeting of prayer, each month, in the afternoon of the day named. We do not undervalue other means of grace, but we should be blinded to our most solemn duties and our highest privileges, did we not recognize that dispensation of our Heavenly Father by which the tender minds of our children are placed in our hands to be trained for the service of the Redeemer, and by which their salvation is made to depend much upon the manner in which we discharge our high trust.

Who of us has not yearned for mutual counsel and divine guidance, that we might be able to give to the cause of our Saviour and to the highest good of our children—a mother's influence wisely directed and sanctified by the Spirit of God?

We do not think any uniformity of organization is essential. The form may be modified as circumstances may suggest.

ANCIENT AND MODERN PENMANSHIP.

Great is the difference between the clerkly penmanship in the body of ancient deeds, and the rough, rude, and often illegible signs of those famous men of the sword; whose functions in the middle ages were so much in demand; and it may be remarked that in those days when the circumstances of having a pen in hand must have been a remarkable event in the lives of the great mass of the community, the penmanship of the few learned clerks was noticeable for its beauty, and also for its correspondence, to some extent, with the contemporary style of architecture.

The effect of the introduction of Italian architecture may be traced both in manuscripts and books. Many of the specimens of the hand-writing of Queen Elizabeth are singularly beautiful, and show much variety. There is the small Italian hand, which was used when writing, as Princess, to her dear cousin and King, Edward VI., and on other complimentary occasions; and a very large hand, which combined the Gothic and the Italian, which "good Queen Bess" used when she threatened to unfrock a Bishop.

Looking at ancient documents of a time when being obliged to resort to the use of a cross for a signature was not considered disgraceful, even to the nobility, it is curious to notice the great variety of the crosses, and the different degrees of artistic skill which are shown in them. As the practice of writing became more general the use of the cross became less so; and, although many could not write their right name, they managed to sign with a letter, or peculiar form or flourish which had some resemblance to one.

In a collection of autographs of the relatives of Shakspeare, published by Mr. Halliwell, a great variety is shown. Agnes Arden's signature resembles the letter U, such as would be made by a school boy who had just got out of his "pot-hooks." John Shakspeare signs with a sword-like cross, so firmly and vigorously marked that one can fancy, if the opportunities had offered, that this hand might have been cultured into that of the skilled draughtsman. Others of those signs are crosses surmounted by circles, and some show imperfect attempts at regular signatures.

Remembering the systems of book-keeping, and accounts which are now required for successful trade, it is difficult to understand how business, to any extent, could have been carried on. Tallies kept by notched sticks, with certain hieroglyphics for the different goods, were much used instead of books, and no doubt those instruments were produced by many of the traders of London and elsewhere with as much gravity as a regular bill at the present day. At the beginning of the present century, in the case of a disputed account, in a town in the north of England, the door on which the account had been kept in chalk, was produced in court.

In the reign of George III, when education had become more general, the crosses of those who could not, write lost the distinction and artistic character of older times, and the large, bold, round hand, corresponds in style with the buildings and furniture then in use. This writing, although without much beauty, has notwithstanding, the merit of distinctness. In these railway times, with the exception of book-keepers in banks, and clerks in merchant offices, few seem to have time to trim their letters. Few artists write a good hand. Physicians' prescriptions are often as difficult to decipher as ancient hieroglyphics; and it must be confessed that writers for the press are not generally remarkable for either the distinction or beauty of their manuscript. As regards artists, the practice of handling the brush and pencil is not favorable to graceful penmanship; and in respect to the literary profession, it is generally difficult for the pen to keep pace with the thoughts, to say nothing of the fact that time often presses.—London Builder.

DEVELOPMENT OF LANGUAGE.

Edward III was the first to encourage English composition. During his splendid reign, there was a revival of the Anglo-Saxon genius, and the language began a vigorous growth. After having passed through these successive periods of amalgamation, it needed constructing anew. Let us go on from wars to authors. The English language has been highly favored with minds of rare eminence, who have brought the inherent power and vitality of their native tongue. In every period of its growth, authors of grand and varied styles have given it transparency and copiousness. They arrayed it in garments it had never worn, as in their fertile brains ideas germinated which were not stirring the minds of the mass—as in their souls spiritual cravings started up unfelt by others. Chaucer, the father of English poetry and a living worshipper of nature, left it wealthier in descriptions of natural objects. He was followed by a vast assembly of poets, who have consecrated it as a temple in which to pour forth great jubilees of song.

In the Elizabethan era of the sixteenth century words by thousands were naturalized; and the language was endowed with powers of intellectual and spiritual expression; Spenser, with his exquisite fancy and creative genius, drew out its fine musical harmony, and the unsuspected richness of its diction. By the minds of poets, this rude, imperfect, and rough implement is polished and refined, till it mirrors to all their delicacy, the emotions that fill and agitate the human heart. Shakspeare developed and improved the art of bodying forth visions of the imagination, and of revealing internal and immortal conceptions to a perfection before unknown.—Milton gave an example of the glorious vigor with which it could be employed to vindicate the rights of freedom, and with what solemn awe it could be marshalled into verse, to unfold a drama which has human life for its first scene, immensity for its theatre, and eternity for its completion.

Bacon and Locke, earnest seekers after truth, in natural and mental sciences, enlarged the phraseology of our language to explain abstract reasonings, and the gathered facts of observing, inquiring minds. Edwards, with an intellect of unbending purpose and of rigid logic, carved out its stern and massive features, and gave us a new model of the compact consistency of its logical syntax. Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith, and all the brilliant satirists and essayists, wits, historians and reformers of the age, contributed largely to exhibit its keen pointedness, its sharp antithesis, its fertile versatility, its pliant adaptedness, bold simplicity and strong dignity.—Wordsworth showed how it could be used to hymn the divinest meanings, and transport us on its wings to realms of grandeur and loveliness, where thoughts grow flowers and life makes music. Coleridge taught how it could be made to weave the robes of dreamy mysteries, and to lay open the steps of profound investigations into the labyrinths of recondite problems; he popularised the language of metaphysics.

READING.

There are few who stop to consider the miracle of reading. That a few black marks upon paper should have such an informing and transportive power, is scarcely less than miraculous. Four letters are put together—H-o-m-e. The moment the eye looks upon them the soul rises up, a picture comes forth, in its most attractive colors, as with exquisite clearness. We see its inmates, an old man, a venerable woman, children, domestic scenes. Years that have long slept, rise up and step forth again in newness of life. And all things are so re-fashioned, that we no longer think where we are, or what we are, but seem to ourselves carried back scores of years, and walking up and down again the ways of childhood. All this is because there are four linear spots of ink on a sheet of white paper.

But if one considers more minutely what is taking place in reading, all the time, the marvel will still grow. The ready reader never thinks of letters. It is only the word that he sees. And even the word seems to lose individuality, and is but a member of something else—a sentence. But even the sentence seems not to be seen, but to be seen through. We see the thought, rather than the symbol by which it is to be set forth. And the act of reading, although it is physical, is yet so much more mental, that we lose all consciousness of the mechanical part of it, and follow a train of pure thought, or the flow of sentiment, or a description, as if the thing itself were transpiring. It is most curious to watch a person in reading an exciting narrative, or stirring appeal, and see how these dead letters lord it over every inward faculty. At this black spot of printer's ink we weep—at another we laugh—at another we are sad—at another we are angry. This line touches one feeling, that line another; and line after line reaches in, and, like the fingers of the musician, touches the chords, and brings forth all the soul's activity.

But the same passage read by different men, will affect them all differently. It is not probable that the same state of mind, in all its details, has ever been twice produced, exactly alike, by any text of Scripture, or any passage of Shakespeare. Something is always varied.

It is worthy of notice that, although when we are heartily engaged in reading, we cease to see the lines and letters, and behold only their meaning, yet when we are absent-minded, we read without seeing either the means or the words by which it is conveyed. We have, when much pre-occupied, read whole pages aloud, to the edification of others, without being conscious either that we saw a letter, or received a single idea. The eye saw, the mouth vocalized, while our thoughts were busy with some memory, or in arranging some other variant activity.

The habit of reading proofs, and correcting them for the press, leads to some singular developments. A man feels mistakes rather than sees them. In glancing rapidly over the sentences, almost before the will can act, and while the thought is tending to hold its way right along, we feel a sort of mechanical grip, a putting on the brakes, as if something was wrong, and we go back to search and see what it is. And behold, there is a word with i put for ei, or an m is wanting, or but one l is put where two should be. That we did not see, but only felt the mistake, appears from the fact that, when we search, we have not the least idea what the matter is, and we go back, looking and groping to see what it was that stopped us with such a mind-jolt.

Every one's reflection will suggest other facts, in regard to the marvelousness of the simple mechanical and mental act, of reading. But what to read, and how to read, are more important than the marvels of the simple act itself.

DESCENDANTS OF ROMANISTS IN JAPAN.

A curious letter from Rev. Mr. Brown, in Japan, is given in the New York Evangelist. He reports, that it is said by Mr. Harris's interpreter, Mr. Heuski, and the French Abbe, who is attached to the French Legation as an interpreter, that there are at Yeddo one hundred families living in a quarter of the city by themselves, and receiving each five rations of rice per diem, from the Emperor's storehouse, which families are the descendants of hundreds of R. Catholics, that recanted at the persecution, two hundred years or more ago, and who were required to keep up a knowledge of Romanism, so that from generation to generation, they might act as detectives of Romanists in the country. The above-named gentlemen assert that the descendants of those recanters still receive their regular allowance from the Emperor. If so, it would be exceedingly interesting to know how far they have retained among them any correct knowledge of the Romanist faith. One would suppose their notions would become somewhat confused and incorrect after transmission by mere tradition through so many generations. The existence of such a body of men shows that the Japanese government does not forget the past, and is very perseveringly vigilant against the introduction of Roman Catholicism into their country. Another fact shows the same. In various parts of the country, along the roads, there are wooden tablets set up on which imperial orders are recorded. One contains, among other things, an offer of $200 or $300 for the detection of any "Catholic, Romanist, or Brethren" among the people. These offers are the same that were made two hundred years ago, and as often as they become defaced by exposure to the weather, they are retouched with India-ink, to render them again legible.

THE GOOD PASTOR.

A man full of charity, of humility, and all the examples of a virtuous pastor. Without pride, without arrogance and hypocrisy, there was a beautiful simplicity in its life and actions, a kindness, gentleness, forbearance, harmoniously combined with a holy zeal, a never-tiring industry in doing good to all, that marked him out as one of those chosen shepherds sent by Heaven as a blessing to some chosen flock. Cheerful without levity, he joined in all the innocent amusements of his simple parishioners, and happy himself in the consciousness of a useful and virtuous life, as well as in the rational anticipation of a blissful eternity, he walked among his people, not as a shadow, darkening all around, but as a sun, cheering, animating, blessing those who basked in his smiles.

Careless of his rest and his personal labors, he was ready at all times, by day and by night, to go forth to comfort the afflicted, relieve the sick, and soothe the dying. He asked nothing for himself, and gave every thing to others; labored not in his own vineyard, but in that of his Master, and the fruits of his exertions soon become visible to every eye. A cheerful, innocent gayety began to appear again in the village; the people went forth to their daily occupations with smiling hopes, that caused all to exert themselves in their various pursuits. Begging took refuge in the labors of its own hands, and found its reward in the comforts of independence, and the approving smile of the excellent pastor, who never lost an opportunity of rebuking the idle, or applauding the industrious, for well he knew that among all classes of mankind, and especially the laborers, idleness is but another name for sin and misery.

In short, blessed by such an example and led by such a guide, it was not long before Elsinburg became the model of a virtuous and happy village, and it might be said with truth, that neither poverty nor vice was any longer known among its inhabitants. Such are the benefits of a good example combined with good precepts, and such the blessings of a pious shepherd, who fulfills his duties to his Maker, to his creatures, and to the holy calling by which he is sanctified and ennobled.—James K. Paulding.

CLINGING TO YOUTH.

I abominate the padded, rouged, dyed old sham; but I heartily respect the man or woman, pensive and sad, as some little circumstance has impressed upon them the fact that they are growing old. A man or woman is a fool who is indignant at being called the old lady, or the old gentleman, when these phrases state the truth; but there is nothing foolish or unworthy when some such occurence brings it home to us, with

WHAT WILL BALTIMORE DO?

We are aware that advice from the South is not very acceptable to our Baltimore brethren. We regret that it is so. We regret that anything should prevent a clear and satisfactory understanding between them and us.—We ought to understand each other. That understanding ought to be brought about now, while Baltimore is in a transition state. Such an understanding might, to an important extent, modify her action in her approaching Conventions.

Many of our Baltimore brethren, on reading this, will doubtless say, "Oh! You wish us to come South, do you?" Well, no. Not if there is any thing like principle, or sound expediency, to prevent it. If there is no such obstacle, we do wish you to unite with us. In such case, you ought to do it; you will do wrong if you do not. At any rate, we ought to have an understanding. Such an understanding will enable us to discover whether or not there is any thing like principle or sound expediency to separate us. If there is, you ought not to unite with us. We are not selfish in what we say, but simply desirous for the truth.

What is the difference between us? The word "South?" We are as much opposed to ecclesiastical sectionality as you are. The word "South" was not chosen to express such sectionality, but as distinctive of our separate organization—the best word thought of at the time. And we are going to remove that, depend upon it.

"But you are confined to slave territory." Not at all. We are prospering in California and Oregon, free States and Northern States. We could have planted ourselves in other Northern States before this, had we been inclined to "filibuster" a little. We could do it now.—We could have had an organization even in Baltimore but we would not. We are not as much confined to slave territory as Baltimore will be, if she forms a separate organization.

"But your Church is pro-slavery." Not at all. We are neither pro-slavery nor anti-slavery. We stand right where Christ and his Apostles stood—right where the New Testament places us. Do you not believe the American Methodist Church ought to have stood there from the beginning? We could all unite, still, upon this scriptural platform. Individual political opinions, whether pro-slavery or anti-slavery, have nothing to do with the matter. Only keep the Church, in its councils and its legislation, free from "the vexed question." Will not Baltimore join us in the effort to free the whole of American Methodism from the taint of this agitation?

"But you have fought against us in times past." And so have you against us. We are about even on that score. Garibaldi and the Neapolitans once fought each other; now they fight the common enemy. Are we less wise?

"But your papers defend the Institutions of the South." Against the hostile misrepresentations of those who ought to be our brethren, and who constantly denounce us. So do you. You are precisely situated as we are, except that you are in the same Church.

Let us not have another Methodist organization. Let us continue to gather together, in one body, those who wish to repair the mistake of our forefathers—those who act and pray for a re-united Methodism.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE WITH THE POPE?

Recently, this has been the most serious question in connection with the Italian revolution. "What will Napoleon do?" was the serious question in the beginning. After his neutrality was assured, the next trouble was as to the disposition of the Pope. True, Naples had fallen, and Sardinian troops were overrunning the Roman States. Napoleon stood still, and Francis Joseph, of Austria, was afraid to do otherwise. But there was the Pope in Rome, and the French army "protecting" him. Both Napoleon and Victor Emmanuel proclaimed that the rights of the "Chief of the Church" should be respected. But new times, events, and ideas give new meanings to words. Such language does not mean what it once did. Will the Pope be protected in Rome simply as the spiritual head of the Church, without any temporal sovereignty; or will he have secured to him, in addition, the temporal government of Rome and its immediate district? What is to be done with the French army there? Will it remain there permanently? If not, will the Italians, who have overthrown almost every other obstacle in the way of national unity, suffer this one to remain?

At length, as we think, we begin to see some light on this subject. Recently, it was stated in the Paris papers that there was great uneasiness in the French capital lest there should be a collision between the French army in Rome, and Garibaldi's legions. This statement, with the increase of that French army, looked threatening enough. But it was stated immediately afterwards that the only hope of avoiding these complications, was in the Pope's leaving Rome. Should he do so, the French army would follow his example, and the city would be immediately occupied by Victor Emmanuel. This, then, is the solution of the question desired by Napoleon and Victor Emmanuel. They wish to get him out of the way. The traditional sacredness of his person, his office, and his claims, and the superstition which gives that sacredness power throughout the Catholic world, are not to be trifled with. Moreover, they wish to take advantage of the very staunchness of the old Pontiff in the maintenance of the ancient prerogatives of the See of Rome. He has refused to make any compromise or concession. He will be maintained by Catholic Europe, or he will be overthrown, and be a martyr in its eyes. They calculate on his leaving Rome before he will yield. And, strangely enough, the last telegraphic despatches from Europe informs us that the Pope's envoy had already arrived at Paris with his ultimatum, which is, that unless Napoleon will interfere to prevent Victor Emmanuel's troops from making further progress in the Roman States, he will immediately quit Rome. If he does, he will have cut the last great knot in the Italian question. The rescue of Venetia is a small one compared to this. Stranger than all, the College of Cardinals earnestly advise him to leave. If he will leave Rome, let him go where he chooses.

THE PRESENT POLITICAL CRISIS.

The signs of the times indicate the election of the Black Republican nominee, Abraham Lincoln, to the Presidency. Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Ohio have gone Republican, and New York is now the only hope, and that is small. We should hope to the end, even against hope, and not bate a jot of effort to prevent a consummation so much to be deplored. At the same time, we should be mentally prepared for it. It should not take us by surprise. Could he be defeated, the sectional party which he represents would, we think, be crushed forever. A young party, in its present organization, composed of most discordant materials, without the basis of sound constitutional principles, or the cement of established party integrity, two successive defeats would destroy it. We think, also, that success would prove its overthrow, ultimately. Its character is as little likely to withstand success as defeat.

Moreover, the present political canvass proves that nothing but its success will unite the elements opposed to it, and concentrate them into one coherent and energetic phalanx. Such a union would have defeated it easily.—The leaders opposed to the Republicans are responsible for the election of Lincoln, if he shall be elected. When the Republicans are the "ins," and all their opponents are included in the "outs," they will unite, and not before, it seems. It is a deep humiliation and disgrace that it is so, but so it is. The people cannot help it now. It is too late. Let alone, they would have united. Their faith in politicians will be justly and sadly shaken by this canvass. Many honest statesmen there are who are not guilty of the charge of dividing our forces in the face of the enemy; but they were powerless in the rabble of office-hunters, who would sell their country as readily as Judas sold his master.

That the Republican party is pledged to the overthrow of slavery in the States, as well as its prohibition in the territories, notwithstanding their gently-expressed platform at Chicago, no well-informed man can doubt. That their leaders sympathize with John Brown, and with the Texas outrages, is equally certain. That they aim at the re-organization of the Supreme Court, the repeal of the Dred Scott decision, and the overthrow of every constitutional guarantee for the protection of the minority against the majority, whenever these things can be accomplished with safety, is amply apparent. Whether or not there will be much hope for the South after an army of Black Republican office holders is once established throughout her bounds, we cannot tell. We have no thing to say about resistance or submission. It is not our province. For ourselves, we still hope that this "foul domination" will not last longer than four years. The institutions of the South, and the rights of the States, we verily believe, cannot be endangered even by the election of a Black Republican administration.—Founded in the nature of things, in the instincts and reason of man, in the teachings of the Bible, in the wants of civilization, and recognized by the national constitution, they are impregnable. Were we willing to change them, neither the North nor Europe would consent. They are in more danger than we are. Our defeat will be more a loss of honor than of substantial rights. But—that can hardly be worse.

Let none of our people commit themselves to any thing rash. Let all act in the fear of God, in the presence of history, and in view of the bar of God. Faith in God, who can make a way for our escape, when we least look for it, is wanted now.

'IT WILL BREAK DOWN THE ITINERANCY.'

This is a stereotyped argument among Methodists. Almost every new movement in Methodism, good or bad, has had this objection hurled at it. It is generally the only argument of those who are determined to object, but know not what else to say. It is an easy way of dispensing with any thing like philosophical thought, or logical discussion. On the one hand, the hackneyed use of this argument is a good sign. It is an evidence of the conservative character of the Methodist people; of their devotion to the itinerancy; of their attachment to their system, which, as a whole, has been remarkably successful; of their tardiness in the adoption of hasty changes, and their opposition to questionable innovations. On the other hand it is an unfavorable sign. It is a sign that the success of early Methodism has disposed our people to neglect, as a rule, the study of the philosophy of development and progress. The early Methodist leaders, the most conservative, were, at the same time, the boldest of thinkers. The initiation of the most glorious religious movement of modern times. Their true successors are not those who stickle for every detail of early arrangement, but who, in the same simple trust in the guidance of providence, and with the same singleness of object,—to spread scriptural holiness—think and act with the same untrammelled boldness.

It will be readily admitted by all true Methodists that no new light, or prospective development, seems likely to weaken our faith in the itinerancy. But many things have been considered essential to it which were mere temporary accidents, and which, when their day of necessity is past, will pass away. And the progress of thought among Methodists, and the real development of Methodists, is not more manifest, in any thing, than in the gradual shedding off of these temporary accidents, and in the gradual approximation to the operation of the pure principle of the itinerancy. Once, "stations," as distinguished from circuits, were going to "break down the itinerancy." Now stations are "naturalized." Then the occupancy, by itinerant ministers, of editorships, professorships, and agencies, met with the same objection. But the objection has ceased in all these cases, and the efficiency of the itinerancy is as great as ever. Many other instances might be mentioned. So it will continue to be.

There is, as we think, and have long thought, but one principle vital to the itinerancy. While that is preserved intact, it is in no danger, whatever other changes may take place. That principle is, the power of the Bishops to send men wherever they are needed, and to change them wherever it is demanded, according to their godly discretion. Any limitation of this power, we think, is in violation of the radical philosophy of the itinerancy. Any restrictions upon the original prerogatives of the episcopacy is more calculated to break down the itinerancy, "than any thing else, whether it be done by legislation or public sentiment.

DR. NEELY AND THE POLITICIANS.

Rev. P. F. Neely, D.D., is well known as one of the most popular preachers in the country. He is a member, in good standing, of the Alabama Conference, a body of ministers unsurpassed, for intelligence, character, and usefulness, in American Methodism. Many years since he was involved in serious difficulty by engaging in a romantically benevolent enterprise; but a most painstaking investigation left no charge against him but that of imprudence. Though such ought to, and does, satisfy the right-minded, there are found those who can find it in the hearts to assail a man helpless to resent it in the manner common to men of the world. Mr. Brownlow, who, in his recent domestic misfortunes and sorrows, needed, deserved, asked, and received, the forbearance of even his opponents, has twice assailed Dr. Neely in his paper, in the most reckless and unfeeling manner, without the slightest provocation.

Dr. Neely is the Agent of the Southern Methodist Publishing House, and of the Alabama Conference Depository at Mobile. This is the second year of his agency. He has, for eighteen months, been delivering substantially the same address wherever he has gone in the State. Its staple is, the necessity and importance of the literary independence of the South, and of her general independence by the development of her latent resources. Wherever he has gone he has been remarkably successful. Considerably over a hundred thousand dollars has been raised. Last year, and until a few weeks past, the Alabama papers, of all shades of politics, have been full of encomiums upon the speaker and his cause. We heard the address at Eufaula last winter, and the result was a subscription of ten thousand dollars. It was called a good Southern rights speech, but nobody objected, that we heard of. Lately, however, certain papers have trumpeted it every where that Dr. Neely had taken the stump for one of the Presidential candidates. His friends and the Church are distressed, and there is general inquiry about it. But lo! it turns out to be the same address he had been delivering for nearly two years! He had not advocated the claims of a single candidate.

Southern literature and Southern Independence were all well enough when there was no election pending, but—"circumstances alter cases." But, not content with thus misrepresenting him, these papers have most foully assailed his private character.

HOME-STRICTURES.

REV. A. B. FLY AND THE ADVOCATE.

In the communication inserted below, Rev. A. B. Fly denies the correctness of the answers we recently gave to some questions by a correspondent from Fayetteville, Ala. Correct or not, we are glad that the case has been the means of securing to our columns somewhat of the services of Mr. Fly's pungent pen. We have long desired such service. It is due to him, however, and ourselves, to say, that the lack of that service, in a certain direction, has been our fault.

Mr. Fly is well known, and accredited, throughout the South-west, as one of the ablest champions, on the polemical field, of the doctrines and usages of the Methodist Church, especially of those involved in controversy.

In the baptismal controversy, he has been the victor in every fight. His presence in the South-west has been a break-water against the flood of heresies (heresies among Baptists as well as others) emanating from the notorious J. R. Graves. The service Mr. Fly has done in this respect is worthy of the highest commendation, and the New Orleans Christian Advocate, as the organ of the Church, in this region, does only its duty in awarding him the honorable position he has won, and in expressing the appreciation of the Church of his continued services in that line. In many places, there is, as there always will be, work of that kind to do, and we rejoice that we have the men able to perform it. The only difference of opinion between Mr. Fly and ourselves has been, as to the propriety of making the columns of the Advocate the arena of these polemical battles. Early in our editorial life, we decided in the negative, from experience, and from long, careful, and candid observation. We have conscientiously come to the conclusion that our family weeklies, our religious and literary journals, should not be made the engines of the polemical warfare between the Churches, however unavoidable, and sometimes necessary and valuable they may be.

We have frequently been placed in positions of painful delicacy by this course. Notwithstanding the strength of our own conscientious convictions, nothing but general approval could have sustained us in it.

It has laid us liable to the charge of an undue exercise of editorial authority, and sometimes the charge has been made. We have been pained, but never offended by such a charge. It is natural. Before we had any editorial experience we were sometimes tempted to make similar charges.

And we freely admit that, while an editor should be capable of the exercise of any degree of firmness—while he should remember that he alone is responsible for the whole character of the paper he conducts, and that the admission of one improper article vitiates that character—he should be guided by the keenest judgment, and by the nicest sense of discretion, and assiduously avoid the temptation to suffer firmness to degenerate into arbitrariness. While he has the character of the paper to guard, he also has the rights and feelings of others in his hands. He should therefore have as much delicacy as firmness. We have been firm in the declination of all matter calculated to stir up bitter controversies between the Churches, but we have never been arbitrary and dictatorial.

We mention these things in connection with Mr. Fly's the class of which he is the most eminent representative of we have declined. Others have blamed us, but he has, so far as we know. Though differing with us, yet, with that chivalric and high-toned magnanimity characteristic of him, he has done justice to our motives and feelings.

While we have declined his strictures upon other Churches, we do not decline those upon ourselves, written, as they are, in the spirit of a dignified and manly courtesy. We are public servants; and have neither the right nor the desire to avoid honest and just-minded criticism.

Mr. Fly denies our published opinion, that "the Methodist Church requires baptism before communion." He says that "this is something rather new" to him. It is not entirely new, then, we imagine. He cites the invitation, or exhortation, in the service for the Lord's Supper, "ye that truly and earnestly repent of your sins, etc." He says "penitents, truly such, are invited." So they are, if they be members of the Church. We admit that Baptism is not mentioned, but we had supposed that the invitation was given to members of the Church alone, and that no one could be a member of the Church without Baptism. Much "new light" must "enter the editorial sanctum" before we change this opinion.

The second opinion of ours criticised by Mr Fly is, that a class leader, in the absence of the pastor, may give a Church letter to a removing member. This opinion, we admit, needs qualification. It should be a case of necessity, and one where there is no doubt of the worthiness of the applicant. With these qualifications, Methodist usage, we think, will justify the course. Without such usage, many persons, when removing to a distant country, when the pastor is either dead or absent, would be unable to procure Church letters at all. The class-leader is the pastor's representative, chosen by him, a sub-pastor, and upon his recommendation alone, except in cases of necessity, persons can be received into full membership in the Church. The spirit of the law will sustain what we know to have been usage, that a class-leader, in these exceptional cases, may give a letter to a removing member, at least, to one of his own class. The pastor, in giving a letter, only acts as the representative of the Church; and may not the class do the same, where there is no pastor? But we give Mr. Fly's communication:

WHERE IS THE PROOF?

Mr. Editor.—I doubt the legality of your opinion as given in your issue of the 19th inst., in answer to the questions of your Fayettville correspondent. He asks, "if the Methodist Church requires Baptism before Communion?" You answer, "yes." Well, sir, this is something rather new to me. I have not so learned Methodism. I am pretty well posted in the lex scripta of the Methodist Church, have some little idea of the lex non scripta, but have never understood either to require baptism before communion. What new light has entered the editorial sanctum? As to the teachings of the written law, I am quite sure that they are against your opinion; and I am also certain that the usage of our Church has agreed with the discipline, from the time when my memory "runneth not to the contrary." I have heard sacramental lectures from Bishops and elders, who were doctors of divinity, but never heard one depart from the discipline. I therefore conclude that we may safely rely on the written rule for information on the subject. Page 149—the elder is required to give an invitation to all who possess the qualifications required by the Methodist Church, and every one possessing these qualifications may commune with the Methodists: "Ye that do truly and earnestly repent of your sins, and are in love and charity with your neighbors, and intend to lead a new life, following the commandments of God, and walking from henceforth in his holy ways, draw near with faith, and take this holy Sacrament to your comfort." This is what the Methodist church requires, and no more. Penitents, truly such, in love and charity with their neighbors, who intend to lead a new life, walking in the commandments of God, are invited to her altars, to their comfort. Baptism is not mentioned or thought of as a condition. This is the only law directly to the point in the discipline. I am sure that it does not sustain your opinion. No, Mr. Editor, we have no such custom, neither the Churches of God."

"But let a man examine himself, and see if he is truly penitent, and intends to lead a new life, walking in the commandments of God; and let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup." The Methodist Church walks in the "old paths, wherein is the good way."

He asks if a person can be received from one society into another on the certificate of a class-leader. You answer: "In the absence of the pastor of the removing member, yes." Well, sir, I suppose that, under peculiar circumstances, a man might be hung with a rope without a legal sentence of death; but would it be lawful? Will this opinion of yours stand, opposed as it is to the positive law of the Methodist Church. We think not. Page 40 requires the preachers to warn all, from time to time, that none are to remove from one station or circuit to another, without a note of recommendation from the preacher (not class-leader); and to inform them that, without such a certificate, they will not be received into the Church in other places."

I ask by what authority you are governed in your opinion, as to class-leader letters.

Now, I aver, Mr. Editor, that if you break one of the least of the rules, and teach your correspondents so, you shall incur all the "pains and penalties" of the law, and that the penalty shall be inflicted upon you, with the lash of the old fogies. So you may look out for breakers. Editors are great men with us, but they must mind how they talk in those great big sheets that every body reads.

THE WORD "SOUTH."

Our co-laborer, the St. Louis Christian Advocate, has recently spoken out upon the proposition to remove the word "South" from the name of our Church. He says:

A number of our editors, agents, and some of our bishops seem to be quite dissatisfied with the word "South," attached to our name as a Church. Several editors and correspondents of our Church papers have lately expressed their dissatisfaction, and Bishop Pierce, in one of his late letters about California, uses the following language:

"The word 'South' is very much in our way, just because it has a sectional sound. Many who approve our position and policy are hindered from coming to us because of that appendage to our name. It does us no good anywhere, and is turned against us by those who seek occasion to find fault, and is objected to by many who could come to us if it were removed."

This is, doubtless, all true; but we remember very well that in 1845, when we strenuously opposed the use of the word in that connection, some of the very men now so greatly dissatisfied were ready to laugh at us, and regard our objections as nothing worth. We objected at the right time, and predicted the very things that have since come to pass. Our brethren who were then opposed to our views, come out now, and object, after the deed has been done. Then we were concerned about the matter; now we care less about it, as all the evil likely to grow out of it has already occurred.

We respectfully suggest to our worthy confrere that the above is a little too sweeping. Those who are now leading in this movement, have always held their present opinion, and consistently advocated the proposed curtailment, most of them from before the General Conference at Columbus, Ga., in 1854. Not one of them, with the exception of our brother editor at St. Louis, was in the Convention of 1845, or the General Conference of 1846. Moreover, in justice to those who then favored the use of the distinctive appendage, there may have existed reasons for it, at that time, the force of which we, who came later upon the stage, cannot now so well appreciate. We, however, cannot help believing it was, even then, an unfortunate, though honest mistake.

Is it not, to say the least, scarcely logical for our St. Louis brother to think it scarcely logical for our St. Louis brother to simply because the majority have been tardy in coming to his view of the case. On the contrary, being the only one of our present editors who battled against the adoption of the word at the outset, we think he ought to be the leader of those of us who are younger in the attempt now being made to remove it. We think, also, that he is mistaken in thinking that "all the evil likely to grow out of it has already occurred." Far from it. So far, it has not done us, comparatively, very much practical harm. But if we now refuse to remove it, it will be productive of evil. It will confirm the unjust charges heretofore founded upon it, that it implies a real sectionality, instead of meeting a supposed necessity for a distinctive appellation. In California, it is in our way. Those in the Baltimore Conference, and on the Border generally, who wish to come to us, are hindered by it.—We do not seek its removal on those accounts, alone, nor principally, however. We mention them as illustrations of the evil likely to grow out of it. We should not seek to electioneer and proselyte, but we should remove all unnecessary causes of continued separation between those who agree in principle.

Let us resolve to cut off the sectional distinction at the next General Conference. Let us get ready in time. Let all the annual Conferences take action. Let ample legal advice be taken, in all the States, as to the legislation rendered necessary by the change, if any is necessary. Let our Church no longer be considered by the world, however unjustly, as bound to the fortunes of party politics.

OUR HOME WORK.

Uniontown.—Rev. J. Bancroft writes us of a revival at Uniontown, Ala. Conference, resulting in 51 conversions, and 36 additions to the Methodist Church at that place. More additions are expected. The beautiful new church, dedicated by Dr. Wightman, last autumn, has been accepted and blessed of God. It cost $12,000, and will seat, comfortably, 425 persons. Many years ago we were at Uniontown, when the present successful pastor was a school-boy, and have always regarded it as an important position for the Church.

Wesley Chapel.—Rev. R. J. Jones, junior, writes us of a profitable meeting at Wesley Chapel, Holmes Circuit, Miss. Conference, resulting in 24 additions to the Church, and 25 or 30 conversions. It was a refreshing time.

Bastrop.—J. F. Dayan, Bible agent, writes us of a gracious meeting at Bastrop, La., probably reported before. Up to the time he left, 29 had joined the Church.

Cayuga Circuit.—Rev. H. A. J. Parker writes us that on this circuit, Miss. Conference, about 50 have joined the Church on probation. A recent revival at Southern Female College resulted in 14 additions to the Church. The College opened the first Monday in October.

Warner Circuit.—Rev. G. F. Thompson writes us that at Red Bone, on this circuit, Miss. Conference, they had a gracious revival, resulting in a number of conversions, and twenty additions to the church. At Bogue Hesha a number were converted and added to the Church.

Villula' Circuit, Ala. Con.—Rev. T. L. Densler writes that 60 or 70 have joined the Church on probation; that a good parsonage has been bought and furnished, and that the people and the local preachers are of the right sort. Send us to that circuit the next time we go on one.

Ash Creek Colored Mission, Ala. Con.—Rev. P. R. M'Crary writes that the mission is in good condition; planters and overseers favorable; the negroes gratified and edified; the children learning rapidly under catechetical instruction; some of the overseers and their wives converted and added to the Church, with some of the planters; 222 have joined the Church on probation.

Geneva Circuit, Ala. Con.—Rev. Wm. H. Adams writes that within a month 75 have joined the Church on probation, 60 at one church—Dr. Jones' church. Missionary prospects bright.

Winnsboro Circuit, La. Con.—Rev. T. J. Lacy does nothing but labor in and report revivals. In the last three months 170 have joined the Church, although the pastor was much afflicted for most of the time. The work is going on gloriously.

Point Jefferson, La. Con.—Rev. J. D. Stone writes us of a good meeting at this place, at which a society was organized, and 21 joined the church.

Hazelhurst, Miss. Con.—Rev. A. B. Nicholson writes us that recently a beautiful new church was dedicated at this beautiful railroad town, by Rev. Dr. Marshall, assisted by the venerable and Rev. Thomas Nixon, and others. Dr. M.'s sermon was one of his best. The Spirit of God was present. $1200 were raised; a good meeting is still in progress.

Middleton Circuit, Miss. Con.—Rev. J. G. Carlisle reports that 95 have joined the Church, most of them converted. This is truly a matter of great rejoicing.

AUTHORS AND BOOKS.

The Methodist Quarterly for October has articles on John Ruskin; the Florist Maroons; Party Politics; Early Methodism in the Bounds of the old Genesee Conference; Wesley as a man of Literature; Exposition of the Eighth Psalm; the 'Lord's Supper, and a Reply to the New Englander on the subject of Wesleyanism and Taylorism. I have read only the article on Ruskin, which appears to me somewhat inflated. It is difficult to praise Ruskin too highly, but easy to praise him injudiciously; and it is surely wrong to say that he alone, of all the living writers of English, speaks as a Christian.

The North American Review for October contains articles on Homer and his Heroines; Climatology; the Life and Labors of Thomas Prince; Edmund Waller; Lord Shaftesbury; Vol. II. of Palfrey's History of New England; Quarantine and Hygiene; Rush's occasional Productions, the English language in America; the Origin of Species, and an Inglorious Milton. The last article gives a very curious account of one Thomas Peyton, who wrote "the Ulysse of Time in the first and second age, Divinely Handled," in 1620, about forty years before Milton's Paradise Lost was published. The two poems, though very unlike in power and mode of treatment, are very curiously alike in plan, and even in many minor points of treatment. Like the Paradise Lost, this work begins with the beginning of human existence, and treats mainly of the fall of man, but it takes a wider range, follows the descendants of Adam to the time of Noah, and promises a continuation of the story, which promise was, probably, not fulfilled.

The Reviewer quotes parallel passages, of which I take the following as a sample. Every one remembers Milton's grand opening:—

"Of man's first disobedience, and the fruit
Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought death into our world, and all our woe,
With loss of Eden, till one greater Man
Restore us, and regain the blissful seat,
Sing, Heavenly Muse, that on the secret top
Of Oreb, or of Sinai, didst inspire
That Shepherd, who first taught the chosen seed,
In the beginning, how the heavens and earth
Rose out of Chaos."

Here is the introduction of the other poem:—

"The author first doth God's assistance crave
Throughout the work, that he His help may have.
The sacred Sabbath, Satan's envious gall,
The woman framed, and man's most dismal fall—
The tree of life, protected from the brute,
The tree of knowledge, with her fatal fruit,
For fear the world should finally be ended,
God's dearest daughters down in haste descended,
The flaming sword, the tree of life that guarded—
The cherubim upon the walls that warded,
The land of Eden, is described at large,
Heaven's judgments just to all men's future charge."

Peyton's allusion is almost ludicrous; and the rhymes help very much to take away what little majesty the language might otherwise have had:

"The angels which against the Lord did swell
He quite cashiered, and cast them down to hell,—
Where being bound eternally in chains
They feel the torment of ten thousand pains."

The reviewer concludes his very valuable article with this summary of the merits of Peyton's Poem: "Before we began our task, when this curious book lay as a new and strange thing before us, we were strongly impressed, not only by the similarity of its plan to that of "Paradise Lost," but by its own individuality,—the freshness and originality of its narrative.—There are in the range of its contents lively pictures of men and manners, pathetic accounts of sufferings caused by religious bigotry, lessons of patience and long-suffering useful for any and all times, lessons in loyalty peculiarly fitted for the poet's time, lessons in sound doctrine certainly needed for our own time. Nor is the dignity of the subject lowered by the faultiness of style manifest in the composition. The general character of this is rough; but it is often strong and sometimes beautiful. We feel, in reading it, as we feel in meeting some old person whom nature has gifted with a solid and keen mind, which the experience of a long and varied life has cut and sharpened to a brilliancy beyond our own elaborate polish. Toward such a one we have no spirit of fault-finding. Eccentricities of manner and homeliness of speech are forgotten in the usefulness of the truths enforced, and in the unconscious beauty of the thoughts expressed. Thus when we pore over the heavy lettering of these yellow pages, where, in most cases, the orthography is obsolete, and in many instances the words themselves have lost their significance, where occasional mistakes are corrected with the pen, perhaps, in the author's own hand,—where every rhetorical change is noted in the margin, and every source of information and allusion honestly referred to; when, transported by these associations, we go back to that period of English history and English life, and remember how much this man found to contend against, not only in his individual experience, but also in the comparatively rude state of letters, and poverty of books; when, to sum up all, we can see so clearly the elaborate development of a long-cherished idea, painfully thought out into language, and committed to the world with somewhat more than an author's ambition and desire, with a deep appreciation of the nobleness of his theme, and a pious wish to promote God's glory,—we forget his faults and crudities, we admire his thought and its expression, we look upon him as a poet in the highest sense,—a creator. And then we consider his youth,—only thirty-one when the work was accomplished, as a vignette in the title-page informs us. Surely this was a "good light" in those days, when Time moved rather after the manner of the 'cycles of Cathay,' than of the years of modern Europe."

Yesterday began here the sale of Wm. E. Burton's library, a sale which has attracted more attention from the best class of book buyers and book lovers than any which has taken place here for several years. There are 6000 "lots," and the catalogue, which had a sale of its own, cost, to get it up, no less than $1,500. The range of the library may be guessed from the fact, that the books are classified under no less than sixty-eight different heads. The principal of these are, America, Antiquities, Biography, Bibliography and Typography, England, Facetiæ, Fine Arts, Greek and Latin Classics, Jurisprudence, General Literature, Magazines and Periodicals, Prose, Fiction, Poetry, Theology, and Trials. More than a third of the collection, however, consists of dramatic works and books relating to the drama. The gem of Mr. Burton's collection, however, is not to be sold. This is an "illustrated" Shakspeare, of which, as few have ever seen it, and fewer yet will ever see it now, I quote for you an excellent description, from the pen of Dr. Shelton Mackenzie, of Philadelphia, himself a Shakspearian scholar, and a friend of Burton. He says:—"This great book, which Mr. Burton greatly valued, as shown by the great labor and heavy cost which he devoted to its pictorial illustration, occupied the most prominent place in his library, as much from its extent as its importance. This was a fine edition of Boydell's Shakspeare, published 1792-1801, in nine volumes folio, and exquisitely printed by Bulmer of London, the rival and some said even the equal of that eminent typographer, Bakerville, of Birmingham. Copiously illustrated by Mr. Burton, at a cost of between $1000 and $3000, this copy of Shakspeare had expanded, under his hands, from nine to forty volumes. We have some little knowledge of books, and have some degree of familiarity with the most illustrious libraries in Europe, private and public, besides knowing something of the collections here, but we have not yet seen any thing on such a grand scale of illustration, as Burton's copy of Boydell's Shakespeare. Several years ago, Mr. Burton, who showed us the work, with no small degree of satisfaction, assured us that it had then cost him nearly $5,000, and, when we last spoke to him about this opus magnum, he said that, since our inspection of it he had spent over $2,000 more upon it. This wonderful Shakspeare contained, with some drawings, a collection of all the engravings (of any worth) which had ever been published as illustrations to Shakspeare. Nor these alone, though these would swell up the book very largely. Portraits, views, antiquities, architectural designs, costumes—everything at all bearing upon the text of Shakspeare had been pressed into the service, with Mr. Burton's usual taste and liberality. We understand that his daughters, remembering how greatly Mr. Burton prized this Shakspeare, have determined to retain it among themselves, as a sort of family heir-loom. The reservation does credit to their judgment as well as their affection."

There is little new in the book world. Till after the Election, publishers will hold back; and "the Season" has not yet begun in England, where the cities have literally nothing to abuse.

Lindsay & Blakiston issue "The Beautiful City, and the King of Glory," by Woodbury Davis, who says in his introduction: "The subject to which the reader's attention is called—the Kingdom of Christ—was recently arranged into the series of lessons embraced in this volume, for a Bible Class under my care."

Smith, English & Co. have got out "Pulpit Themes and Preachers' Assistant; Outlines of Sermons," by the author of "Helps for the Pulpit."

Sheldon & Co. have got out "Love and Penalty; or, Eternal Punishment consistent with the Fatherhood of God," by Joseph P. Thompson, D.D., Pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle Church. They also publish "The Life and Letters of Mrs. Emily C. Judson," by A. D. Kendrick, professor of Greek Literature in the University of Rochester.

Daniel Dana, jr., has got out "Moravian Life; or, An English Girl's Account of a Moravian Settlement in the Black Forest," edited by the author of "Mary Powell."

Is it worthy of mention that President Buchanan and the Hon. G. Bancroft now write for it? It being the Ledger.

FOOTPRINTS ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

NUMBER XVI.

No Time for Pleasure Trips—Southern Methodism in its Youth—Its Freedom from Political Questions—Having a tiny wooden [illegible]

ly twenty-five miles distant, I accepted the offer of Br. Blythe and visited the "big trees." I will not describe them, inasmuch as Bishop Andrew's letter on this subject is well-remembered. His statements were regarded by many as extravagant, and incredulity was overcome only by confidence in the writer. I will just add, that since his visit another forest has been discovered of yet larger trees. They are more numerous too and the most attractive as they are found in the neighborhood of the most magnificent falls on the American Continent. I heard a distinguished European traveler say, that for grandeur of scenery there was nothing among the Alps to compare with that at these Falls. I did not visit this last wonder of the world, simply because I had no time to spare from the work of the ministry. Gospel self-denial allows a preacher no holiday visits of pleasure—they are not provided for in the apostolic programme. A minister's time belongs to God and the people whom he has engaged to serve, and exclusivity, taste, personal gratification must all be kept in rigid abeyance to primary, paramount duty. I went to California to preach, to visit the Churches and to plan for the extension of our work on the Pacific coast. These things filled my head and heart, employed my tongue, consumed my time and furnished my enjoyment.

I was delighted with the country, the people, the prospects of Southern Methodism. Expecting to find a feeble Church struggling for life against an adverse public sentiment, I was exultant to find an earnest, cheerful, heroic body of ministers, supported by a membership respectable in numbers, hopeful in spirit, ready for every good work. In the Church there is spirit, life, power—without, there is confidence, favor and willingness to cooperate. California is a free State on economic principles, doubtless anti-slavery in the sentiments of a majority of her citizens, not from wild, dreamy, ultra ideas of human rights, but because the seasons, the productions of the country do not demand, are not suited to slave labor. Withal the people are sensible, distinguish between things that differ, understand the rights of the State and the business of the Church. They indorse the position of our Church on the subject of slavery, as scriptural and right, deprecate the agitation of an irrelevant question by the agents of the Church, and besides, in every view of the case, take the ground that they have nothing to do with the vexed and vexing question. They do not sympathize with intermeddlers, busy bodies in other men's matters. As our preachers have been prudent, conscientious men, men of one work, aiming at nothing but the glory of God in the conversion of souls, they command public respect, and public men and private citizens wish them God-speed. We have an open field, access to the people and all the encouragement we could ask to stimulate our zeal and to justify our expenditures.

The Northern Methodists are not in our way. If they will stick to their Master's work they too may do well. If they cherish prejudice, keep up a pugnacious spirit, and intermeddle with all strife, they will wax feeble and perish from the country. True, they look upon us as intruders and would fain limit us to the slave states. They misinterpret us and will not understand us. But we beg leave to do our own thinking and maintain the proposition, that our division of Methodism is free to go anywhere and everywhere, because our sole aim and policy is to preach the Gospel and nothing but the Gospel to bond and free. True, our name has a sectional sound, while yet it is only distinctive, but our spirit is catholic and our mission, love and peace. Alas, the very principles of Northern Methodism are local, sectional and beyond their proper geographical limits, they become pernicious. If they are honest, consistent, their avowed doctrines constitute them disturbers of the peace. They enter into the slave States as open, declared enemies of the institutions of the people. On their own theory, they cannot be faithful to God without aiding and abetting runaway slaves. They must sympathize with arson, blood and murder, insurrection and carnage. Recent developments in Texas and editorials and articles in the papers of the Northern Church, justify the logic of these conclusions. For these reasons, abolitionists cannot and ought not to be tolerated in the Southern States. No quarantine will justify their admission, no fumigation can disinfect them. Rank, rotten, with the foul virus of an incurable disease, foes of God and man, spies and traitors to their country and their kind, let them stay where they belong. Understand me, I speak of the out and out abolitionists. There are sound, good men in the Northern Church, preachers and people, but they are in bad company, in the midst of evil advisers, maintain unscriptural opinions, and must share the opprobrium of their association. Sorry for it, but we cannot help it. Let them come out and stand with us upon the Bible, and Methodism, purged and clean, may once more be a unit, a grand unity, filling the whole country. As the masons say, "so mote it be."

Thank God we have no such impediments or limitations. Go where we may, preaching the Gospel, re-organizing churches, nobody suspects us because of our creed, discipline or antecedents. Invention must manufacture complaints. We have never furnished any by our opinions or practice. Prejudice may concoct an objection, fear of our success may haunt some excited imagination, or in the stupor of anti-christian bigotry, some ghostly dreamer may mutter strange things. I had a very hearty laugh over an editorial of one of the Northern Methodist papers, on either the California or Oregon paper I forget which. The Black Republican papers too made an extract, headed: "A grave charge against a Bishop." The substance of the whole was that I had been sent on in a Government stage, free of cost, as a slavery propagandist. Well, well; is that not funny? If I had not been sorry for the spirit of the writer, my amusement would have been without alloy. I hope for the honor of the country, that Mr. Buchanan's agents fare better than I did in transitu. Bless God, I went at the bidding of a higher authority than Mr. B.'s and on better work than any he could give me.

I write these things because I wish the Southern Church to wake up to a higher appreciation of the rectitude of our position, the dignity of our mission, the catholic genius of our organization. We came out from abolition Babylon—a persecuted people. We have taken the dead fly out of the pot of ointment. We have got our division of Zion back upon the old apostolic platform and, in my judgment, the heaven of truth and righteousness must be diffused. God forbid, that we should contract its operation by any narrow, exclusive, illiberal notions about free soil or slave territory. The "great commission" ought to be the motto upon our banner. The M. E. Church, South, is just as much at home (where she ought to be) in California as in Georgia. Her right to labor is just the same in one place as another. She knows "no North or South or East or West," but is free to go wherever there are souls to save o'er this broad earth. Sooner or later, if faithful to her high and holy calling, she will be welcome everywhere.

Convinced of the justice of these views and believing that the Church would justify action on them, I stretched my disciplinary authority, and sent four preachers (all I could spare) to Oregon. The people there, tired of abolition lectures and slavery agitation, hungry for the bread of life, wanted our ministry and called urgently for it. Too far away from headquarters for consultation, I took the responsibility of sending a few preachers and wished in my soul for more money and men. I am glad a beginning has been made in that magnificent country; the brethren there need help. I promised to send at least ten more preachers this year. My long indisposition has interfered with my plans, but, with the co-operation of colleagues, I yet hope to redeem my [illegible] for a force so feeble in numbers. Already we have gathered more than three hundred members, have had camp-meetings, great revivals and the fields are white unto the harvest. By 1862 I expect the General Conference to set off "the Oregon Conference" and perhaps include the Washington Territory. The recent circular from Nashville about the wants of the treasury and the apprehended falling off in the collections, casts a shadow upon the brightness of my hopes. But to the Methodists who may read this letter, I put the question, shall a prosperous enterprise languish in Oregon and our young Conference in California grow discouraged because of stinted contributions in the East? Will you not enlarge your gifts to meet the exigency? The appropriations need not be large to support the brethren, but we need money to pay their way to these distant fields. Will not the Church come to the Treasurer's aid and justify the Missionary Board in the providing for these expenses? The men can be found to go, but they are generally too poor to bear the burden of the passage either by land or sea.

So clear are my convictions that both these enterprises will be remunerative in the extension of our Church, in the conversion of souls, in the spirit and convenience of our missionary work, and after a while in the enlargement of our resources both as to men and means, that I shall not cease my importunities until both points are effectually manned.

One more point at this time. The Church in San Francisco is too feeble to build such a house of worship as the importance of the position demands. They must have aid and I pledged them $5000 from the Eastern Conferences. The application would have been made the past spring and summer but I was not able to travel. I make this statement now so that no one need be surprised when I call, as I shall. I carried with me about $2300: this and more was expended in the purchase of a very eligible lot. The Church is yet to be built and the purpose is to incur no debt. Experience has taught us to pay as we go.

KENTUCKY CONFERENCE.

The Kentucky Conference adjourned at nine o'clock Wednesday evening, September 26, after a pleasant session of eight days. T. F. Vannueter, Secretary.—There had been an increase during the year of one thousand one hundred members, and three hundred probationers, making a total of one thousand four hundred. The missionary collections amount to about three thousand seven hundred dollars, a larger amount than ever before collected. The collections for the superannuated preachers are also greater than heretofore. The ministry has been better supported, and many new and costly churches have been erected and parsonages purchased. The sum of ninety thousand dollars has been secured towards the College enterprise at Millersburg, within the past three years, showing that there is an improvement in all the interests of Methodism in Kentucky. Resolutions were adopted tendering the thanks of the Conference to the citizens of Newport for their generous hospitality in entertaining the members of the Conference. Also to the pastors and members of the various churches in Newport, Covington, and Cincinnati, who tendered their churches to the Conference on Sunday. Also to Col. Bowler, of the Kentucky Central Railroad, and to the officers of the steamer Boston, for the favor of half-fare passage to the members of the Conference; and to Capt. Air for a free passage on his ferry-boats to and from Cincinnati, during the session of the Conference.

The next session of the Conference will be held at Paris.

A SABBATH SCENE.—RESORATION OF THE DAY—A REMEDY SUGGESTED.

It is morning—I am quietly seated in my temporary home, but as I look out toward the public highway, near at hand, and behold how the day is being desecrated, my spirit is stirred within me. On that highway, which leads to a country village, two-thirds of a league distant, may be seen passing to and fro, servants with vehicles of different kinds, variously loaded. Some going with "their stuff" to market, while others, having already been to the place of trade and made sales and purchases, and gotten something to enliven the inner man, are noisily rattling on toward home. And still others, some afoot and some on horse-back, are wending their way, hither and thither, with baskets, sacks, and bundles, etc., and troubled and grieved at witnessing such scenes, I ask, why so much noise and stir on this holy day?—Has anything unusual occurred in the community to render the present commotion specially necessary? The answer is, not at all. A further response, however, tells that this is only the fashion of the country. How deplorable! and yet it is a fact that scenes very similar to that here instanced may be witnessed on almost any Sabbath of the year, in many portions of the land.

The blame for all this must rest somewhere; that it rests only in part upon the slave, is plain; he may be about his own or his master's business; in either case the latter is recognized, both by divine and human law, as the party mainly responsible.

Will a master knowingly suffer his slave to be a gadabout, to work, or in any open way to violate the Sabbath? Does he have no rules, use no special means to prevent this sort of thing? Then, evidently, he is culpable. If this view be correct, how many masters throughout the land are, to day, guilty in the sight of God as profaners of his holy Sabbath! But who are the guilty parties? Do they all stand ranged without the pale of christianity? Are none to be found within this sacred enclosure? Alas! it is to be greatly feared that there whose ears would tingle, and whose consciences would smite them sorely, were a disclosure made before the world, revealing the extent to which they too are participants in this crying sin. But it is not so important to ascertain the parties to this sin, and the why and wherefore of this guilt, as to point out a remedy for the evil. While the writer cannot hope to do this fully, he may at least offer some suggestions that will not be unacceptable to those who sincerely desire to find the "more excellent way" of preserving among their servants, on the Sabbath, such decorum as its sanctity requires.

With this end in view, the following rules are suggested as worthy of consideration, viz.: As a leading and invariable rule for every place, set it down—1st. That no work shall be done on the Sabbath-day.

The command that authorizes a father and master to say to his children and servants, "Do no work on this holy day," also implies the duty on his part of seeing, as far as he can, that these, as well as himself, comply with this command. As regards works of necessity, judgment and conscience, enlightened by the word of God, must regulate these. At the same time let a man beware how he pushes or suffers the ox to be pushed into the ditch, so that it must needs be taken out on the Sabbath-day.

2nd. Servants should be kept at home on the Sabbath. This is a general rule. As for the exceptions to be allowed under it, in given cases, masters, bearing in mind their responsibility to God, must judge of these. Respecting this rule, it is held, where there are, say, from ten to fifteen families of servants on a plantation, that its observance, under all circumstances, ought not to be thought any hardship, and for various reasons, some of which are the following, viz.: first, this number is quite sufficient to form a pleasant little community, and servants should be taught to find their principal social enjoyment amongst themselves; second, the quiet and rest to be had under this rule is in good keeping with the great intent of the law of the Sabbath; third, the most contented and happy people, in their social relations, be they white or black, are those who learn to love home better than any other place, and one way to learn this is to stay at it a good deal.

One other rule is suggested, to be applied where a master has interested himself so far as to procure preaching specially for the benefit of his servants, viz.:

3d. That all who are old enough, and able, be required to attend, and respectfully hear the word preached.

A man who has had much experience in the missionary work on plantations, will at once see the propriety of such a rule as this. In the absence of it, and where a loose rein is held, especially as regards the Sabbath, the principal portion of the slaves are apt to be greatly corrupted; and indeed this is generally the case under this sort of government. On such plantations the missionary is not unfrequently discouraged in his work at seeing half, and sometimes not a fourth of a man's servants present at preaching. And while some of them are off—nobody knows where—others are seen strolling about the quarters and the place, to all appearance as perfectly indifferent as if they had never heard of the Sabbath, and as if there were no gospel within a thousand miles of them. And now can it be justly claimed that christian masters have fulfilled their whole duty toward their servants, in this particular, when, having brought the gospel within their reach, they still leave it entirely optional with these whether they attend and hear or not?

Surely, this is a question that many masters would do well seriously to consider. The command, "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy," is, in the first place, to be observed, specially and personally, by each individual; in the next place, if a person be the head of a household, as father and master, it is his duty, also, in these relations, to remember and keep holy the Sabbath; and now if, for the better observance of this day, it be his duty as an individual to attend upon the public worship of God, when he has opportunity, then evidently there is some obligation resting upon him as a father and a master to see that his children and servants, who are under his immediate care and authority, so far as is practicable, do the same.

Reader, is not this sound logic? If so, then where art thou to-day? Among those who, according to the true spirit of the law, and in the fullness of the letter, are endeavoring to keep holy the Sabbath-day; or those who profane it?

I pray you answer these questions at the bar of conscience, as you would at the judgment seat.

IN BONDS.—Dr. Elliott, in the Central Christian Advocate, tries to frighten Dr. Bond, of the Baltimore Christian Advocate, from advocating the separation of the Baltimore Conference from the Northern Methodist Church, by a column eulogy upon his father, the late Dr. Bond, sen. This is as good logic as Dr. Elliott was ever master of.

REV. MR. SPURGEON, after a tour upon the continent of two months, has returned to his duties in London, and resumed his labors at Exeter Hall. During his travels he preached in the Cathedral at Geneva, and, contrary to the Baptist mode of addressing a congregation, the reverend gentleman ascended the pulpit dressed in full canonicals. So great was the anxiety to hear him, that some came as many as two hundred miles for the purpose.

INDEPENDENT CATHOLICS.—The Independent American Catholics of Richmond, Va., have formed a congregation, under the pastoral lead of Rev. Mr. Tirion, formerly a chaplain of the French army in the Crimea, and have fitted up a house at the corner of Broad street and Brooke Avenue, for religious worship. They observe all the forms and ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Church, but do not acknowledge the supremacy of the Bishop.

UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH.—The grand enterprise of the Episcopal Church in the South begins already to assume a tangible form. Over $600,000 are said to have been subscribed and paid in; ten thousand acres together have been purchased at Sewanee Mountain, Tennessee, and ten dioceses are represented in the corporation. The executive committee now advertise in the papers for plans for the main building, which must contemplate a central structure, flanked by two wings, the whole to be two stories high.

A WESLEYAN NOVEL READER.—The following curious statement appears in the London Critic: "An invalid merchant of great wealth, belonging to the Wesleyan persuasion, has been so much pleased with two characters in Farquhar Frankheart—old Grace Parker and Mr. Dixon—that he has bequeathed $2000 to be divided equally amongst ten of the oldest women in connection with us, should that many such results followed the reading."

INCREASE OF BAPTISTS IN WALES.—During the year ending in June last, the increase of Baptists in Wales, was seven thousand one hundred and ninety-seven.—Such is the report of the Associations. There are eight Associations and four hundred and seventeen Churches, in the little Principality of Wales. It is within the recollection of persons still living, when there was but one Association.

THE LUTHERAN CHURCH.—The forthcoming number of the Evangelical Review for October, in its review of Dr. Krath's sermon on "Christian Liberty," draws a gloomy picture of the present position of the Lutheran Church in the United States. There is a great want of harmony between the natives of different countries.

HOPE FOR IRELAND.—Dr. Murray writes to the N. Y. Observer, that a wonderful change has come over Ireland. The Roman Catholic Church is no longer dominant. The moulding influences at work in different parts of the Island, are decidedly Protestant and evangelical.

AMERICAN CHINESE CONVERTED.—Rev. J. S. Shuck, formerly of the Baptist mission in China, and now in California, and whom we have known, by his occasional visits to Alabama, since 1846, writes that he has baptized more converts than all the Baptist missionaries at Shanghai combined during the same time.

WHAT NAME?—Why do people continue to send us communications, obituaries, and the like, without signature? How can we know of their reliableness without a responsible signature.

CONGREGATIONALISTS IN ENGLAND.—The Orthodox Congregationalists of England have a chapel-building society which in seven years has aided in the erection of 120 chapels. It raised last year $15,000.

RETURN OF THE JEWS.—The Sultan of Turkey is encouraging Jewish emigration to Palestine. It is expected that, under the inducements offered, large numbers of the Jews will resort to their ancient home.

FACTS AND FIGURES TO BE REMEMBERED.

An article has recently appeared in the Journal of Commerce exposing the ignorance and malignity of that arch-conspirator and incendiary, William H. Seward, in regard to the independence of the North of the South, which deserves the serious attention of our town people, many of whom are quite as much influenced by this delusion as Seward pretends to be. This is a statement of the comparative exports and imports of the two sections of the Union.

The exports of the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1860, embracing specie and American produce, amounted to $373,167,461; in addition to which we also exported about $27,000,000, of foreign produce, making all of our exports $400,167,161, and exceeding our imports for the same period $38,370,252; the imports being $361,797,209.

Of this amount the specie was	56,946,541
The amount of American produce consequently exported was	$316,220,610

We propose to classify the amount furnished exclusively by the Free States, the amount furnished by both the free and slave States, (where it is impossible to separate and designate the representative amount furnished by each,) and the amount furnished exclusively by the slave States.

Free States exclusively:

Fisheries—embracing spermaceti and whale oils, whalebone, dried and pickled fish	$1,156,189
Coal	731,846
Ice	183,444
Total free States	5,071,431

Without enumerating the long list of these articles, we give the grand total of products of free and slave States, viz: $96,820,299.

Slave States exclusively:

Cotton	$191,806,555
Tobacco	14,346,647
Rosin and turpentine	3,741,527
Rice	2,567,329
Tar and pitch	1,041,095
Brown sugar	101,221
Molasses	11,562
Hemp	8,351
Total slave State	213,322,880

RECAPITULATION.

Free States exclusively	5,071,431
Free and slave States	98,826,299
Slave States exclusively	213,322,880
Total	316,220,610

Upon these figures the Journal of Commerce remarks: If any one will analyze the articles embraced in the amount of $96,826,299, belonging alike to the labor of the free and slave States, he will find that at least one-third is justly the products of slave labor. We have, therefore, the fact that out of $316,220,610 of exports of domestic industry, nearly $250,000,000 is furnished by those States known as slave States.

These are the figures which exhibit facts that every Northern man should consider who prefers his own country and his own fellow to any other. We can readily understand, with Mr. Seward's hostile feelings to fifteen States of the Union, how it is that he should prefer the prosperity of Europe. But he has permitted his malice and hatred to overreach the interest of his own people. If we have no sugar and cotton to export, what becomes of the deservedly proud city of his own State? Take away from our exports the sum of $191,800,555, the single article of cotton, and tell us what ruin at a world spread. Are Mr. Seward and his followers so short-sighted as to suppose that only the producers of the article will be affected by its destruction? Every interest in the United States would feel the shock, and the commercial world itself would tremble under the catastrophe. These figures require no argument to satisfy reflecting men that our discards are driving us to ruin. They appeal with a force that every section can understand.

But suppose we raise the curtain and look beyond this present state of united happiness, united interest, and united prosperity, and see what lies behind. Suppose Mr. Seward and his followers succeed in dismiting this people, who are the greatest sinbearers? At present the foreign commerce of this country is in the North; the capital to carry it on is furnished by the South. When we become separated and it may be, hostile nations, the scene will be changed. The Southern young man will be compelled to do in this business what now almost exclusively belongs to the Northern. The very institution of slavery may have some influence in taking away from the young men in the South the necessity to follow commercial employment, and hence there is not that stimulant there which exists at the North.

Let two separate Governments follow the policy of Mr. Seward, which will as certainly take place as the night succeeds the day, and where now the South appears to be languid all will be life, energy and activity. The great law of necessity will urge them to a policy which, if they had followed their interest, they would have adopted long ago. The interest of the Southern people will be exclusively free trade; they will have no necessity to build up this or that domestic industry by bounties or protective tariffs, and hence the North will lose what is now the greatest source of their wealth—the home market. In looking over the classification we have presented of the industrial interest of each section, it will be found that New England and, in fact, most of the Northern free States, furnish but little of our wealth as exhibited by the exports. The question is suggestive, in what, then, does the actual wealth of the North consist? They are an industrious people, and must certainly make something.—It is answered, in fact that they supply the home market with those articles that are not imported from foreign countries, and their amount is millions. To the Union they are indebted for this wealth; without it their industry would come in competition with other countries, and under which they would not be able to stand. Take an illustration in the article of cotton manufactures; suppose there was no tariff at all, what would become of that interest in the free States? Capital and labor would both feel the blow. In the South the reverse would take place; capital and labor would both be benefited. And so it is with every article that could be mentioned. We only point out these things to show the folly of continuing this controversy of the "irrepressible conflict." Those who are engaged in it will certainly bring ruin upon their section, while they may open new avenues to wealth in that section they are seeking to destroy. We present the figures and facts for the reflecting men of the North. They can not deceive you. If, as we think, they must assuredly show it is to your interest to continue this Union with your Southern brethren, it becomes you, then, to let them have peace on this slavery question. They can live without you, so far as interest is concerned. You will feel materially the separation. The question is a simple one. To the North it appeals to their common sense and common interest. To the South it appeals only to their safety and the protection of their liberties. Upon them was submitted upon their verdict; nor do we believe that the North is prepared to take a course which is guided by fanaticism and controlled by madness.

A FAMILY POISONED BY HERBS.—A family of four persons in Darke county, O., were recently poisoned by taking what was recommended to them as a remedy for the ague. It seems that a root of some sort was named to the family as having the power to cure the ague. A woman went to the woods and dug what she supposed to be the root specified, which was put into whisky, and after remaining in it for a while, each of the persons affected took of the decoction the dose prescribed, and all died in an hour afterwards. It is supposed that the woman made a mistake and dug some poisonous root instead of that recommended.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, October 15, 1860.

The movement in our general market has exhibited but little activity during the past week, and to Cotton operations have been checked by limited supplies of the descriptions most in request, the ultra views of holders, and by considerable stringency in the money market and difficulty in negotiating exchanges. In Tobacco very little has been done, and in Sugar and Molasses the transactions continue of a limited character, the receipts of the new crop being confined to a few parcels which have found ready sale at full prices. Western Produce of nearly all descriptions has been dull with a drooping tendency in the rates for Flour, Grain, and most kinds of Provisions. In Freights we notice a slight decline.

COTTON. In the early part of the week we noticed an improvement of ¼ to ⅜c. in the rates for the Middling and better grades, and holders since then have shown but little disposition to make concessions, though toward the close there has been more willingness to sell.

New Orleans Classification.

NAVAL STORES.—There has been a rather better demand for Spirits Turpentine, with sales of 400 to 500 barrels during the past three days, at 38 to 38c, and 40c. Rosin has been dull with sales of some 2000 bbls on private terms. We quote common to good No. 2 at 90c to $1 00, and No. 1 at $1 40 to $1 50 per barrel.

ST. JAMES' HOTEL, MAGAZINE-ST., between GRAVIER & NATCHEZ, NEW ORLEANS. This new and elegant establishment will be opened for the reception of guests, on MONDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1860.

It is one of the largest and most elegant Hotels in the South; all modern improvements have been introduced. The entire house, including the chambers, is lighted with gas; the rooms are finely ventilated; the bathing arrangements are very superior, and indeed, everything has been done which could in the least contribute to the comfort of travelers. The furniture and bedding, which is of the most costly and superior kind, was manufactured expressly for the house, under the supervision of Mr. R. S. Morse.

The location is one of the most desirable and pleasant in New Orleans, being in the centre of business. The city railroad, now being constructed, passes directly in front of the house, and in addition it is within two blocks of the great central omnibus station on Canal street.

The proprietors, who will also continue to conduct the City hotel, "on long and favorably known," thankful for the patronage which has been so liberally extended to them, take great pleasure in assuring their old friends and the public generally, that no exertion will be spared to make them comfortable during their sojourn at either house.

PHYSIC: A FORTUNE.

I occupy a large house at the corner of Clifton Street and Derby Place, one of the new and fashionable thoroughfares recently sprung up in this populous manufacturing town of Rexford. Before my front windows—on either side of an elegant stone porch—three roads come to a point, and a triangular grass-plot surrounded by iron railings, does its best to maintain the peace by its unbiassed equanimity. Each of these roads leads to long interminable rows of respectable houses. The inhabitants of these domiciles every morning and afternoon must pass and repass my door on their way to the great heart of the city. Thus, hundreds go by daily. Why, then, after five years' residence at Whistledown House, why, then, I say—in the name of all that is good—do I sit waiting from day to day, and from year to year, for the patients that never come?

You may say, Perhaps I am not steady, attentive, agreeable, well up in my profession, and a host of other things. Let me hasten to inform you that none of these objections are good against me.

I hold a London diploma of M. R. C. S., and am a graduate of a university. I could at this moment, with the cobwebs of years upon my memory, give you the nine pairs of cranial nerves in their order from before, backward, with their four groups and their divisions, sub divisions, and ramifications.

Last summer I took off Mrs. Crotts' left breast for cancer, and she still lives, one of my staunch supporters. Mr. Battersby had sustained a bad compound comminuted fracture of the leg. He protests that he was saved from death by my instrumentality. Miss Merchison, in a case of tubercular bone, was reluctated (she would tell you) by the blessing of God through my skill and ability.

But Mrs. Crofts won't always be having operations for my benefit; Mr. Battersby can't be expected to be run over continually; Miss Merchison has had enough of it; and I ask, with these successful cases all staring people in the face, why do I sit waiting with aching heart for the patients that never come?

Right opposite to me, at the end of the Steam-son Road, lives my friend Barlington. He is one of the chief surgeons to the Rexford Infirmary. He has a stirring and an active practice, and drives pleasantly in his close carriage and pair of prancing bays. He sits forward as he drives, and reads diligently, holding his book so that passers by may see it. People say: "Barlington must make the most of his time. Every spare minute he devotes to study. He's a remarkable man, that Barlington!" Sometimes, when his eye is wandering through the window, he bows very low to me as I drive past in my cab. For I am supposed to hold in my power occasional consultations, and Barlington has always his eyes to the main chance. He is a little, shrewd man, with an excitable manner, and a disposition to gossip. I have heard that he sometimes becomes so interested in discussing the prevalent topics of the day, that he has left his patients without entering upon the subject of their ailments. I dare say he would do a good action as willingly as any other man; but he has a patronizing air. When I "meet him," he "hums" and "habs," puts his hands in his pockets, and looks at his gold repeater. He has no children—no relations to stretch out craving hands towards him; but he loves his money, and likes to hear the chink of it as he paces up and down the sick room. His friends say: "An extraordinary man, Barlington! Lets no grass grow under his feet! He drove down to Fetterkin yesterday morning, to be present at an operation; came back at eleven A. M., sees his patients; off again by the train to Limpfoid, catches the return at five, and pockets his fifty guineas for the day;—a fact—I had it from himself."

And Mr. Barlington is just the man to tell it with infinite gusto. It is not long since Mr. Barlington was talking to my pretty little cousin, Mrs. Moreton. She was wondering how I, Dr. Plympton, was getting on.

"Oh!" says Barlington, "I should say Plympton has a fairish practice—a fairish practice. Jeremiah Peters, Esq., is a patient of his. He's of the right sort. Plympton's doing pretty well."

And he strokes his chin, and blows the dust off his velvet cuffs. And then he said that he did not see why I should not have a first-rate practice in Rexford. And my pretty cousin (to whom Barlington is apt to be very communicative) told it me with great glee, for she is a kind little soul; but it did not do me much good. For a few minutes I cheered up, and felt better; but variations of mind don't provide payment of bills, or clothe my seven children.

One morning, standing at my drawing-room window, which looks up Clifton Street, I watched Barlington making his calls. He comes out of one house, pocketing his fee—drives on to the next, enters, and returns, repenting the possible operation—next door but one just saves paper in his finger and thumb,—all the while his good humored and unconscious of offence as need be, while I looked on and felt disposed to be bilious.

There is Scorlings. He is a rough, rude, half-educated man, with plenty of vulgar impudence and random braggadocio. Scorlings is not well up in his profession. He has lately set up a close carriage; so it must pay with him. How does he do it? He lives round the corner. The situation of his house is not to compare with mine; but he can drive his carriage, and I go plodding along to my shabby second-hand cabriolet, that does not pay its expenses.

Two years ago; I was attending a woman suffering from ovarian dropsy. She was fifty years of age, and much enfeebled with her complaint. My remedies were successful as far as remedies can be in such cases. She greatly improved, and I had hopes that she might live a considerable time, with rigid adherence to the rules I had laid down for her. Her friend Mrs. Cole, lived next door. Scorlings is a great gun with Mrs. Cole. My patient was worried continually about Scorlings; and one day he pays Mrs. Morris a friendly call. During this accidental visit he sympathizes and assures her he can effect a cure. It ends with his telling Mrs. Morris, that in three months she will be herself again, that her complaint is nothing more than that ineidental to married ladies. I receive a note, very civil and polite, informing me that it is not necessary that I should call again. But of course I did call and found Scorlings and Mrs. Morris in the very heart of a consultation.

Poor woman! she died in three weeks. On her demise bed she sent for me, feeling the great mistake she had made; but it was too late. I arrived only to see her lying still and calm enough, the victim of gross ignorance. Scorlings is a loud-talking, blustering man. When he goes into a house, he makes coarse jokes with the women, and is hale fellow, well met, with the men. I am a man of few words, and it doesn't pay, in my opinion.

Scorlings slaps the master on the back, pats the wife's cheek, chucks the daughter under the chin, tosses up the baby. I do none of these things, and Rexford does not understand me.

Scorlings sends out dozens of mixtures, draughts, and pills,—blisters, ointments, and lotions. I approve of these things, but only as aids; Scorlings deals in nothing else. He has no faith in diet, or in any thing. He believes in physic; nothing but physic will do with him. Scorlings and I don't speak; since Mrs. Morris died, I have ignored him. He sent me an insolent letter, ill composed and ill-spelt; to which I replied, by informing him that I declined any discussion whatever with men of his grade; and he has been my relentless enemy ever since.

But if I must fail, let it be the failure of honesty; and let me do it honorably, if that is all I can do.

When I was a student in London, old Wrigley used to tell me,

"Plympton, you must humbug! There's nothing to be done without it. By George, Plympton! but if you mean to take, you must use plenty of humbug!"

I used to wonder at an old man, such as he, talking in that way, and answer,

"Indeed, sir, but I never will. If they won't take me for the real metal, they never shall for the dross."

And he would shake his head, and laugh over his short pipe at nights, when he had come in, and had done for the day, as though it was fine talking, and he knew better.

And so twelve years have I plodded along this large manufacturing town of Rexford, living from hand to mouth, how I scarcely know; and find myself just the same as when I first started; only so much older, so much more careworn, so much less able to battle with the difficulties that close in around me.

I used to live in Greg Street. For seven years we endured that wretched habitation. Whenever the wind was in the east the smoke persisted in stopping in-doors. Whenever it rained, the stench that came up from the cellars was something fearful. But the light seemed afraid of us. When a ray of sunshine did find its way in, it looked as though it had been mistaken, and did not feel itself at home. My wife and I used feebly to assert to one another, that "it wasn't really so bad." Then my wife's uncle left Sophia a legacy; and we removed by the advice of my wall to-do friend Jeremiah Peters, Esq., to Wimpledown House, a most eligible situation for a medical man.

"Who would think," said Jeremiah Peters, "of opening a first-rate jeweller'shop in a back street?" meaning, of course, that a good situation was of much importance.

I had my surgery-door made to open upon Clifton Street, the house fronting, as I said before, in Derby Place. I have a convenient waiting-room, down the surgery-passage, where patients were to sit until the ordinary consulting-room should be at liberty: for, as I said to Sophia, "People did not like to wait in draughty passages." This waiting-room will hold nine persons; and there are nine chairs placed. But the only dust that is ever removed from them comes off with the daily duster.

I have never known more than one person sit in that room at one time. And the schoolboy's hope that years ago dedicated such preparation, every time I enter that apartment laughs me to scorn.

For a time after we came to Wimpledown House, I thought we should have done better. But the few patients that came seemed to think, that if they paid me for my medicine and advice they must enter into all their family affairs. Of course, I was willing enough to purchase their goodwill by a little sympathy; but after a time they fell short, and so I sat waiting for the patients that never came!

Three months ago, Samuel Barnet, Esq., sent for me. I found him sitting upon his bed, with two chairs, the two front legs being placed parallel with the ground; and the backs uppermost. Tapes were fastened from the shoulders of the chairs, and drawn inside the bed-post and Barnet was driving for his life. I had heard of his abandonment to drink, and I said within myself, When he is sufficiently recovered from the delirium cum tremore, I will reason with him, ere he is irretrievably lost. At the end of a fortnight Barnet was himself again.

One morning he began to question me as to the nature of his recent malady. I did not feel that the time was fully arrived, and I would have postponed it. But an answer he would have. If I wished myself into a fury of enthusiasm, it would have passed for good fellowship, and I should have lost nothing by my candor. Many men would have exaggerated his case, and have made excuses which they knew were not tenable. I considered, if I spoke the truth candidly and mildly, reproaches were for his conscience; excuses came not near the subject. For Barnet was rich and healthy, with a well-conducted family, whose only grief consisted in his deplorable self-indulgence.

So I gave him the simple truth, without any circumlocution whatever. And what did he say?

"If I am to hear," said Barnet, "why not let me have it, in a good bluff, jerry-go-round sort of manner, and have done with it? but in that sleek milk-and-water way, like a cat treading on paper,—why, hang it!"

And so, when Barnet and I met in Eye Lane a week after, he would not look at me.

There is a sort of fashion in bluntness. If you come out with a slang word or two to such men as Barnet, rant and tear, and call heaven and earth to witness a plain fact, it goes for something. To be quiet, composed, and gentlemanlike, is to be nothing; it is to be namby-pamby.

"Why, man, you swill like a porpoise, and are as blunted as one!" is the blunt style of expression. "Why, good sir, you drink much more than is good for you!" is the other. Each school has its disciples; and although the two come to much the same conclusion, the ethics that lead to the one are of a coarser study than those that lead to the other.

Being much at home, and Mrs. Plympton having the house cleaned down at the time, I was left more to myself than is usually the case. To employ myself, I made some improvements upon an inclined plane for fractures, and Jeremiah Peters, Esq., just happening to pay his account, I devoted £10 to registering my idea. I was full of hope of it; it had many points to recommend it to the use of the profession. I began to find myself whistling when I sat alone in my study, comparatively light-hearted. I found myself speculating as to how Tomlinson would regard me when I paid him the whole of his bill. I wondered how it would feel if I were to pay off everybody, and owe nothing. I used to look knowingly up at Sophia when she came to see what I was about, and say mysteriously, "There, was no knowing what Plympton's improvement might not do for us, after all."

But the six months went by. The "taxes" had not been paid; the "gas" must be attended to; Mrs. Dubbins had sent three times for the amount of her bill; and my improved pinne, as Barnet would say, "walked into the middle of next week." Barlington, whom I had consulted, didn't think much of it. "It might do," or it might not. He wouldn't like to lend money upon it." That was just a figure of speech, nothing more.

But the week after my probationary time was out, and my chance of protecting my invention had gone by, what does Barlington do? He goes to Gibbs, of the Patent Office, registers a slight alteration upon my design, and calls it "Barlington's Improved!" Then he orders a pannikin to be made forthwith, and supplies them at a large profit to the Rexford Infirmary.

Yet Barlington drives his carriage, and is making his thousands a year; and I am waiting for the patients that never come!

I tried my hand at authorship. I gave to the world, "Plympton on the Action of the Coraco-brachialis," "Speculations on the Sphenu maxillary (Ganglion," and "Plympton on the Pineal Gland." My publishers, Tiffin and Snudbury, foretold me golden opinions, and the gratitude of a discerning public. The "Coraco-brachialis" cost me thirty pounds, and brought me in seven at the end of nine months. The "Speculations" I sold to Tiffin and Snudbury for £15; and to this day it holds a certain position in medical literature.

Jeremiah Peters met me in the city last Wednesday. Barlington once said:

"It was a good thing to be seen talking to Peters; it was as though you had a heavy balance at your bankers."

Well, Jeremiah drew out his pocket-book, and said to me,

"Dr. Plympton, can't you give me a guinea for the widow Jones?"

I shook my head. "Gold doesn't come so easily into my pockets," I said, smiling; and I could not help but think, "Does he recollect that I have seven children? If he does not, I do."

When I went home I observed to Mrs. Plympton," How would Mr. Peters have opened his eyes if I had said quietly to him, as he looked at me, 'Mr. Peters, I am not making a living!'"

Sophia laughed, and said, "It would have been a good joke,—it would, indeed." And as she fidgeted about, and smoothed her hair with an assumed air of indifference, I smile upon me was, went across her face, in spite of a

And how is it I would ask, that white so many [illegible] to myself, both in education and abilities, get on, I am left behind? I am not disagreeable; if I were, would Mrs. Jameson show me her new bonnets? would Miss Thompson try on her cloak for me to see? Would Smith ask my advice before entering into the shipping business? or George Purples, Esq., request me to give my opinion upon his son George's aptitude for the army? No, I am not disagreeable; that is not to be maintained.

No one would doubt that I was attentive, did they see me, day after day, when I return from the few calls I have to make, sitting down, book in hand, or teaching my children—always employed in some way on the spot, lest I should lose a chance patient.

Sophia sometimes laughingly tells me that I am before my time. It is agreeable to solace one's self in that way; but I am inclined to ask, am I not behind my time?

Everybody is jostling every body; there's no time to see who's down. The hour is striking by Rexford Cathedral; don't you hear its clang through the rattle of carts and waggons, and the pulling of steam over the bridge yonder? There's no time to be lost—the train will start! Time waits for no man—there are three minutes to get up the steps, take your ticket, get into the carriage, and be off! There's the bell! It's off, it's off! There's nothing left but a long line of floating white steam, that curls over and under, over and under, and vanishes before the wind. Your coach may have knocked down the green grocer's boy, but why doesn't he get out of the way? These are not the days to be putting your hands in your pockets and staring about. You must be up and away—here, there, everywhere—or you'd better give up the race at once. But if we are all to be so bustling, all so fleet of foot, all so strong of wind, who's to win? I want to run without knocking my neighbors before me, sending them flying into space. I want to live but I don't want to prevent others living too.

But it isn't the spirit of the time. If I do not boast and bluster, I'm nothing. And therefore it is that I sit at home looking at the hundreds that pass and repass, but nobody turns in. They cross the road to Barlington, or they go round the corner to Scorlings, and I sit waiting for the patients that never come.

I go up stairs to my drawing-room, and look up Clifton street. People are coming down quite fast. There's Sims. I know his wife's expectant. is he—is he coming—I think—no, he's turned the corner.

Yesterday I went into the nursery, and found my eldest daughter, Lydia, sitting alone, with her gazelle-like eyes suffused with tears. In reply to my question as to what was wrong with her, she only sadled like her mother, and said, "She had been moping." I knew what it meant. I stirred the fire, by way of showing that I was cheerful, and not afraid of my coal bills. I hummed the latest box-organ tune, and Lydia brightened up amazingly. No one would have guessed how choked my voice was, and how I had to push it forcibly out against its will. When Lydia went away I gave over humming, and I said in the bitterness of my heart, "For God's sake, will the patients never come?"

Then I took a doleful journey through the rooms. I felt that I was becoming stupid. A sort of counter irritation might have its effect; so I go into the waiting room that I may survey the nine chairs that are never sat upon. There I find my oldest boy of twelve comfortably settled by the window, reading by stealth my medical books, although I have decidedly set my face against his following in my footsteps. I could have taken the books from his hand and hurled them, but Philip is no ordinary lad. There is the light of genius in his thoughtful face, and I could only say, "Philip, God bless you!"

I am now forty-five. There are grey hairs plentifully bestrewn among my locks. There are wrinkles at the corners of my eyes, wrinkles on my forehead, wrinkles on my heart. I have been engaged in the practice of physic now in this large and populous manufacturing town of Rexford for twelve years, and it has never paid yet.—Were it not for my wife's legacy, we must have given up long since.

"Andrew Plimpton!" said Sophia to me impressively last evening, "let us leave Wimpledown House. The tax-bills are coming again, and there is nothing to pay them with. Barlington gets all the practice, and Scorlings—they live and we gravel. Let us go away,—let's go away, anywhere,—dear!"

But I clasped my hands over my face. I said, "For heaven's sake, Sophia, don't you give way, don't you despair! It you do, then we are lost indeed!"

And we sat and looked at one another. The fire flickered, the shadows deepened, the gas-lamps from the street cast their reflections upon the walls of the room, and we sat brooding, with the load of despair upon our hearts.

So I examined his throat, and sounded his chest. There was nothing wrong with it. I could see no sign of the slightest ailment. He looked particularly rosy and well for a man of seventy-two. I said to myself, "Can he be making a fool of me?" Then the temptation came strong upon me, "Sophia has not a sixpence in her pocket—Lydia wants shoes. If I do not write him a prescription, Peters will think it was no use his coming. He'll never pay me if I don't. He wants no physic, but it will do him no harm—and me a great deal of good. Shall I give him a fluctus, oxymel of squills, syrup of poppies and a little nitre? It's innocent enough—shall I?"

"Hum! ahem! that is to say, Mr. Peters, In the Devil's name, my good sir, you want no physic? If you stay a minute longer I shall be driven to it, in spite of myself!"

"Dr. Plympton, are you mad?"

"Ah, if I only were," I said. "But I can't do it if I starve. I can't belie my conscience. You are in good health, sir, and want none of my stock-in-trade, and that's the whole of the matter!"

"Plympton," says Mr. Peters, "you're a gentleman, sir, and I honor you." And he went away.

And so, just as I had written this far, determined to make a confidante of the public, as a desperate act of throwing the neglect I suffer in its face, Lydia brings in a note, and lays it with pabid cheek before me. "It is about the taxes, child. There's no use in looking so dull, Lydia." And as I raised my eyes from my work, I perceived that it was the handwriting of Jeremiah Peters, Esq.

With trembling hands I opened it. It lies beside me now. It is a Bank of England note for £100. "A token of respect from Jeremiah Peters, for the character of a man who, in the middle of the nineteenth century, has a conscience!"

And who knows but that the patients may come after all.

THE RIVER TIME.

[The following, which we find floating like a wind-driven waif upon the great sea of American newspapers, without name or index of ownership, is certainly one of the most beautiful things we have ever seen. It is indeed almost matchless in its beauty. Who can be the author of it? Does anybody know?]

Oh! a wonderful stream is the river Time,
As it runs through the realm of tears,
With a luckless rythm and a musical rhyme,
And a broad'ning sweep, and a surge sublime,
That blends with the ocean of years.

How the winters are drifting like flakes of snow,
And the summers like buds between,
And the year in the sheaf—so they come and they go
On the river's breast, with its ebb and flow,
As it glides through its shadow and sheen.

There's a magical isle on the river of Time,
Where the softest of airs are playing;
There's a cloudless sky and a tropical clime,
And a song as sweet as a vesper chime,
And the dances with the roses are staying.

And the name of this isle is the Long Ago,
And we bury our treasures there;
There are bowers of beauty and bosoms of snow—
There are heaps of dust, but we loved them so!
There are trinkets and tresses of hair.

There are fragments of songs that nobody sings,
And a part of an infant's prayer;
There's a lute unswept, and a harp without strings,
There are broken vows, and pieces of rings,
And the garments that she used to wear.

There are hands that are waved when the fairy shore
By the mirage is lifted in air;
And we sometimes hear through the turbulent roar,
Sweet voices we heard in the days gone before,
When the wind down the river is fair.

Oh! remembered for aye be the blessed Isle,
All the long days of our life till night—
When the evening comes with its beautiful smile,
And our eyes are closing to slumber awhile,
May our "greenwood" of soul be in sight.

SKETCH OF THE LIFE AND DEATH OF A PIOUS AND FAITHFUL SERVANT.

She was taken into the house at the age of eleven as a nurse for her young mistress, who was about a year old. From that time until her death she was under religious influence, though she did not become hopeful until years had passed on. Before she had fully matured, her health became delicate, and continued so until consumption set in upon her. At times she would suddenly become so ill, that to human view she was within a few steps of the grave; still she lived until she had entered her thirty-third year. Her sun through life has been to please her master and mistress, and never more happy than when she felt she had their approbation. She was often left with the entire care of the house, together with every article of value, and the keys given to her, until my return, which was frequently after an absence of several weeks. So confident was I of her honesty and entireness, that while absent I had no care or uneasiness; I felt all was safe. I had, from time to time, during her life, urged upon her the necessity of devoting herself to the service of her God; and for that purpose gave her very much religious instruction. She took great delight in hearing the Bible or tracts read; more particularly, "The African Servant," "Cottager's Daughter," and others of like character. From her remarks, from time to time, in reference to those tracts, in common with her feelings, I'll often feel encouraged; but too soon again all would pass off like the morning cloud and early dew. About two years preceding her death, according to her own account, she, who had hitherto ever met her with[illegible] adversary yet," whenever she had thought of setting her face Zionward. She at that period solemnly and resolutely determined to seek the salvation of her soul; and through grace she was successful in her efforts to gain the victory over Satan, the world, and her own heart. From that time she followed hard after God, pressing mightily into the kingdom of Christ.

During the protracted meeting at Summit last fall she attended, though laboring under great bodily weakness; and during the very last prayer that was uttered, and after the minister had said, "let us all pray," there did then she found the Saviour precious to her soul; and although bowed down by mental as well as bodily pain and weakness, yet her strength and joy were so great as to cause her to feel as light as air. She wondered what had become of the burden that had been pressing her down to earth. Her great astonishment at this time was, why she had not found Him whom her soul loved before she had wasted her past years in folly. This appeared to grieve her, often saying, "what was I thinking about all this time?" In drawing her attention to the freeness of the gift of Christ, she said, "yes, to me, a poor negro."—She spoke of having a great many sacred truths brought to her mind; this caused her much surprise, as she had forgotten them, and inquired how it was that they were brought to her mind. I told her it was the Holy Spirit taking those things and showing them to her, to enlightening her mind. The plan of salvation appeared wonderful to her; she saw it in all its freeness, and spoke often of the condescension of Christ. Her cheeks were seldom dry. It appeared to me as though she could never cease weeping over her sins.

It was my habit to go to her cabin every morning regularly, with my Bible in hand, for a number of weeks previous to her death, to read and explain those sacred truths for her. Scarcely a day passed, but as soon as I entered her cabin, and glanced my eye upon her face, I would notice she had been weeping, the tears having dried upon her cheeks leaving evident signs of the fact. To satisfy myself of the cause of her sorrow, I would say to her, "Nancy, what have you been thinking about?" Her reply invariably was, "pleading, pleading." On one occasion, after making the same inquiry, she said, "I am so weak, and the cough troubles me so much, I cannot leave my chair to kneel down, nor can I say many words; but I constantly say with the African servant, 'Lord, remember me! Lord, remember me!' I feel here (placing her hand upon her breast) all is safe, all is well, through Christ. What would I now do if I did not have this hope? O, what a comfort!"

She loved to think of redeeming love, saying, "my nights are short, I have so much to think of. Oh, the welcome I shall have when I get there!"

During the last week of her life she appeared anxious to leave her clay tenement, and soar to worlds on high. Often did she inquire how long I thought it would be ere her spirit took its flight; on being told I could not say exactly, but thought it would not be long, she said: "Oh, won't I be happy!" Turning to her young mistress, who was weeping, she said, "don't fret for me after I am gone, you must be glad—I shall be at rest."

Soon after this, she was death-struck. She commenced singing the hymn, first line commencing with,

"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand."

She sang fully half an hour various hymns suitable to her condition, and although previous to this time she could only speak in a whisper, the effort was so great as to cause her to make a distinct sound. She said, in view of her escape from the bondage of sin, she could never feel sufficiently grateful to me for leading her to Christ. "In a number of the family she sent word to tell him he must pray, that he would find it such a comfort to him when stand ng where she now stood. Her sufferings were surpassingly great; and when on the verge of departure and in great agony, I said to her, "Nancy, you are now crossing the Jordan, the billows swell, the waves run high, but your Savior is on the other side, waiting to conduct your spirit to the mansions of glory." She raised her eyes and hands to heaven, assuring me that it was even so.

So died our much loved and faithful servant Nancy, in full hope of a glorious immortality.—Let God have all the praise.

I will here mention another thought of Nancy's, which I have omitted in the former part of this sketch. On speaking of the joys of heaven, and the happiness of those who had been washed in the blood of the Lamb, she said she desired to ask me one thing. I bid her ask. She then inquired if her soul would be white after death. I told her, most assuredly it would; that mistress and servant would, if regenerated, be as the children of God.—She said that her reason for wishing to know this was, that she desired to be with my children, alluding to three which I humbly trust are now in glory, having lived exemplary lives and died triumphant deaths.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

O. C. TAYLOR died in Goodman, Miss., Sept. 8th, aged 36 years, four months, and 11 days. He leaves a wife, three children, numerous relatives and friends to mourn his death. Ardent in his affections, impulsive in his feelings, generous to a fault, he won the friendship of all who knew him. But he has passed to that "bourne from whence no traveler returns."—Peace to his ashes.

THE SLOW YOUNG MAN.

BY LUTHA TONTELLE.

Charlie Trueheart had passed his minority, but like Talleyrand as well he admitted at once, that compared with the American standard, he was still a boy. True he had carried off the highest honors at college, but then he had led rather a quiet life there, varying the student's monotonous routine only by minding occasionally in the choice society of the town, or by, during a term or two, being expelled from one or two colleges; he had remained, like many countryyouth, to graduate at his own Alma Mater, and could neither boast of wonderful exploits, like Ned Gallopy, the drag lead at three colleges in turn, or of the skilful tactics of Saville James, who reaped the fruits of all his plotting, unmuttered by penalties.

But he had not been content to tread his valley path alone. Frank Felton, his classmate, had been occasionally disturbed by the soothing tone of the college lions, and had especially dubbed the appellative, slow, which they sometimes bestowed as the crowning of a gradation. But Charlie had quietly stood a siege of ridicule by the ingenuity of his tormentors, and remained by their mockery-nature—like a rock against which the winds vainly expend their force, and where the waves breaking themselves on its sides daring, expose their feebleness. And Frank, as a really strong and noble spirit, stood loyally by his friend; and others weaker by nature, sought and did borrowed strength from them. More than one wild soul mother blessed God daily for the pure influences that had preserved her son from a ruinous career of dissipation; and proud fathers grasped his hand in commendation, and spoke strong words of grateful interest and warm encouragement.

Even the dashing Collegians, quailed before the mood of courage that enabled him necessary to pursue the even tenor of his way, and honored the brave spirit that was ever ready to place itself between the oppressor and his intended victim. Sometimes, they even doubted for a moment their own superiority, and the practical wisdom of their self-indulgent philosophy. But they could not pause to contemplate him, save transl that recalled a past generation. For they must belong to a progressive age. They must keep pace with its light, rapidly advancing step. And of which they marked with pitying wonder his strange insensibility to the wild charms of their gay life, to the new pleasures that pursued each other in swift succession, but could not be renewed.

Grandpa, an eminent lawyer, an experienced statesman, of world wide fame, regarded his sister-course with a satisfied eye; but was he not one of the old giants that believed in "footprints in the sands of time?" Their slow-footed pace might scarcely a trace as it rushed onward, ever onward into the mysterious to be.

That year Charlie made a tour of the United States, visiting every object of interest to an American—from the home of the Hero to the bar Capitol that bears his name; from the rough Rock first touched by the feet of the Pilgrim Fathers, and the sunny State, where the Huguenots found a safe and genial retreat to the monuments of freedom and piety reared everywhere by their descendants.

Nor did he neglect to study well those palaces of city and of plain, in the one that look down with entering coolness from the mountain ranges, that overshadow the fountains of learning, and that rise from the shores of the ocean.—Palaces filled by the Sovereigns of each State, the Royal homes of the nation. After the tour of the Lakes and a fourth excursion among the Rocky Mountains, he enjoyed the refined society that graced their ample halls, but it did not convert him into a walking fashion-plate, or a universal lover. The attentions that he received from great and good men he imputed to esteem for his parents, forgetful of the aid he had rendered their sons, and of the lives he had risked his own to save, when the crowded steamer was burned to the water's edge. Ladies smiled at his approach, but he was cast vain. The high type of womanly grace and excellence with which he had been familiar at home, while it enabled him to discern and appreciate the virtues and attractions of other ladies, prevented him from being misled by mere accomplishments, or from imagining himself in love with

He returned home with the simple habits and stainless integrity of his boyhood, unchanged save in his manly figure, as if the deepening fire of his thoughtful eye, from which the same warm generous heart looked into ours. The summer found him at his parents, whose wishes he still delighted to obey. His sisters added price to their trusting love, and he became neither impatient of their endearments nor regardless of their increasing claim to his attentions.

He was a slow young man; he appeared to enjoy that fresh spring-time of life whose period may be delayed by the natural living heart, but which returns never again till the shores of the new Eden are gained. Yet Ned Gallopy, and Tristan Bright knew little of life's spring. They had never been boys, for boys are an institution. The world ignores them. They were not older in years than Charlie Trueheart, but their vices and dissipation tend to their faces prematurely old, and gray hairs, that awoke no veneration, began to show themselves. Charles was strangely unlike his fellow students, unlike most of his contemporaries, but he was our pride, our joy.

DAMASCUS.

Damascus is the largest, most populous, and most splendid city in Turkish Asia. Founded, according to tradition, by a great grandson of Noah, and in all probability justly claiming an origin as ancient, its name is derived from the old Hebrew "Dammesek." It was a city of note in the time of Abraham, and from that day to this it has been great and flourishing. Its rulers have been of many races, and the forms of government very varied. Sometimes it has been the royal city of king or caliph, and sometimes it has sunk to the position of a provincial capital. After its capture by Tiglath Pileser, the Assyrian, it was possessed by Pharaoh Necho; then by Nebuchadnezzar; and then fell under Persian sway. After this the Greek, Roman, and Byzantine, the Arab and the Turk, held it by turns for centuries; but under all these successive changes of dynasty, and whether ruled by a native prince, or an allied conqueror, it has never fallen from its high rank, or ceased to be prosperous, populous and wealthy.

So much for the Damascus of the past. But the great source of her beauty and her pride in all ages still remains to her; and a splendid heritage are those luxuriant gardens which still enfold her, and those clear, cold, dashing streams that bless them with fertility. These gardens are not tree-like, with kept inclosures, of limited extent, to which we give that name, but are forests of fruit trees, apricot and almond, walnut, olive, fig and pomegranate, tomcats whose shade, vegetable and cereal crops are cultivated, or roses, jasmine, and other flowers, run wild in tangled thickets, whilst here and there the palm, poplar, or cypress, tower skywards, and break the monotonous outline of the less ambitious woods. The queen, however, of these forest gardens, is the apricot, and forests throughout the Eastern World is the "mistress" of Damascus, and great riches it brings her. Its fruit is dainty, small, and white, except when a loud sunbeam has been through the leafy lattice, and left a burning crimson blush upon each cheek his fervid kiss has touched.

There are but few striking relics of antiquity in Damascus. A very handsome triumphal arch and some great columns in the precincts of the great mosque, and a portal, and part of its wall, are probably of Roman date, not older. The most splendid edifice by far, that the city can now boast, is this great mosque of the Omniade. It occupies the site of the Cathedral of St. John, which again was preceded by a magnificent temple on the same ground; so that it is most likely that from the earliest ages the city's deities or the inhabitants stood on this spot, and that Jupiter rejected Rimmon, and was himself unplaced by St. John the Baptist. Then when the Arabian victories had the cathedral was given up to them, and but still guaranteed by treaty to the Christians, but ere many years elapsed the whole building was taken from by the Caliph Walid, who lavished immense sums on its adornment. The arches were wrenched with gold vines, the niches inlaid with jewels, and from the roof hundreds of golden lamps were suspended by golden chains. The gold and gems departed long ago, but the marble tesselated pavements, and the mosaic commands surrounding its vast courts, still remain. Of all its three-monuments was accidentally burnt during the Tartar conflagration, and afterwards rebuilt. Another, the "Minaret of Jesus," is 250 feet high. Closely this mosque is the tomb of the renowned Saladin. No Christian but dares to enter the mausoleum of the redoubted but most calculating he.

The bazaars of Damascus are of immense extent and very picturesque, and in them the shopping of a great part of Syria and half Mesopotamia is transacted.—Many a wild Druse and Bedouin, who never entered a city's gates to shop, scented plunder from afar, and rushed in to complete the works the rascals of the bazaars had so ruthlessly begun.

The sumptuous mansions of the rich present to the passer by nothing but high, whitewashed, windowless walls, but their numerous courts and lofty saloons are rich in marble and fountains, and arabesque and gilding, and fragrant with the blossoms of citron and orange trees, jasmine and flowering shrubs.

THE YOUNG ENGLISH PRINCE AT MOUNT VERNON.

We have met with no incidents, in the accounts given by the reporters of the movements of the Prince of Wales on this continent, to compare in interest with those of his recent visit to the grave of Washington. On the morning of the 9th inst. accompanied by the President of the United States, Miss Lane and Lord Lyons, he embarked on the cutter Harriet Lane, at Washington. About forty-five persons embarked, among whom were several members of the Cabinet and Mesdames Slidell, Erwin, and some other Ladies.

The voyage occupied only an hour and a half. Upon landing, the party inspected the entire grounds and gardens most attentively. The Prince and the royal party were deeply observant, asking many questions, and apparently much impressed with the feelings natural to the occasion. Mrs. Regis, Vice-Regent of the Mt. Vernon Association, acted as chaperone, and the only excluding all other visitors, although Friday was the regular visiting day, was rightly observed, the regular steamers postponing their trips till next day.

The day was all that could be desired—the finest that the Indian summer could give.

The description of the scene by the reporter of the Herald is interesting:

Having carefully inspected the house the Prince stood reverently uncovered in the room in which Washington died, looked at the piano which he presented to Mrs. Lewis, and examined the key of the Bastile and other curiosities there. The party expressed their gratification at the taste and neatness displayed in the arrangement of the place, and then proceeded to the tomb of Washington.

The Marine band had arrived before them, and, conducted by a neighboring thicket, began playing a dirge composed by the leader. The scene was most impressive. The party, with uncovered heads, ranged themselves in front of the tomb, so simple yet so grand in its associations, and looked in through the iron grated door at the sarcophagus which contains the remains of the Father of his Country. Then retiring a few paces, the Prince, the President and the royal party, grouped in front, silently contemplated the Tomb of Washington.

The occasion will become historical. A sad chord softened the sunlight, the sweet, solemn strains of the beautiful dirge floated around, bringing unconscious tears to eyes unused to weep. Without royal state royalty contemplated the last abode of one who, though once pronounced a rebel and a traitor by the very ancestors of the Prince, now ranks above all kings—the Father of a Country second to none.

Around were the representatives of that aristocracy, which once proclaimed every republican a traitor, now doing homage to the great representative republican. Next to the Prince stood the Presidents of the United States, reverently bowing before the resting place of the first of rulers. Beside him were those who in the last battles between England and this country, had taken a not unprominent part, while he knew if had once borne arms against the very country whose future ruler was now his honored guest. What lessons all must have learned from this visit—what thoughts must have occurred to each—how all must have felt that above all and over all, God reigns supreme, and ruleth for His own wise purposes, and working miracles, not as once by His instantaneous word, but by the slower process of time.

At the request of the Mount Vernon Association, the Prince planted, with but little formality, a young horse chestnut tree, to commemorate his visit to the place. The tree was planted upon a beautiful little mound, not far from the tomb.

Naples disputes with Constantinople the claim of occupying the most beautiful site in Europe. The city stands on the north shore of the bay of the same name, and is built at the base and on the slopes of a range of hills which have the general form of an amphitheater. Its chief edifices are a cathedral, built on one hundred granite columns, which belong'd to the Temple of Apollo; the churches of the holy apostles, built on the ruins of a temple of Mercury; San Paolo, Filippo Neri, Spirito Santo, and San Martino; the Royal palace—the whole palace used as a record office; the Palazzo degli Studii Publico, which contains the Bortonian Library, museum of antiquities, etc. Naples was the usual residence of the Sovereign, seat of an Archbishop, and of the central administration of the kingdom, and has a commercial tribunal, arsenal and cannon-foundry, shipbuilding yards, and a Royal marine hospital. Its university, occupying the old College of the Jesuits, has fifty-four professorships. It has an episcopal lyceum, medico-chirurgical school, veterinary school, deaf-mute institution, royal military school, schools of design and music, an observatory, a botanic garden, and a mint. It is the center of all the learned institutions of the kingdom, and has four public libraries, and many private schools; but education is of the lowest kind, and not generally diffused; an exchange, ten theaters, among which the opera, San Carlos, is one of the largest in Italy. The charitable establishments comprise hospitals for the sick, aged, and foundlings, but its streets are, notwithstanding, infested with mendicants of all ages and both sexes. The Mariteli, a long open beach, beyond the Castel dell Carmine, was form rly the abode of the Lazzaroni, a class which has lost its distinctive features, and the term is now applied to the fishermen. There are sixty charitable institutions, comprising hospitals for the sick, (sometimes with 2000 patients,) blind, aged, poor, and the orphan. Its manufactures are gloves, soap, perfumery, silks, artificial flowers, corals, earthenwares, hats, carriages, etc. It has royal type-foundries, and iron and glass works. It is the first port of the kingdom; its harbor is formed by a mole, which extends from the center of the city into the bay. Naples was founded by the Greeks, who called it Parthenope. Virgil studied here; the city, enlarged by Adrian and Constantine, was sacked by Belisarius in 536; peopled successively under the Normans, the emperors of Germany, and the kings of Spain. It has often suffered from earthquakes, and from eruptions of Vesuvius. The French took it in 1799, and again in 1806. Joseph Bonaparte was made king of Naples, but was replaced by Murat in 1808, and the latter was driven from it by the Austrians in 1814. Naples was a scene of an outrage in May, 1848, when it was plundered by the Lazzaroni, and 1500 lives were lost. Among the numerous objects of interest in the vicinity of Naples are Vesuvius, Pompeii, and Herculaneum, and the Isle of Capri, in its bay. Its population in 1857 was 419,850, excluding a garrison of about 20,000.

THE AMERICAN AUTUMN.

Irving, Cooper, Bryant, Simms, in short, nearly all our imaginative writers of mark, have pictured, in prose or verse, the glories of the American Autumn. Yet the theme is not exhausted. Spring has been over-ode'd, over sonnetted—in every way over-done. The changes have been rung on its buds, its birds, its blooms, its showers, until the muses are tired of the iteration, and Pegasus snorts disdainfully as they put him annually through his pastoral paces. But no they autumn—mas querading autumn!—with its blue skies and mossy sunshine; its water-crisping winds that brush the willow's foliage white side to the sun; its dark green sward; its second clover, sweeter than the first; its wooded hills all aflame with rainbow tints; its fair white moons that seem to scan the earth; its morning mists, dipping their white skirts in the gold o dawn—is it not beautiful.

Custom cannot "stale its infinite variety," poesy cannot over-sing it, nor graphic Art weary the eye with its portraitures.

And what atmosphere is like that of autumn? So pure, so bracing, so exhilarating—the laughing gas of nature! The "autumn" of England may be—indeed it is—a lugubrious season, but the American autumn is not brown; it is ablaze with prismatic colours—full of light and splendor, and joyance,—the Gala of the Year! Its stately flowers outflash the summer's roses, the hues of its sylvan garments put to shame the mouthful of spring. And then the orchard—dragonless Hesperides, studded and drop with rosy and golden fruit—and the leafy arcades purple with the clustered bubbles of the vine, and the broad gardens, with their vari-coloured esculents! Won't the American Wordsworth be pleased to revise his often quoted line? Should it not, according to the "fitness of things," read thus?

"The sumptuous autumn days are come, the gladdest of the year."

COUNT CAVOUR TO CARDINAL ANTONELLI.

The Piedmontese Minister's letter to the Cardinal, announcing the march of the Piedmontese army to make peace in the Marches and Umbria, by first making war, is thus worded:

"TURIN, Sept. 7.

"EMINENCE—The Government of His Majesty the King of Sardinia, confident, without doing regard, as the formation and existence of the bodies of foreign mercenary troops in the pay of the Pontifical Government. The organization of such corps, not consisting, as in all civilized governments, of citizens of the country, but of men of all languages, nations and religions, deeply offends the public conscience of Italy and Europe. The want of discipline inherent to such troops, the inconsiderate conduct of their chiefs, the irritating manners with which they pompously fill their proclamations, excite and maintain a lively dangerous ferment. The painful recollection of the massacre and pillage of Perugia is still alive among the inhabitants of the Marches and Umbria. This state of things, dangerous in itself became still more so after the facts which have taken place in Sicily and in the Kingdom of Naples. The presence of foreign troops, which insults the national feeling, and presents the manifestation of the wishes of the people, will infallibly cause the extension of the movement to the neighboring provinces. The intimate connection which exists between the inhabitants of the Marches and Umbria, and those of the provinces annexed to the States of the King, and reasons of order and security in his own territory, lay His Majesty's Government under the necessity of applying, as far as in its power, a prompt remedy to such evils. King Victor Emanuel's constant desire does not permit him to remain a passive spectator of the bloody oppression with which the arms of the foreign mercenaries would extinguish every manifestation of national feeling in Italy blood. No government has the right of abandoning to the will and pleasure of a horde of soldiers of fortune, the property, the honor and the lives of the inhabitants of a civil community.

"For these reasons, after having applied to His Majesty the King, my august Sovereign, for his orders, I have the honor of signifying to your Eminence, that the King's troops are charged to enter into the states of the Church, in the name of the rights of humanity, the Pontifical mercenary corps from repressing by violence the expression of the sentiments of the people of the Marches and Umbria. I have, moreover, the honor to invite your Excellency, for the reasons above explained, to give immediate orders for the disbanding and disarming of these corps, the existence of which is a menace to the peace of Italy.

"Trusting that your Eminence will immediately communicate to me the measures taken by the Government of his Holiness in the matter, I have the honor of renewing to your Eminence, the expression of my high consideration.

CAVOUR.

NARROW ESCAPE OF THE AMERICAN VICE-CONSUL AT DAMASCUS.

Among the narratives I have collected, I select one which will throw light upon the conduct of a Turkish police officer recently executed. On the morning of the insurrection, Monday, July 9th, the city of Damascus was perfectly quiet, and the Emir Abdel Kader set out for a neighboring village, Essalhieh, where he has some property. At about half past two in the afternoon the rising took place, in consequence of the authorities having arrested the individuals who had grossly insulted Christians. At that time Dr. Michael Meshaker, American Vice-Consul, was in his house alone, having sent his cavass and servants to the Serai on business.—Shortly after the cavass arrived, just as the rebels were approaching the house and Hum. the Doctor sent, not being able to go out alone, to Abdel-Kader, to beg of him to send some of his Algerine followers to protect him. When the cavass got there he found the Emir had only just returned, to find no more than six of his followers at home, of whom he immediately selected four, who, however, were unable to make their way to Dr. Meshaker's residence, his cavass alone having the courage to go thither. On his arrival the doors were instantly closed, when some armed Damascus Moslems came up and began to break open the doors with axes. Scarcely knowing what to do, the Doctor put a little money in his pocket just as the door was broken open.—A number of men, chiefly Bashi Bazouks, rushed into the court-yard, and fired several shots, while the Doctor managed to escape with his two young children and cavass by another private door. The rebels began forthwith to plunder the house. The Doctor thought to conceal himself in the house of some of his neighbors, but not one of them would receive him, and he set out for the abode of the Emir. On his way thither he was met by a party of rebels, who fired upon him, and to whom he threw handfuls of money to divert their attention from his person, while he turned aside into the street leading to Bab Tuma, at the extremity of which was a guard of regular soldiers. There also he was met by another party of rebels, who fired upon him, and to whom, as before, he threw money, and took a third road. While proceeding on his way, he suddenly came upon a party of Moslems, among whom were several of his acquaintances. Since then their doings has been given to the Government, and six of them arrested. Some of them fired upon the Doctor and his party; others attacked them with swords, axes and clubs. The Doctor's two children were behind him, and cried amid their tears to the assailants: "Slay us, but let our father remain alive, for without him we can not live." Upon which one of the monsters stiffed up his sword and cut the little girl in two. The Doctor resorted to his former stratagem and threw down money, by which means he then escaped without injury, although he was twice fired at from a distance of about three yards off. But subsequently he was wounded by a hatchet on the head, by a club over the eye, a sabre on the right side and on his right arm, in consequence of which he is still prevented from holding a pen. Upon the left hand he was struck by a club, and was beaten all over the body.—Correspondence of the London Times.

WHO ARE THE SYRIANS?

Now that the troubles in Syria are attracting so much attention, it is valuable to have such a statement as the following of the numerous and distinctive features of the different religious sects into which the people of that country are divided:

"The Syrians are Arabs, speaking the Arabic language, natives of the soil, and all subjects of the Turkish Government. They are divided into ten religious sects, viz: eight Christian and two anti Christian, as follows:

1st. The Greeks, the most numerous, and in full communion with the Greek Church.

2d. Greek Catholics, uniting in their church government, forms from both the Greek and Latin Churches.—Their priests marry.

3d. Maronites, owning the Pope as the head of their Church; very exclusive and connected—a strait sect, and different in many of their ideas from both the Greek and Latin Church.

5th. Syrian Catholics.—Roman converts, with Oriental rites.

6th. Armenians.—These are few in number, and regarded as foreigners, but are one of the native Christian sects and generally engaged as merchants and mechanics.

7th. Armenian Catholics.—Seceders from the Armenian to the Catholic Church, retaining many of their Oriental rites and dogmas.

8th. Roman Catholics, in full agreement with the Church of Rome, and who exist mainly in convents.

9th and 10th. Mohammedans and Druses. Both deny Christ, and are bitterly hostile to Christian sects, claiming perfection, and denouncing all Christians as "infidel dogs."

Neither the civil or religious character of these sects give them any claim upon our charity; it is because they are hungry, naked and homeless that we are asked to feed, clothe and shelter them. Upon the broad basis of philanthropy the call is made.

The American missionary has no other relation to them than any other foreign resident in Syria. The missionaries have their own schools, chapels and disciples, and form a distinct community, interfering with none. When the war broke out the Pasha at Beyrout gave the Druse chiefs command that the American missionaries must remain unmolested—and they not only saved themselves and those who had become their converts, but also scores of the natives. One missionary protected in his house between forty and fifty of the Maronites. One came a prisoner to his door, and there, in the presence of the missionary, paid the price of his life—about four hundred dollars—to the Druse murderers.

RIVERS.

Southey has remarked that rivers may be considered physically, geographically, and mathematically, politically and commercially; historically; poetically and pictorially; morally and religiously.

In the earth's structure, they have been aptly enough called its veins, just as the mountains and the mighty masses of granite represent its bones; and, like mountain chains, rivers mark out nature's kingdoms and provinces, and are the physical dividers and subdividers of continents. Some of the most picturesque features of natural scenery are obviously due to the action of rivers; and in many a mountain gorge and rocky valley we see them still exerting their plastic force in wearing down solid rock, and carrying the debris towards the sea. In mountainous countries some of the grandest scenery of glens and ravines is due to a river having forced its way between the rocky walls that now compress its current; and many a rich and beautiful valley through which a river now calmly flows, seems to have been once either a stony wilderness or ancient lake. Rome would not have crowned her seven hills if the waters of the ancient lake of the Roman plain had not found an outlet in some pre-historic age through the gorge in which the Tiber flows. The flowery vale of Tempe is said to have been inundated before Ossa and Olympus were separated, as Pliny says, "by divine agency," and gave an outlet to the river Peneus; but we need not go so far as Thessaly for instances where a river flows between approximating precipices which seem to have been driven asunder by an earthquake, or some giant power.

The geologist sees in rivers "the faithful and continuous chronologers of the earth," the recorders of ages anterior to human records, and even the existence of man, for, by their endless and uniform flow, they register in visible characters in their channels and valleys successive changes of long time. He is, indeed, led to startling conclusions with regard to the lapse of prehistoric ages, and the antiquity of existing continents, by studying the action of the great rivers. For instance, just it is, perhaps, the grandest example that could be given, the seven hundred thousand tons of water which rush over the precipice at the Falls of Niagara every minute, are estimated to carry away at least a foot of the cliff yearly, and the cataract having evidently once been at Queenstown, four miles below, it has been concluded,—assuming this rate of destruction to have been uniform—that the fall has been twenty thousand years in receding to its present site. Again, we see immense deposits accumulating at the mouths of great rivers, and tracts of new land in course of formation, as, for example, at the mouth of the Rhone, by the debris and shingle carried by the river towards the sea; and in the extent of those formations we have, in many instances, proof of the lapse of immense periods of time; thus it has been calculated that the "delta" of the Mississippi, which is fourteen thousand square miles in extent, can not have been formed in less than sixty thousand years.

MARTYRDOM OF HUGH LATIMER.

Hugh Latimer, one of the early English Reformers, was born at Thurcaston, near Mount Sorrel, in Leicestershire, about 1472. After taking his degree at Cambridge, he entered into holy orders, and was quite a zealot on behalf of Popery. The influence of Thomas Bilney induced him to scan the subject more thoroughly and to study the Bible. His eyes were gradually opened, and at the age of fifty-three he renounced Romanism. His bold opinions against many Romish errors soon made him notorious in his own university and elsewhere. He even ventured to remonstrate with Henry VIII. on the danger of prohibiting the Bible in English. Through the patronage of Thomas Cromwell he was appointed to a living in West Kinton, Wiltshire, where he preached with great earnestness and fervor the evangelical truths of the Reformation; and he first became chaplain to Anne Boleyn, and then Bishop of Worcester in 1535. When the act of the six articles was passed, he dissented, and proved his sincerity by resigning his preferment to the Tower, where he lay a prisoner for six years; and though the accession of Edward led to his liberation, he would on no account resume the government of his see. No sooner had Mary ascended the throne, than Latimer, as might be anticipated, became a marked object of papal vengeance. He refused to fly from the royal citation, conscious that his hour was come. After a manly vindication of his opinions, he was, along with Ridley, condemned to the flames. On the day of his martyrdom at Oxford, 16th October, 1555, he appeared in a surcoat, was, with his fellow sufferer, bound by an iron chain to the stake, and five bags of gunpowder were fastened round his body. The faggots were kindled, and Latimer, turning to Ridley, cried with prophetic voice: "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man. We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as, I trust, shall never be put out." Latimer's sermons, which were collected and published, London, 1825, in octavos, are distinguished by spirit and homely sense, and pointed and vigorous admonition, the offspring of a playful temper, a happy disposition, and a sincere and noble heart.

MISSIONS IN CHINA AND JAPAN.

A highly interesting discourse was delivered Sunday morning in Rev. Dr. Tyng's Church, in East Sixteenth street, by Right Rev. George Smith, presiding bishop over the English mission at Hong Kong, China. The church was densely crowded, and the sermon was listened to with undivided attention.

The reverend bishop took for his text Hebrews xiii. 10:—"We have an altar whereof they have no right to eat that serve the tabernacle." After explaining the scriptural meaning of the words altar and tabernacle, and the application of the words of the text to all professing Christians, he proceeded to speak of the condition of the English and American Protestant missions in China and Japan. He had been a laborer in those distant fields, and with just pride, bore testimony to the zealous labors of American missionaries in those remote and vast territories, and particularly the Japanese empire, where only recently the way had been opened for the advent and teachings of the missionaries of the true religion of Jesus Christ. In no countries did greater difficulties beset the path of the missionary, and no where were those obstacles more urgently fought against and overcome.—He portrayed the difficulties encountered in consequence of the jealousy and exclusiveness of the native governments, who are not favorable to what they regard as the innovation of strangers, but strongly cling to their own heathen faith and traditions. About half a century ago the first Protestant mission was established in China.—Although Rev. Mr. Morrison, the pioneer of this mission, had long since passed to his rest, he planted seeds which had grown vigorously in face of the bitterest opposition and discouragement. The word of God had not been proclaimed there in vain. The Christian church of native Chinese numbered over 2000 members. This is a small number comparatively, but for the victory, thus far, of gospel truth they ought to be thankful and take courage. His remarks upon China closed with a succinct but vivid account of the rebellion which still is in progress. It was, he showed, all helping to advance the Protestant faith. A bright and glowing resume of the facts connected with the establishment of the Japan mission formed the concluding subject of the discourse.

TALKING AND WRITING.

A man never knows what he has read until he has either talked about it or written about it. Talking and writing are digestive processes which are absolutely essential to the mental constitution of the man who devours many books. But it is not every man that can talk. Talking implies, first of all, a readiness on the part of the speaker, and next, a sympathetic listener.—It is, therefore, as a digestive process, the most difficult, if it is the most rapid, in its operation. Writing is a different affair; a man may take his time to it, and not require a reader; he can be his own reader. It is an easier, although a more formal process of digestion than talking. It is in every body's power; and every body who reads much makes more or less use of it; because, as Bacon says, if he does not write, then he ought to have extraordinary facilities to compensate for such neglect. It is in this view that we are to understand the complaint of a well-known author, that he was ignorant of a certain subject, and the means by which he was to dispel his ignorance—namely, by writing on it. It is in this view that the monitorial system of instruction has its great value—to the monitors it is the best sort of teaching. It is from the same point of view that Sir William Hamilton used to lament the decay of teaching as a part of the education of students at the universities. In the old time it was necessary to the obtaining of a degree that the graduate should give evidence of his capacity as a teacher; and in the very titles of his degree, as magister and doctor, he was designated a teacher. "A man never knows any thing," Sir William used to say, "until he has taught it in some way or other; it may be orally, or it may be writing a book." It is a grand truth, and points a fine moral. Knowledge is knowledge, say the philosophers; it is precious for its own sake; it is an end to itself. That nature says the opposite. Knowledge is not knowledge until we use it; it is not ours until we have brought it under the command of the great social faculty—speech; we exist for society, and knowledge is null until we give it expression, and in so doing make it over to the social instinct.—Blackwood.

RESOURCES OF ENGLAND.

It is a matter of some interest, in view of some possibility that England may soon be called upon to take a prominent part in another European conflict, to look at the resources which she possesses for the hour of danger. We may judge of the spirit and capacities of this powerful people by the amount of men and money which the British Parliament voted for the war of 1811. The historian Alison states that the total ways and means then raised on account of Great Britian were £80,000,000 and £10,901,000 on account of Ireland—in all £90,901,000. Immense as this was, it fell short of the expenditure of the United Kingdom, which that year reached £92,341,000. The number of the regular forces was two hundred and twenty thousand, and the militia enrolled in the army about four hundred and twenty thousand—the Navy one thousand and nineteen ships of war, of which no less than two hundred and forty were ships of the line, (one hundred and seven of these being actually in commission,) and one hundred and nineteen frigates. The supplies voted for 1812 were still greater. It is stated that the net produce of the permanent taxes in that year was, £10,000,000, of the war £26,000,000—in all £66,000,000—and £22,268,000 was raised by loan, including £4,500,000 for the service of Ireland, and £2,500,000 for that of the East India Company, guaranteed by Government. For the navy £20,500,000 for the army £25,000,000, besides £4,252,000 for the ordnance; the loans to Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Sicily and Russia £5,315,000; the interest of the national debt £23,121,000; and still no less than £13,482,000 was applied to the sinking fund. The facts thus given by an accurate historian show the great spirit and resources of the British nation when thoroughly aroused by an important contest. Great Britain is, from wise motives of public policy, acting upon the counsels of her great dramatist to individuals: "Beware of entrance to a quarrel," but "being in," we have no doubt of her ability so to bear herself as to make her adversaries beware.

THE TWO JOHN WICKLIFFES.

It is an extraordinary fact, but not the less true, that there were living at the same period two John Wickliffs—both born about the same time, both educated as ecclesiastics at Oxford, and becoming the heads of houses, the one of Canterbury, the other of Balliol—both preben'aries, the one of Worcester, the other of Chichester—and both dying within a year of each other. This is the more remarkable, as the name of Wickliffe is a local one, and the only locality in England bearing the name is the village about six miles from the town of Richmond, in Yorkshire, where the Reformer is said to have been born in or about the year 1324. This fact may not only clear him from several apparent inconsistencies of conduct, but from the graver charge preferred by Anthony Wood, Dr. Fell, Bishop of Oxford, and other writers, that the zeal which he displayed in withstanding the errors of the Papacy, was occasioned by nothing else than the loss of the wardenship of Canterbury Hall, Oxford, of which they say he was first deprived by Archbishop Langham, and finally by Pope Urban V., and that "what he afterwards did was merely out of revenge, and not at all of conscience," and that, being a man of good parts, he exercised them to no evil end." Lightly, however, threw over the Canterbury Hall and the Reformer were two distinct individuals, which is clearly and satisfactorily established in an article, from which this is abridged, in the Gentleman's Magazine for August.—London Church Intelligencer.

FRENCH GOLD FIELDS IN AFRICA.

The New York Herald publishes a long article, which it says is furnished by an eminent geologist, and which maintains that France has extensive gold mines in Senegal. From the editorial column we take the following extract, leaving our readers to judge for themselves how probable is the story: "A fourth gold field, more prolific than those of either shore of the Pacific, and worked with greater secrecy than the Russian mines in Asia, has been opened by France and steadily developed for the last six years. Acting upon the suggestion of an American citizen, Louis Napoleon sent a secret expedition of thirteen vessels and twenty-five hundred men to the before neglected colony of Senegal. From that time the progress of French rule and French enterprise in Africa has been rapid and remarkable. Algeria has crossed the desert of Sahara and linked its posts with those of the advancing colony of Senegambia. The British flag has been bought off from a large portion of the western coast of Africa, and the French tri-color has been planted in Abyssinia. The new colonial region has been separated from the colonial system of the empire, and placed under the immediate presidency of the Emperor. Numerous institutions and offices have been created, which have no ostensible results, and yet their officers attain frequent rewards and promotion. Why is this? It is because Louis Napoleon is secretly working hundreds of thousands of African slaves in the new gold fields of Africa, deriving therefrom not only the means for extending the empire on that continent, but also the resources to supply the immense workings of the French mint, and to give life and energy to his vast political schemes."

REMARKABLE PHENOMENON IN THE EAST INDIES.

The great meteor of the 20th of July was almost coincident with an equally wonderful phenomenon that occurred in the East Indies. On the 14th of that month, at three o'clock P. M., the inhabitants of Dhurmsalah, about twelve miles to the south of the granite peaks of the Dhaoladhur mountains, were startled by the noise of a most terrific explosion, which lasted about three minutes, and almost persuaded the hearers that the whole of that imagnificent range was falling down. The solitary cloud that was visible had settled upon the highest peak, and from that direction something was heard whizzing through the air so near the earth that all hands were involuntarily raised to shield their heads. An instant after a huge black mass was seen to fall in the direction of its path, about a mile away. The spot was at once visited, and an immense block, apparently granite, covered over with a pitchy substance, had buried itself three feet and a half into the ground. When dug out it was found of an icy coldness, so that pieces broken from it could not be held in the hand. Two smaller pieces of the same kind fell within two miles of it. The structure of the granite corresponds exactly with that of the mountains, and as they are covered with perpetual snow, the icy coldness of the meteor suggested a conjecture that the explosion tore it from the peak, sixteen thousand feet high, and carried it twelve miles through the air. The question was to be scientifically investigated.

WHAT A GOOD PRINCE CAN DO.

According to all accounts the late Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz was an old trump. While all the rest of the German sovereigns, without a single exception, sought their pride by being leaders of troops rather than civil governors, and testified this feeling by never appearing in public otherwise than in military uniform, Prince George steadfastly clung to his plain black coat and his civil duties, and employed his army in road making and drain-cutting. Of course the Good Duke was vastly laughed at on account of these doings by the princely martinets of the neighboring countries; but he appeared to take little notice of their sneers, and never went visiting them, nor sent out invitations. In his little thread-bare suit of black he was seen trotting day after day for more than half a century, the streets of his capital, now stepping into the shop of a baker, and examining the size and quality of the loaves, and then again looking into a crowded school-house; to see if the teachers were doing their duty, and his little subjects getting on with their reading, writing and arithmetic.—The duchy of Mecklenburg-Strelitz is but a very small country, having only about 99,000 inhabitants; but yet it is something to say in favor of the Grand Duke that he found this country in utter desolation, in ignorance and serfdom, and left it a flourishing little State, within whose confines not a single beggar is to be found, and where every man, woman and child can read and write, and has something to eat.

GREAT CITIES OF CHINA.

Mr. Lowrie thus refers to two of the great cities of the celestial empire.

"Within two hundred miles of Shanghai, to the north-west, is the great and luxurious city of Soo-chow,—in morals a second Corinth, but in commerce and in population, another London. From authentic statistics there is reason to believe that more than two millions of human beings are there, awaiting their inevitable doom in a few short years hence, during which interval the sublime workings of divine Providence will probably have thrown open the door to Christians to preach Christ unto them. * * * * *

"Again, two hundred miles to the south is the great and famous city of Hang chow, not so far from Ningpo as Soo-chow is from us. It is the Athens of Buddhism. On one of its temple-crowned heights another Peal might stand and feel his spirit stirred within him, when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry. Its situation is beautiful, and healthy; its internal commerce, though less than that of Soo-chow, is still immense. It is embellished with magnificent temples, bridges and other monuments of China's former prosperity, and the enthusiasm with which the nation once welcomed Buddhism to their shores. Fifteen hundred thousand souls are put down as the population, including a concourse of learned and wealthy strangers from all parts."

LOSSES OF THE MARONITES.

The Paris Monde gives an account of the losses of the Maronites in the Syrian outbreaks. By the side of the bloody and abominable crimes against persons, there arn ruins of every kind scattered over the once fertile soil of the Maronites' territary. Here is a list of these disasters.

1. Schools destroyed, twenty-eight.
2. Scholars in these schools, eighteen hundred and thirty.
3. Churches torn down, five hundred and sixty.
4. Convents burned, forty-two.
5. Villages destroyed, with the loss of animals, three hundred and sixty.
6. Religious establishments belonging to Europeans, nine.
7. Harvest lost, all the cereals, silk, malberry trees, etc., which Mount Lebanon produces, from the district of Muten to the plains of Nazareth—an extent of country 120 kilometres in length and about 50 in breadth.

SUCH IS LIFE.

It is a wonderful thing—Life—ever growing old; yet ever young; ever dying, ever being born; cut down and destroyed by accident, by violence; by pestilence, by famine, preying remorselessly and insatiably upon itself, yet multiplying and extending still, and filling every spot of earth on which it once obtains a footing; so delicate, so feeble, so dependent upon fostering circumstances, and the kindly care of nature

THE EDITOR'S CONGREGATION.

We write to you—you are too scattered and too many to hear us,—perhaps more than forty thousand strong. You have come from many lands, and you have passed through many changing fortunes. You fill all ranks; you occupy all relations found in society; you are in all conditions—in poverty's vale, and abounding in wealth. Some of you are old and well stricken in years; some in vigorous middle life, and some in the bud of your youth. Some of you will read our thoughts on soft sofas and plashy carpets, and some on hard benches and bare boards. Some of you are wrapt in silken robes, and some in coarser garb. Some of you are homed amid the din and dust of cities; some on the sea side; some in vales, and some on mountain tops. Some of you have deep and varied knowledge of books and storied lore, and some the practical knowledge of men; some deep experience of life, and many, we trust, the knowledge of God.

Our discourse of men and things, to suit you, must be varied. We can imagine the different degrees of interest with which you will read and regard the different items that make up the subject matter of our weekly presentation. The rosy-cheeked, bright-eyed little ones will look to the children's column for some pleasant story, that talks more to the heart than the head. Those ardent boys will want to know what Garibaldi has done, or what the mysterious man of France is going to do.—Those young ladies will look to see the Prince's receptions here and there, as he hurried through the States,—once the colonies of his expected crown—to see if the bands played "God save the Queen," if ladies smiled and waved white hands to welcome him. Those solid, calculating men will read price currents, and last accounts of crops home and abroad. Those brethren in the ministry and laity, full of zeal and love, will read revival triumphs and take courage and bless God for Zion's victorious march. Those "holy women," whose thoughts are ever coasting near the shores of heaven, will read with uncommon joy how Christians die, and shout in death, "We're going home."

We would come to you all a welcome messenger, desiring to edify and comfort, and oft to elevate and point your hopes to fairer worlds on high.

ON GIVING.

All should give, for all are under obligations to do so. God has given life, reason, opportunity; above all, his only begotten son, and given Him a ransom for all, to be testified in due time. All should give, because it is wrong and oppressive that a few generous souls should give all that is given to support the ministry, build the churches, and sustain the missionary enterprize. True, it is a real pleasure to these princely souls to give; but there is no reason why this pleasurable duty should be stretched above measure until it is made a burden, and [illegible] often so. Unless these large-hearted men give beyond proportion, and [illegible] convenience, the preacher must leave for Conference without having received his moderate support; the church must go unbuilt, or the debt unpaid when it is built; and the missionary cause must languish, and its drafts run the risk and shame of protest.

All should give, because many hands make light work, and in union there is power. If all who could, would give, vast sums would be raised, the Lord's treasury would be full; preachers would not have to locate for bread; miserable shanties and barns would not occupy the ground on which holy and beautiful temples should stand, and invite to prayer and point to heaven; and the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us!" would not be uttered in vain.

All should give according to their ability: he that is worth a half million, should give five times as much as he that is worth one hundred thousand, and these ten times as much as those only worth ten thousand—"As the Lord hath prospered," is the rule. If it were observed, what vast enterprizes could be successfully projected and consummated—how Zion would arise and shine, and become terrible as an army with banners!

Why have so many Christian men become rich? To hoard it up? To lavish it in useless display and luxury? To enervate and ruin their children, body and soul? No, no, it cannot be. Why, but to promote Christian enterprise, and aid in hurrying forward the gospel's conquering march.

All should give cheerfully; the Lord loves a cheerful giver. Ought we not to be thankful that we have the means to give, and with cheerful joy render our portion to the Lord? Sad is the sight of a grudging giver parting with his cherished hoard, as he would with an eye-tooth, and writhing as under the amputating knife and saw. No; give it freely as the fountain gives its sparkling flood.

WALNUT GROVE CAMP-MEETING.

Rev. W. G. McGaughey writes us as follows, from Floyd, Carroll Parish, La.: "Our campmeeting at Walnut Grove, near this place, was crowned with happy results. Some fifty accessions to the Church, nearly as many conversions, and a season of great refreshing. This, with our basket-meeting in August, makes nearly a hundred that have enrolled under the banners of salvation, most of whom found Jesus precious to their souls. Our camp-ground at Walnut Grove is considered a permanent institution, and is indeed a lovely spot. An Indian mound, about fifteen feet in height, with sloping sides, and a flattened top, sufficient to accommodate 1500 persons, was the place of worship; the tents were on either side, and in front a beautiful grove of walnut, from which its name. In this grove a table was spread morning, noon, and night. The meats were all barbecued, and most of the other cooking done at home. This gave tenters as much chance to enjoy the preaching as others, and is, I think, an improvement on the old plan. We gratefully acknowledge the help of brethren in the ministry from a distance. Bros. Marshall, Godfrey, Hardgrove, and Swinney, from Miss.; Harp and Pauly, from your city; Trippett, Scales, Wheat, Kimball, and Johnson, from adjoining portions of the State; and when these names are mentioned, you may imagine with what spiritual and intellectual feasts we were regaled. This is a most interesting field of labor, and is rapidly settling up with a most interesting population. The labors of the husbandmen have been rewarded, and the destructive drought that has parched the earth in other regions but slightly affected us. Lands are as yet cheap, though rising fast from the rapid influx of settlers and land hunters. The moral and religious tone of society is wonderfully improved and still improving. What we want is population, as our lands are not one-tenth occupied. The completion of the railroad from Vicksburg to Delhi makes us accessible without crossing the swamps. We have the means subscribed to build a large, commodious house of worship in this place, which will soon be commenced."

The Louisiana preachers are being greatly blessed this year, especially those of the Northern part of the State. The Church at large, we imagine, has but little idea of the growth and prospects of this Conference. The most difficult ground ever cultivated by Methodist preachers on this continent, it will ultimately become one of our most wealthy and important Conferences. The old-fashioned Methodist fire is burning all over Louisiana.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC PRESS AGAINST "THE TEMPORAL POWER OF THE POPE."

We might well begin this article, says the Methodist, with an expression of grateful astonishment; for the press of one of the most sombre despotisms that ever saw the sunlight has really spoken out for freedom—spoken timidly and with many apologies, many accompanying prostrations, but still distinctly and genially. The last number of Brownson's Review, in an article on the "Rights of the Temporal," joins in the cry for the unity of Italy and the success of the revolution, asking the Pope, for the good of his native country, to leave the ranks of temporal rulers. The Freeman's Journal, the quondam organ of Bishop Hughes, has also spoken in the same tone—so that the leading Catholic weekly and the only Catholic quarterly of the country seem to be virtually battling in the ranks of Garibaldi against the head of the Catholic world.

When Mr. Brownson was perverted to Rome, one part of him remained sound and true. His American heart, however cramped and tied up in a thousand complicated sophisms, and delivered over to the keeping of papal authority, still rebels against his supple ingenuity, and throbs on right humanly. To a man of his versatility, Protestant dogmas, which had never rooted themselves in his inner life, were an easy conquest, but his light and limber logic could not quench the fervors of his Yankee blood. His intellect is all Papist; his heart, all Protestant and American.

The obsequiousness with which he approaches the spiritual caste, for whom his pleas seems to be meant, is most patent and yet only apparent. He may conceal it from himself, but evidently, in all his protestation of humility and of submission to ghostly authority, he is only wheedling said authority, only smoothing it down. When he meekly disclaims any intention to usurp the place of the clergy, "who alone have any authority in spiritual affairs," but, at the same time, reminds them that the Church of God is one, composed of ministry and laity, and that the latter, as well as the former, have their rights; when he deprecatingly informs the priesthood that "the modern world is to a great extent laic," and that "the whole population of this country is now directly or indirectly taken up into the governing classes, and stands in the relation to the spiritual order which sovereign princes and nobles have usually occupied;" when, in tones of unquestioning submission to Holy Church, he promises to "take the rights and powers of the temporal order as she defines them," but adds that her definition has already and long ago been pronounced, and that under it he is resolved to "maintain the autonomy of the temporal order, whether represented by the monarch, the nobility, or the people;" when he thus bows low and resolutely rises again—thus gives up all, that he may take back what he wants—who can fail to see and feel that Italian liberty and unity are the objects of his heartfelt solicitude, while obsequiousness and humility are only the ceremonies of a wily and cautious approach to them? But let this great Catholic journal speak for itself, in an extract:

"One thing is certain, our Lord did not give the temporal government of this world to the sacerdocy. He separated the two powers, and gave to each its own representative. We can not, then, it seems to us, insist, in the name or interests of religion, that the Roman people [illegible] to submit against their will to a sacerdotal government in temporals. Why shall they, more than any more than the French, the Austrians, the English, or the American? Why may not the separation of the two powers be pleaded at Rome as well as elsewhere?

"But we will not deny that we sympathize with the Italian nation, and we can not find it in our heart to denounce the temporal subjects of the Pope in the terms so often used by some of our friends, who, in their situation, might do as they do, or somewhat worse. We do not believe the law of God or the interests of religion are opposed to the resurrection and autonomy of Italy, or doom the temporal subjects of the Pope to hopeless slavery or perpetual nonage. We know that every one despoiling, or aiding and abetting in despoiling the Pope of his temporal dominions, incurs the greater excommunication; and therefore we have opposed the war of Napoleon against Austria, the annexation of the Duchies and Emilia to the kingdom of Sardinia, and the filibuster operations of Garibaldi in Sicily and Naples, yet we dare not be too hard upon the Roman people themselves. They want what they have not, a career; political life and activity, to live and develop themselves as a nation with a central life of its own. This they believe is not possible without political as well as national union with the rest of Italy, and the temporal resurrection and autonomy of the whole peninsula under a single political and civil organization—precisely in principle what is craved for Ireland by the great body of Irish Catholics, and we have yet to learn that what is right, noble, patriotic in Ireland can be the contrary at Rome. Say what we will, the centre of Italian political life and nationality at present is Turin. Turin to-day is as much the political as Rome is the religious capital of Italy. They who wish to see Italy resuscitated, and taking her rank as a great power in the European system, see no way of realizing their wishes but by turning to Sardinia and enrolling themselves under her banner. The Pope's hands are tied; nothing is to be hoped from the prepotence of Austria, the intervention of France, the imbecility of Naples, or the destructive doctrines of the Mazzinians. As things are and are likely to be for some time to come, we can see no hope for the Italian cause but in Sardinia, and the only real obstacle to that cause is the temporal sovereignty over a small Italian State of the Holy See.—Every Italian patriot believes this, and however attached he may be to the pontiff, he feels his wrath burn against the sovereign."

These are brave words of humanity and liberty, words uttered in calm defiance of bad history and worse law, words that shall cheer the noble hearts of the Italian Washington and his nameless heroes, and vex the souls of Pio Nono and Antonelli. The Roman Catholic press has caught, for the first time in this country, the inspiration of liberty, and in disregard of bishops, has pleaded for humanity against despotism and the Pope.

GOOD NEWS FROM ITALY.

With the exception of the Papal States, says the N. Y. World, all Italy now presents a field more or less open for the work of the evangelists. It may be useful to point out what provision has been already made for preaching the gospel to the natives. The Val d'Aosta, leading up to the southern base of Mont Blanc, is occupied by the Waldensian church. She has a devoted and able missionary—M. Curie—stationed at Courmayeur, who has kept up service for a year past in the city of Aosta. In this latter station the work has attained a magnitude which renders it necessary for M. Curie to transfer his residence thither, and another Waldensian minister will supply his place at Courmayeur. There is a spirit of inquiry awakened in many other villages of that valley, the population of which amounts in all to 100,000 souls. The priests are excited to a high degree of fury. They made an auto-de-fe lately of a copy of a controversial work written by M. Curie, and by their bravos they all but murdered a young colporteur in the suburbs of Aosta. In the city of Milan there is no Italian minister resident. There is a Plymouthian evangelist named Bassile, and a converted priest named Ravioli, who is employed by the society of Elberfield as a colporteur evangelist, and as schoolmaster by a society in Berne.—At Bergamo there is a Swiss Protestant church, of which Signor Kitt is the pastor, and as the majority of his congregation are from the canton of the Grisons (in Switzerland), he preaches alternately in German and Italian.—Some from among the upper ranks of the Lombards come to hear him, but the lower orders are too ignorant and indifferent. In Turin there are M. Meille, of the Waldensian church, and Dr. De Sanctis. At Voghera the Waldenses have a schoolmaster-evangelist; but pressing calls from other quarters have led them to withdraw their ministers from Alessandria and Cassale. At Alessandria there is a Plymouthian evangelist with a tolerable congregation. At Genoa there is M. Gay, Waldensian minister, and Signor Mazarella. At Bologna there is settled an Italian minister, Signor Cresse, ordained lately at the Oratoire of Geneva, and supported by that admirable Christian man and merchant prince, Mr. John Henderson, of Park. He has only been a few months in his present station (hitherto unworked), and has found it up-hill work at first, but he is beginning to gain an audience. There are three meetings of native converts in Florence, two presided over by English ladies virtually, though Messrs. Fabbroni and Gualtiere are the evangelists; the third has as its evangelist Signor Borioni, master in a mission school, supported from Scotland.—There is also a Waldensian congregation, of which M. Concourde is pastor; and there are congregations both at Pisa and Leghorn, under the superintendence of M. Ribet, another Waldensian. From thence we must make a leap to Messina, where Gavazzi was a month ago (on his way to Naples and Rome), dressed in the uniform of a volunteer, and where he has delivered occasionally an op-air phillippic against the pope. Letters from Messina have been sent to Italy, urging the appointment of a missionary to Messina, who would visit and preach to the wounded and sick in hospitals, who amount to more than 1,500 persons. The staff of laborers in Tuscany will be still further increased at the end of this month, by the arrival of two Waldensian professors of theology and eight students.

AUTHORS AND BOOKS.

The Harpers have in press Mr. J. S. Motley's "United Netherlands," a continuation of that "History of the Dutch Republic," with which some years ago this author astonished and delighted the reading world, first of this country and England, and afterwards of France, Holland, and Germany, into the languages of which countries I believe his work has already for some time been translated. If few men have received so unanimous, so favorable, and so speedy a verdict upon their work, few, I believe, have so long, so patiently, so silently, and so thoroughly worked out their task as he. Though counted now among the few greatest historians in our language, his name is yet to be found in no historical dictionary, or other such record of small and great celebrities. It must be nearly twenty years ago, and when he was yet scarce at the age of manhood, that he wrote and published a work called "Morton's Hope," which had a very moderate success. I have never read it; but probably the verdict of the public was right—as it mostly is.—From that time I do not know that Mr. Motley published anything until the "Rise and Fall of the Dutch Republic." How he came to write that book he has finely told, in a letter written some time after the death of Prescott. "It seems to me but as yesterday," he says, though it must be now twelve years ago, that I was talking with our ever-lamented friend Stackpole about my intention of writing a history upon a subject to which I have since that time been devoting myself. I had then made already some general studies in reference to it, intention of writing the history of [illegible] that Prescott had the had heard the fact, and that large preparations had already been made for the work, although 'Peru' had not yet been published. I felt, naturally, much disappointed. I was conscious of the immense disadvantage to myself of making my appearance, probably at the same time, before the public, with a work not at all similar in plan to 'Philip II.,' but which must, of necessity, traverse a portion of the same ground. My first thought was, inevitably as it were, only of myself. It seemed to me that I had nothing to do but to abandon at once a cherished dream, and probably to renounce authorship. For I had not first made up my mind to write a history, and then cast about to take up a subject. My subject had taken up me, drawn me on, and absorbed me into itself. It was necessary for me, it seemed, to write the book I had been thinking much of,—even if it were destined to fall dead from the press,—and I had no inclination or interest to write any other."

He had not "made up his mind to write a history," as a beginning; and that was the secret of his good work. Men who sit down with the intent to achieve greatness in any kind of work, don't often accomplish it. It is the men who are so full of their subject that they must write or burst; who would write even if their work were to fall dead from the press," who write what the world will not willingly let die. And here is the best argument against those "writers by profession" who bring the same kind of devotion to their work which a shoemaker brings to his—and then grumble that they get only a shoemaker's reward. Though I have noticed that even a shoemaker is the better for a noble enthusiasm for his shoes; and much as we laugh at the French cook who fell upon his sword because his fish was overdone, he was an infinitely greater man than the scullion who wiped up the blood, with a grin at his master's folly. We talk much of a man mastering his subject, but after all it is the subject which must master and inspire the man. It is thus every really great book has been written, and thus every great and noble deed has been acted out.—You can't do it "on purpose."

A writer in a recent number of the Atlantic—from which too I have quoted Mr. Motley's letter—says:—"The interest of the general reader and the approbation of historical scholars were at once enlisted by Motley's "Rise and Fall of the Dutch Republic." That work differs from and is superior to any American historical composition by virtue of a certain flood animation, a certain decided and sustained tone, such as can be derived only from an absolute relation between the author's mind and heart and his subject. Accordingly his record not only seizes upon the attention, but wins the sympathy of the reader, who recognizes a vital and genuine spirit in the work, which gives it unity, completeness, and a living style, whereby its incidents, characters, and philosophy are unfolded, not only with art, but with nature, and so made real, attractive and significant. That we are right in ascribing these merits to the affinity between the author and his work, is amply evidenced by his own confession in a letter called forth by the death of Prescott.

Of Mr. Motley's forthcoming work—whose full title by the way is, "The United Netherlands, from the death of William the Silent to the death of Prince Maurice; with a special view of the English-Dutch struggle against Spain,"—I hope to have something further to say another day.

Mr. S. A. Allibone's famous Dictionary of Authors, of which the first volume was published last year, has now, it is reported, gone to press, as far as the middle of the letter R. The poor gentleman has got the somewhat numerous Smith family to go through with. I wish him a safe delivrance. The first volume, which reached to K, was a most valuable and much-needed addition to bibliographical literature; and when the second is issued, with its ghostly indexes, Mr. Allibone will have earned the warmest thanks of every student, as well as of the general public.

Mr. Church, the Painter, went to Labrador last summer to see if he could paint icebergs as well as he did Niagara and the Andes. The Appletons are about to publish a pleasant account of the trip, by Rev. Louis Noble, who was one of the party. It will be called, "After Icebergs, with a Painter."

Derby & Jackson have in press a volume of Art Studies—studies of the old Italian masters—by J. Jackson Jarves, Esq., of Boston, who has just returned from a residence of several years in Italy, with the finest collection—for historical purposes—of the old Italian masters that has yet been made. He has good specimens of all the old painters, in regular succession; and those who study his collection, which is to be permanently located in New York, will see before them the gradual progress of Italian art from its early development to its latest perfection. The book—which is to be illustrated with copper-plate engravings—will be a fine comment on such a collection, and I hope by its means Mr. Jarves will enable even common-place people, like you and me, Mr. Editor, to enjoy the fruits of his industry and wealth.

The Harpers have just published Captain Burton's long expected "Picture of African Exploration," a journal of such perils and sufferings as few men live to write out. Also, "Odd People," a charming account of Feejee Cannibals, South African Bushmen, Australians, and such-like human curiosities, for young persons, by Capt. Mayne Reid, already well known for his very pleasant juveniles.

Messrs. Gould & Lincoln have in press an Introduction to the Study of the Gospels, by Brooke Foss Westcott, M.A., with an introduction by H. B. Hackett, D.D.

Messrs. Walker, Wise & Co., are about to publish Kormak: an Icelandic Romance of the Tenth Century. In six cantos.

The Messrs. Appleton will soon issue, among other works, The Housekeeper's Encyclopedia of Useful Information, etc., by Mrs. E. F. Haskell; A History of Civilization in England, by H. T. Buckle, vol. 2; Hopes and Fears, by the author of "The Heir of Redclyffe;" The Life and Writings of the Right Rev. George Washington Doane, D.D., LL.D.; Villas on the Hudson—a Series of Thirty-one Photo-Lithographs of Gentlemen's Seats on the Hudson; The Illustrated Byron, with upward of Two Hundred Engravings from Original Drawings by Kenny Meadows, Birket Foster, Hallet K. Browne, Gustave Janet, and Edward Morin; The History of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, by the Hon. Samuel Greene Arnold. Vol. 2.

Mr. Charles Scribner announces The Character of Christ, by Rev. Dr. Bushnell; and Thoughts on Preaching, and Discourses on Faith, by Rev. Dr. J. W. Alexander.

Mr. Michael Hennessy is writing a memoir of Mr. Matthew Carey, the Philadelphia publisher, and father of Henry C. Carey, the political economist.

The October number of McBow's Review has an article which purports to consist of "Reminiscences of Central America," by S. Kalfus of Kentucky, but which appears in reality to be taken almost bodily from Mr. E. G. Squier's well known work on Nicaragua and the other Central American States. A friend writes me that, on close examination, he finds that Mr. Kalfus and Mr. Squier seem to have seen the same place under the same circumstances precisely; that the two travelers were rained on in the same localities, were disgusted with the same accidents in the same manner, and in the same places; traveled over the same route, stopped in the same towns, and in other ways appear to have traveled as only those mysterious phenomena known as "doubles" appear to do. Is Mr. Kalfus a "double," or is he a myth? Or, did Mr. Squier really exhaust his subject in such a manner, that all who come after can only repeat him?

Harper's Magazine for November will contain the Lossing, Esq., the author of the "Field Book of the Revolution—who, by the way, is making good headway with his History of the War of 1812; a finely illustrated paper on Nantucket, by the always welcome Porte Crayon, who is now well known as Col. D. H. Strother, of Virginia; a timely article—considering our excitement about the Prince of Wales's ball—on Pearls and Gems, by reading which some lady readers will be able to compare their own jewels with those, figures of which are given, which have obtained historical repute; Glitter and Gold, by Rev. Wm. M. Baker; The Ordination Ball, by Miss Jane M. Fuller; Down the River is by Rose Terry; Rose Garden is a New England character sketch, by Rev. Dr. Osgood; My Velvet Shoes, is by FitzHugh Ludlow; Unto this Last, Part III., by John Ruskin; the last and best and wittiest of Mr. Thackeray's Lectures on the Four Georges, and a Poem, "The Fallen Star," is by FitzJames O'Brien.

FOOTPRINTS ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

NUMBER XVII.

The Pacific Conference—Self-Sacrificing Spirit of the Preachers—The Return Trip—Sickness—Kindness of U. S. Officers—Trying to reach a Conference—Success.

The Pacific Conference met in San Francisco. The session was brief but pleasant; much business was attended to Methodist preacher fashion—in a little time. On many subjects there was much discussion, but harmony and brotherly love prevailed. The brethren there seem to have one mind and one heart. They weep together and rejoice together, and share the changing fortunes of an itinerant life with as much patience, fortitude and devotion as any men I have ever seen. Labor is no burden to them, they love their work. Inconvenience is no hardship; for the yoke of Christ is easy and his burden light. In California, as elsewhere, there are desirable places, and places which a man would not prefer, now unorganized, hard work and poor pay; but there is no struggle for the former and no dodging of the latter. Many things which would be esteemed in the East as intolerable, by no means to be endured—a triumphant apology for location—are met, endured, enjoyed by the brethren in California. To feed the horse, to milk the cow, to work the garden, to make the fire and draw the water, to cook, and wash the dishes, are menial labors; but California preachers sometimes do all these things. Single men rent a room and make it parlor, chamber, kitchen, and dining room—live well and do good. Married men help their wives, in all domestic employments, and live independent of hired help for economy's sake in part; but mainly to avoid the annoyance and vexation of white servants. The supply in this department consists chiefly of German and Irish girls, who are ignorant, impudent and lazy, and who, taking advantage of the disproportion between supply and demand, exact high wages for little work, and leave without notice on the most frivolous pretenses.

I was delighted with the spirit of self-denial, the humility and yet the personal independence of the ministry in this "far West;" and I felt that with such instruments, there was ground for hope and encouragement as to the future history of the Church on the Pacific. An humble, holy, working ministry will do good anywhere; and while education, knowledge, experience are all elements of power and greatly to be desired, yet God very often confounds his foes and surprises his friends by means and operations, as scriptural as they are unphilosophical. The wisdom of the world is not know everything, and the faith of the Church is too often a sequence of calculation rather than a simple, uncompounded trust in the truth and faithfulness of God. Weak things often confound the mighty, and things mighty in human estimation often fail to realize our expectations.

For the present we must leave California. I had been sick for a month before Conference, up and down, as I now think, just because I continued to preach when I was not able to do it. Lest an evil report of the health of the country should get abroad among the preachers and deter some from going, it is proper for me to say that I regard California as a very healthy region, and that my own long indisposition was not the result of the climate, but of my own imprudence—(I suppose most would call it:) though I should say of my resolute purpose to do the work assigned me, whatever suffering it might cost me. If in my feeble state I could have returned by water, my indisposition would have ended in a few days. Rising from a sick bed to start, I took the steamer to San Pedro, the port of Los Angelos, and was on the ocean three days and improved in health all the time. Failing to connect with the stage, we were detained three days at Los Angelos. Here, again I preached, and on resuming my journey I relapsed. The stage was crowded with passengers, mail-bags and boxes of provisions, and our situation was anything but comfortable. I rode eight hundred miles with my limbs at an angle of forty-five degrees, and never was able to get more than one foot to the floor at any time. The chill came on every day about sunset; the nights were very cool, but my fevers saved me from suffering much with cold. Fourteen days and nights did I travel in this condition. Twenty four hours before reaching Fort Davis we encountered a "norther," and we had wind, sleet and snow. The stage curtains were rent, the front entirely open, and we were in a prairie region where our exposure was perfect. The discomforts of that ride will never be forgotten. My little daughter suffered extremely. Mrs. P. complained for the first time and in the midst of the storm my chill came on. On that night every body joined me in the shake. About midnight, in utter darkness, the sky black as ink and the winds howling like hungry wolves, we reached the Fort. The agent of the line, the officers of the army and the driver, urged us to stop and wait the next stage. We yielded, knowing that we must stop at the next fort, when we changed to the San Antonio line of stages.

It was well we did lie over, for here I had two of the sickest days of my life. We expected to take the next stage, but it was full, and the next, and so we were detained eight days. At this point I must record my sense of obligation to the officers at Fort Davis, Col. Seawell and Lieutenant Van Horn, the sutler Mr. Young, and others. Most of the regiment stationed here, both officers and men, were absent holding a court martial, but those named above were as kind and attentive as though we had been the friends of other years. Furnished with a house and servant, fed and nursed with watchful tenderness, every want anticipated, and, as far as possible supplied, we felt thankful to God and proud of our country. These gentlemen, bred to arms and living beyond the pale of civilization, yet retain and cherish the amenities of social life, and dispense a noble hospitality even to the passing stranger. An army of such men is one of the safeguards of the Republic, and deserves the admiration and confidence of the people whose interests they defend. They never could be made the agents of usurpation, the servile tools of power, or in any way compromise the rights and glory of our common country.

I left Fort Davis in wretched plight for travelling, but reached Camp Stockton eighty miles distant, and here again I was very sick for a day and night. And again I was indebted to the army for quarters and much kindness. Capt. Carpenter and Lieutenant Jones were friends in the hour of need, and made my detention as pleasant as my sickness would allow. I owe them many thanks, and pray heaven's richest blessings upon them.

At this point my only chance to get on was to hire an ambu. This Mr. Holliday, the agent, kindly furnished. By this time, I was so feeble and exhausted, that to sit up was a task, and yet a travel of four days and nights must be endured ere I could rest even for an hour. Hiding my sufferings as much as possible, I proceeded day and night. To add to the evil of the trip the Camanches were about, plundering and killing. Many people at the stations bid us farewell forever, never expecting to see us again. Tales of blood and murder were rife all along, as we approached the settlements. But we saw no Indians, and by a merciful providence were delivered from all dangers. The only mishap, save an upset in which nobody was hurt, was that one night about one hundred and twenty miles from San Antonio, in changing stages and transferring baggage, Mrs. P.'s trunk was left. My lady readers can estimate the seriousness of that calamity. We had gone sixty miles before it was missed, and how to recover it was a question hard to answer. The agent, who was along, took the return stage and promised to forward it if it could be found. So on reaching San Antonio, I sent Mrs. P. and the little girl to Gen Pitts', to rest a few days and wait the arrival of the trunk, while I diverged for the Rio Grande Conference at Goliad. I left at midnight, in another norther, being the third I had faced on the trip. The driver, to protect himself, got down into the boot under his seat and, trusting to the mules to keep the road, went to sleep. By and by, finding the motion of the stage very peculiar, and hearing the wheels crashing along among the bushes, I called out to know what was the matter. There were three of us all buttoned up inside, and by a united effort we at last waked up our driver, and found ourselves nobody knew where. We were lost. The team had left the road, but whether they had gone to the right or left, backwards or forwards, nobody could tell. We were in a fix, and no mistake. After all, I was to be disappointed in reaching the Conference. I had periled life, endured more than I shall ever tell, to get there before the adjournment, and now to be so utterly defeated by a sleepy-headed coachman—it was too bad. My patience fairly gave out. That night was one to be marked. We were freezing and could not stand still. So we journeyed, North, South, East and West, around, across, and about. Just before day we reached a creek, with steep, sandy, broken banks, we must cross. My fellow passengers got out to walk. Too sick to stand, much less to climb, I sat still, but soon found that to turn over was inevitable. I got out and left the driver to his doom. Presently here he came sailing in the air and the mules and the stage after him, over and over, such a pile! This was the consummation of trouble. We helped to set up the stage and left the driver to get the mules out of the creek as best he could, while we returned to a little house we had seen, in search of fire. Finally all was made ready, and we reached San Antonio the following night. I was present at one session of the Conference—a poor compensation for my trouble; but I had done my duty according to my ability—my body was sick, but my conscience was well.

Sunshine, Sept. 29.

AFRICAN MISSION OF THE ENGLISH UNIVERSITIES.—We have spoken in a former number of a new missionary enterprise for Central Africa under the auspices of the English universities. It is under High Church control, and has used Dr. Livingstone's name in the furtherance of this scheme. It is now distinctly stated that the great African pioneer looks to the Evangelical Church Missionary Society to enter on the fields which he may open up to Missionary enterprise. In confirmation of this view, the London Record points to the fact that Dr. McNeill and Canon Stowell have felt it needful to warn their congregations as to the unfounded pretensions and ambiguous constitution of the so-called Universities' Central African Mission.

It is stated by a Southern Baptist paper that there are 362,000 more Baptists in the South than in the North; seven more religious papers; two more theological schools; one more male college, and there is a yearly increase in the number received by baptism.

"WORTH LIVING A LIFE-TIME."

It was the parting hour. A group of earth's pilgrims, with tearful eyes, had gathered on the shores of time; for one they dearly loved was about to embark on that last voyage, from which none ever returns. The ocean of eternity rolled at their feet—they listened to the solemn music of its waves, as they dashed against the shore, and they feared for the loved one, for to them it seemed a fearful sea. The dew of youth yet rested upon the voyager; and the dust of earth had so much bedimmed their vision, that they could not discern the hosts of shining ones that hovered near the shore, nor the anchor of hope sure and steadfast, nor the heavenly captain close at hand, all ready to convey the youthful emigrant to the better country. They felt the Spirit's gentle breeze; but they doubted if heaven's celestial gales would waft the loved one onward to the port they fain would gain. The telescope of faith was obscured by the mists of unbelief, and they could scarcely catch a glimpse of the land that, to them, "was very far off."

The last good-bye was uttered, the parting message delivered, and the shore was fast receding from the view of the youthful voyager; but "she" gazed back on the group of friends she was leaving behind," and as we listened to catch the echo of her voice, we heard this, for the encouragement of all pilgrims, "To me the golden gates are just opening—it is worth living a life-time to feel as happy as I do now." Reader, these were the dying words of a youthful disciple. Worth living, a life-time, she said, as she drew near to the better country, when she had caught but a glimpse of the glory that was yet to be revealed. Worth living a life-time—with all its conflicts, toils and trials, with all its cares, and tears, and partings.

Struggle on, then, young Christian, with indwelling sin, with thy unbelief and hardness of hearts for one glimpse of the heavenly world is worth living a life-time for.

Strive on, then, thou who art weary with the rugged path, the storm-cloud of adversity may enshroud thee—many stumbling stones, and rocks of offence, may impede thy progress, yet, strive on! one glimpse of the everlasting hills will amply repay thee.

Work on! thou who hast toiled long, it may be, in thy Master's vineyard. Work on! for thou shalt yet sing the harvest hymn, as thou enterest the presence of thy Master, bringing thy sheaves with thee; and as the joyful hallelujahs of those for whom thou hast labored and prayed, resound through the arches of heaven, thou wilt say, It is worth living a life-time.

Hope on! ye suffering ones of earth, for those pains and groans, and diseases, is but the bitter draught your Father gives you to drink, preparatory to a sojourn in that "better country," where "the inhabitants shall no more say I am sick;" and soon, you will breathe the air of glory, and bask in the sunshine of His love. "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed." Trust on! ye chastened children of our Father—draw closer to your God; the clasping tendrils of love are broken from their earthly support, that they may fasten on the cross of Christ, and thus clamber to the skies. Trust on! for one faint echo of the song of the redeemed, as they sing of a Savior's love, one glimpse of the assembly clothed in white, as they cluster at the feet of Jesus, one ray of light beaming from the blessed Savior's brow, that hath felt for us the thorn, will so enchant you, that you too will send back the echo "It is worth living a life-time." Earth's "light afflictions are but for a moment."

Journey on! aged pilgrim—many suns have risen and set since you began to travel heavenward. Thou hast borne the burden and heat of the day—thou hast labored, and not fainted. Many a youthful pilgrim hast thou cheered by thy smile of encouragement, taught by thy test hast thou had with principalities and powers, and spiritual wickedness in high places—fightings within, and foes without; thou hast often grown faint and weary, but in all these things, thou hast been more than conquerer, through Him that loved thee with an everlasting love—and thou art witness this day that none of the good things have failed that the Lord hath spoken concerning Israel.

Journey on! aged pilgrim; these days of exile will soon be ended; soon you will launch forth on eternity's ocean; soon the desired haven will be gained, and as you sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven, you will exclaim, "It is worth living a life-time." And sinner, you who have no interest in the great salvation, a message for you. If such is the value of God's smiles, what must be His frowns! There is a day fast approaching in your history, when you will call on the rocks and mountains to fall on you, to hide you from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne.

"Wake! thou that sleepest in enchanted bowers,
Lest these lost years should haunt thee, in the night,
When death is waiting for thy numbered hours,
To take their swift, their everlasting flight;
Wake! ere the earth born shroud unnerve thee quite,
And be thy thoughts to work divine addressed;
Do something—do it soon—with all thy might."

LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: The Louisville Conference is now in session in this place. Bishop Early is presiding, and Bishop Soule is also here with his venerable presence and godly counsel and advice thrown in occasionally. Most of the members of the Conference are present, and every thing is proceeding in the most pleasant and agreeable manner. Two of the ministry have passed away—Revs. Gabriel Hardison and Benj. F. Wilson. They died in peace in the midst of a useful and profitable ministry. The announcement of the death of bro. Campbell of Miss. Con., was received here with sensations of most profound and mournful regret. His early friends and associates in the ministry are here, and remember his labors in this country and appreciate them well.

The increase in the Conference by ministry received on trial, is about fifteen. And the increase in the membership of the Church, it is understood will be considerable.

The Publishing interests of the Church are in a prosperous condition here. Their Depository at Louisville is doing well. They have sold in the past year over nine thousand dollars' worth of books, and have subscriptions and donations amounting to over ten thousand. But in this enterprise they are but fairly beginning. They are in fine spirits, and hope to do well in the future. Rev. A. H. Redford will remain in the agency. This will insure industry, perseverance, and a good share of ability in its management. The time is not distant when it will be regarded as one of the large wings of their ecclesiastical force.

They are beginning to institute a college in this Conference which will be an honor to the Church. At the last session of this Conference it was determined to locate a College of high grade and full endowment at this place. The Conference itself has as yet commenced no active labors in the enterprise; but the citizens of this place have commenced the work of building in good earnest. They have already commenced the edifice, have spread out the foundation, and got the work well under way. The site is the most grand, picturesque, and interesting of anything of the sort I ever saw. The elevation is gently sloping, rising about a hundred and fifty or two hundred feet, and overlooking a rich country, varied in appearance for ten to thirty miles in extent to every direction. The edifice will be one of the largest in this country. Its extreme length is 218 feet by 150 feet deep. The building is nearly paid for, is the property of the Louisville Conference, and is destined to be a College of considerable note.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

A MISSIONARY MURDERED.—A dispatch has been received at Washington, October 20th which announces the melancholy fact of the murder of Rev. Morris Hargnett, a missionary, to the Crow Indians, by a party of Sioux.

THE PRINCE'S VISIT TO THE SOUTH.—Baron Renfrew and suite visited West Point the 15th inst. The Baron expressed a regret that the want of time prevented his visiting the Southern States. He said it was his intention to again visit the United States, at an early period, during the winter season, for the purpose of a tour through the South.

THE CENTRAL ROAD.—The Houston Telegraph, of the 12th inst. says: The Central Railroad have closed their contracts for iron to complete the road to the 125 miles point. The contracts for the grading and ties has been out for some time. It is believed the road will now be pushed forward more rapidly than ever.

Cattle afflicted with pleuro pneumonia are still being slaughtered in Massachusetts.

Crops.—Many exchanges from Texas have generally quite a hopeful tone in regard to the crops. In many instances the corn planted since the drought gives promise of maturing. In some counties no production will be made than a month ago was expected. No loss of stock is reported, and the abundance of grass secures their subsistence through the coming winter.

SPALDING'S GLOBE.—Spalding & Co., of New York, the great "Prepared glue" men, have cleared $50,000 within a year past, on the sale of their glue, which they attribute in the main to the policy of extensive advertising.

A NEW TRADE.—Mr. J. C. Johnstone, an American, is about to supply the people of Red River with flocks. Wool has been their main building material since Lord Selkirk's time. Lime-stone, it is stated, is abundant and has been used in a few buildings. As the price is scarcity of timber, we think the enterprise will pay.

DEATH OF HON. J. F. STROTHER.—The Hon. James French Strother died at his residence in Culpeper county, Virginia, on Friday morning last, about 8 o'clock. Mr. Strother, several years since, represented in Congress the seventh Congressional district of Virginia, and proved an efficient and popular representative.

THE ASTRONOMICAL EXPEDITION.—The astronomical expedition, which was sent out to observe the late eclipse at the Cumberland Horn, on the Saskatchewan, failed to accomplish fully the object of its mission.

A MAMMOTH BALLOON.—Mr. C. F. Coe, of Rome, New York, has completed what is said to be the largest balloon on record. When the car is 20 feet long, and it is over 100 feet in diameter. Mr. Coe proposes to take his air-ship to Buffalo, for the purpose of exhibition, and of making, from that city, the first of the series of ascensions by which he hopes to confirm the theory of the upper eastern current. When this is demonstrated to his satisfaction, he intends to start for Europe.

THE SHIPPING INTEREST.—The Boston Traveller calculates that New England will put afloat at least forty-five thousand tons of shipping in the course of three or four months; and thinks it is within bounds to assume that one hundred thousand tons will have been built in the whole country during the year closing December next.

RAILROADS IN MISSISSIPPI.—Fifteen years ago there was not more than fifty miles of railroad in Mississippi; now it is said that there are about eight hundred miles of completed railroad which is in successful running operation, and about the same number of miles of road in the course of construction.

The exports of breadstuffs from New York to Great Britain, the past week, was about equal to $500,000, the largest week for a long time. The latest advices will probably check shipments, though the check will, in all probability, only be temporary. The exports for last year is now equal to $17,500,000 over 31 per cent.—and there are no signs that tar of any cessation of the movement.

INTERESTING TO MERCHANTS AND SHIPMASTERS.—An important case was recently decided in the United States circuit court, of the Naugatuck steam cotton company, libellants, against the bark Edwin and owners. It was a case in which a lighter was employed at Mobile to carry cotton to a ship. The lighter of the latter burst, and thereby the bales were lost. Bills lading having been signed by the master of the ship, the district judge held the ship liable for the loss. The circuit court affirmed the decree of the district court, deciding that the contract was entire, that the cotton was put on board the ship at the expense and risk of the vessel, and under a contract made with the master. The shipper had parted with its possession of the article, and had no control over it, and the ship was held for the portion of the article and the part of the transit.

WILD COTTON IN FLORIDA.—A Correspondent writes to the Charleston Mercury as follows: I send you herewith a small sample of wild cotton, or cotton indigenous to South Florida. It is found growing wild in various places along our bay coast, usually on shell or lime-stone land. I have now a specimen of this kind of cotton in my garden, where it has been growing for the last five years, winter and summer. It has this peculiarity: the cotton adheres to the seed, and the bolls seldom ever have more than three pods to the boll. I have never seen a caterpillar or a mold lay upon it. Both of these insects are usually regarded by the planters of this region as very destructive. Perhaps, if some of the scientific planters of your State would give the wild cotton a trial, it might be made to yield, in a few years, a cotton plant peculiar to the Carolina coast.

It is believed that on the night of the Lady Elgin disaster, an other vessel was lost, with all on board. The schooner St. Mary left Chicago that day for Cedar Rapids, but has not been heard of since. She had on board some lady passengers and five men, besides Captain Bennett, mate and cook. Since she left, another vessel has been up to Cedar River [illegible]

The Chicago Board of Underwriters' Book concern was commenced in 1859 on a borrowed capital of six hundred dollars and now it has gained capital of more than half a million, and since its existence, during the past twenty-four months has made more than one million dollars—one million and nearly two hundred thousand—all of which has been expended for denominational work.

A New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Press says that Mlle. Patti gets fifteen hundred dollars a month for the services in the Istakoech and Lucca Opera Troupe; in the former city Mlle. Mattlock has the musical direction of one hundred and fifty dollars a week; and when Tamberlik performs, which will be late in the season, it will be at a salary of twenty-five thousand dollars for twenty-five nights. Valuable voices these are.

PREFERABLE SLAVERY.—Mary Elizabeth, a free woman of color, twenty two years of age, who was encouraged by the Wolf of Wm. Miller, St. of Rockbridge county, Va., voluntarily re-slaved herself at the last session of the Circuit Court of Rockbridge, under the act of Assembly of February, 1856, which permits the voluntary enslavement of free negroes. She secured Joseph Saville as her master.

AN UNUSUAL CONCEIT OF DEATH.—In Philadelphia on Thursday morning, a woman named Anna McCammon, forty five years old, was found dead on the floor of her house, and so covered with blood as to lead to the belief that she had been murdered. An examination disclosed the fact that a cancerous sore on her left wrist had eaten to the main artery, and that she had bled to death.

LOSS OF THE STEAMSHIP CITY OF CORK.—The magnificent steamship Connaught of the Galway line, was lost on the 7th inst., during the passage from St. Johns, N. F., to Boston, the crew and passengers fortunately escaping, though narrowly, with their lives.

EXPEDITION AGAINST CENTRAL AMERICA.—The Washington correspondent of the New York paper says that the United States Minister to Nicaragua has notified the State Department that a plot exists in the Southern States to invade Central America, for the purpose of extending slavery under the auspices of a powerful combination, of which Gen. Walker was simply an agent.

ICE IN MOBILE.—The Mobile Advertiser is informed that ice an inch thick was formed, within two or three miles of that city, Tuesday morning. In the lower part of the town it was of the thickness of a quarter of a dollar.

GOLD DOLLARS MELTED UP.—At the Philadelphia United States Mint three millions of gold dollars are now being melted and re-coined into double eagles, in pursuance of an order to that effect from the Secretary of the Treasury.

THE PRINCE IN BOSTON.—The Baron Renfrew and his suite met with a cordial reception in Boston, October 20th. They took their departure next morning for Portland, where they will embark for England.

POPULATION OF KANSAS.—It appears from the new census that the aggregate number of inhabitants of thirty one counties in Kansas Territory is 83,145. Nine counties have as yet failed to be returned. Their population, it is said, can not be less than 10,000, so that it appears that at least 30,000 people are now living within the boundaries of Kansas.

POPULATION OF IOWA.—The estimated population of Iowa is in the neighborhood of 750,000, which, under the new apportionment, will entitle that State to six members of Congress.—This will be the greatest proportionate increase of representation of any State in the Union.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.—The Ladies' Washington National Monument society appeal in earnest terms to the judges and inspectors of elections of the towns, wards, precincts, and election districts in the United States, as well as to the people, to aid in carrying out the plan which will enable them to complete the monument of George Washington in the capital of the republic be founded.

DEPARTURE OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.—The Prince of Wales and his suite sailed for their home on last Saturday afternoon, October 22d, from Portland, Me.

SUFFERINGS OF THE PEOPLE OF KANSAS.—All accounts concur in the statement that the people of Kansas, in consequence of the failure of the crops, are on the point of suffering for want of the actual necessaries of life.

WALKER'S MEN IN AUGUSTA, GA.—The Augusta (Ga.) papers record the arrival in that city, from Charleston, where they landed, two or more members of Gen. Walker's disastrous expedition, Messrs. E. H. Harper and B. Hand. They report that Col. Kinney is loaded with chains and imprisoned in a mine one hundred feet under ground.

A NEW CITY IN VIRGINIA.—PROGRESS OF SOUTHERN MANUFACTURES.—A new town, to be called "Virginia City," has been laid out near Portsmouth, Va., by an organized company, with the view of establishing cotton mills, woolen factories and iron works. The Norfolk Argus says that Virginia City, as laid out, lies inside of the harbor of Norfolk, in the state of Virginia, adjoining the United States navy yard and the city of Portsmouth, and extending for three miles along the main harbor, between the seaboard and Richmond railroad, and the Norfolk and Portsmouth railroad, and the Dismal Swamp and Albemarle and Chesapeake canals, with the best harbor on the Atlantic ocean.

SNOW.—On night the 14th inst., there was a slight fall of snow between Arkansas, S. T., and the city of Charleston. This is almost as early as ever recorded.

RECOMMENCED CUTTON.—Notice was received by Taylor & Rogers on 9th inst., from the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway of Montreal, that that road will not, hereafter, contract, or transport uncompressed cotton, the object being to compel southern dealers to compress all their cotton, which thus renders it a desirable article of freight for railroads. Cincinnati Gazette.

Another new gun has been brought into the field. It is loaded with conical ball, similar to the Minie rifle ball, and is capable of discharging fifteen shots per minute. It is novel in its form, exquisite in its workmanship, and claimed by its inventor, and those who have seen it tested, to vie with any piece yet introduced. It is brought forward by Col. Avery, of Platisville, Ohio, to whom it belongs.

REMARKABLE SPEED.—Upon a trial trip of two new propellers, the Resolute and Defiance, built in New York, eighteen miles an hour were made. Five miles were run in sixteen minutes. This is said to be the fastest time ever made by a screw steamship. They are built on a new and striking model, which tends to lessen the dead or back water, which usually impeded the progress of this class of vessels.

THE HOOSAC TUNNEL.—The work on this tunnel is unavoidably delayed by the destruction of five drills at the Rhode Island Locomotive Works in Boston. The experiments which were made previous to the destruction of the machinery gave very encouraging indications of success. It was found to be practicable to drill in the hardest granite at the rate of one inch per minute, which is equivalent to three inches per minute in flinty rock, and more than ten times as rapid as hand drilling.

FOREIGN NEWS.

—The Papal government is making fresh armaments, and pressing large rewards for the remaining Papal troops concentrated at Tivoli.

The Spanish government has demanded a congress of the Catholic powers with the view of guaranteeing the integrity of the states of the holy see. The French cabinet admitted the expediency of such a congress, but said that territorial changes demanded a general European congress.

The funeral service for the Papal troops lately slain, was celebrated by the Archbishop of Paris, at Notre Dame, on the 5th instant. Several French bishops have issued pastoral letters protesting against the acts taking place in Italy.

The Grand Duke Michael of Russia is in England. He is attended by a suite of twenty five persons. The Grand Duke scatters presents about with a royal hand. The Mormons have a theory about this personage, that he is typified in the Scriptures as the Archangel Michael, and Joe Smith once sent an embassy to Russia to wait upon him, with what result Brigham Young can probably tell. Michael can hardly be a good Mormon, however, for he has but one wife.

DEATH OF THE GRANDDUCHESS OF THE PARSE OF WALES.—The last advices from Europe bring the tidings of the death, on the 14th instant, of the Dowager Duchess of Saxe Coburg Gotha, mother of Prince Albert, the Prince Consort of England, and consequently paternal grandmother to the Prince of Wales. She was in her 62nd year, and had been a widow for sixteen years. She left two sons—the reigning Duke of Saxe Coburg Gotha, and Prince Albert of England.

VICTOR EMANUEL issued an address to his soldiers at Ancona, extolling their bravery and the righteousness of their cause. He concludes by saying that he considers the command, as he desires to be foremost where there is danger.

The Empress Eugenie, it is said, has symptoms of the same disease that killed her sister, the Duchess d'Alpe, viz.: cancer of the uterus.

COCKNEY CRITICISM.—A competitive examination was lately held for the purpose of appointing ill persons to some of the Government offices in England. One of the candidates inadvertently spelled the word Veneer with two n's—Veneerer. The examiner, a clever man, but not always a correct speaker, sternly inquired: "Do you know, sir, that there is but one n in Veneer?" "Then eggs must be very scarce there," was the reply. The candidate passed.

The soldiers in the fort of St. Elmo's fire obliging their submission to Garibaldi, were almost crying of hunger, through the rascality of the agents in whose hands the King had placed the money to supply their rations. The opportunity was too good to be lost, and, with no pity for the poor soldiers, the agents absconded with the money in their pockets. Full of indignation, the soldiers surrendered, and a great many of them giving up their arms returned to their families.

GARIBALDI AND THE HUNGARIANS.—A private letter from Turin, says the Courier du Havre, of the 27th ult., contains this statement: "Garibaldi alone is in the secret of the movement at which the Hungarian insurrection is to break out. He has the great difficulty in restraining the illegals of Hungary until he gives the signal. At the present moment, Kossuth, Klapka, Teleki and others are in Paris, awaiting until the secret hour shall strike on the Garibaldian clock."

THE REV. H. H. GRIFFITHS.—The European Times tells us that the Rev. Henry Grattan Guinness was to be married on the 24 October, at Bath, to Miss Fitzgerald, a near relation of Lord Fitzgerald and Vesey, and of the Marchioness of Ailsa. He intends to complete his mission in America, and is to sail by the "Great Eastern," with his wife.

Kossuth, it is said, receives quarterly, from some mysterious source, the sum of £100, the accompanying note indicating simply that it is from a friend in America, and that it is intended for his personal expenditures.

The Rebels have published a formal vindication of their recent conduct. They claim that the blame rests with the Maronites. They affirm that the Maronites have for years been laying plots to expel them from Lebanon, and that their own course was only of self-defence.

The Turkish bath has been introduced into London with great success this season, and it is thought its establishment will be permanent, as some of the very first men in the medical profession, including those who have made themselves most famous for the study of the skin, have zealously and marvellously given in their adhesion to the principles of the bath.

AUSTRIA.—The wives and families of Austrian officers in Venetia have been ordered immediately to quit that territory.

BUSY TIMES IN JAPAN.—The correspondent of the Journal of Commerce writes on the 24th July from Nagasaki: "Several American and English ships have arrived and departed north for the North of China, taking full cargoes of coals, flour, grain, horses, bullocks, fresh provisions, &c., for the use of the allied forces. Provisions of all descriptions are arriving freely from the country. The Japanese are quite anxious to see what is to be the result of the Pekin affair, and the satisfactory adjustment of that question will have a very favorable influence here. The extension of the Road before the foreign settlement is going rapidly onward, and Europeans are preparing to build.

HENRY CLAY.—A fine bust, resting on a basement, which gives a total elevation of over 21 feet, At Southampton, a statue of Isaac Watts has recently been commenced—the statue and brass reliefs to be of Sicilian marble, and the pedestal of polished Aberdeen grey granite; total height nearly 20 feet.

FATHER GAVAZZI.—We learn from the English papers that on the 5th inst., Father Gavazzi began preaching in one of the public squares of Messina. His addresses have by no means the political fervor of those which he delivered in Italy, nor do they glow with the same fiery Republicanism; but he still holds very strong language, and inculcates the necessity of forming a single and united kingdom, under the sceptre of Victor Emmanuel.

THE AGE OF GOLD.—A statement was lately presented to the Statistical Congress in England, by the delegates from Australia and New Zealand, that the yield of gold, from 1851 to the close of 1859, was £101,371,425, or over five hundred millions of dollars. The American gold regions have yielded even more than this, since the California gold discoveries of 1848, and in round numbers, it may be stated that in twelve years the addition to the world's stock of gold exceeds one thousand million of dollars.

THE REVOLUTION IN ITALY.—It appears that when Lamoriere capitulated, his portfolio fell into the hands of General Fanti, and contained letters of the most compromising character, and that most positive proofs of numerous intrigues entered into with the Legitimists, and even the Red Republican party, against the government of Napoleon.

THE PRESS IN ENGLAND.—The London Times has received reports from sailing out of the United Kingdom, to show that the wheat crops will prove a full average, and be of fine quality, while those of barley and oats are as satisfactory.

NEW DISCOVERIES IN EGYPT.—Mons. Mariette, the celebrated Egyptian antiquarian, writes of a new discovery in Egypt, as follows: "The excavations made at Memphis have brought to light a metal founder's workshop. We have already recovered his tools, about forty pounds of untelined silver, gold medals, twenty silver medals, never seen before, and other objects destined to the crucible.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRES IN THE OLD WORLD.—On the 27th of August, at Gotha, the castle of Friedenstein was discovered to be in flames, and had to be battered down with cannon. The castle contained a church, with a vaulted burial place for royal personages, halls of session for the holding of councils, a museum, with a library of 200,000 volumes, a cabinet of coins, a collection of pictures and prints, a cabinet of art, a collection of objects in natural history, a Chinese collection, and another of casts from antique statues. A supplement to the Imparial, of Smyrna, of August 29, publishes an account of a terrible conflagration which had taken place in that city. No less than 700 houses have fallen a prey to the flames.

ATHENÆUM'S NEWSPAPER IN LONDON.—A first class newspaper, devoted to American politics and interests, called the London America, has at length been established in London. It is to be republished in New York. According to English usage, the names of the editors are not announced.

The oldest purely book-selling periodical in England, Bent's Monthly Literary Advertiser, has just expired at 'month after an existence of nearly sixty years, leaving the Publishers' Circular, issued twice a month by Low & Co., of Ludgate Hill, the only recognized general organ of the English publishing trade.

STEAM BOILER EXPLOSION.—About half past five o'clock on Monday evening, the boiler of the steam engine in the Chemical Works at the corner of Julia and Fulton streets, exploded. The engineer was shockingly scalded, and the premises was injured, but not seriously. The explosion tore down some fifteen feet of the wall fronting on Fulton street, from the foundation to the roof, and damaged a portion of the second story floor. The walls on Notre Dame street, back to which the premises extend, is also thrown out of line, so as to place it in a very dangerous condition. It is presumed that inattention was the cause of the disaster.

The report of the Board of Health for the past week shows that there were 121 deaths in New Orleans during that period.

COSTA RICA.

We copy from the Panama Star and Herald the following account of the battle between the Government troops of Costa Rica, under Gen. Maximo Blanco, 1500 strong, and the revolutionary force under ex-President Mora, numbering not more than 300 men:

One side of the spit is washed by a deep lagoon. A heavy wooden barricade had been thrown up with a salient bastion, armed with a nine pounder, and loop holed for musketry. This gun commanded the approach, while other guns of smaller calibre covered opposing angles. For further defense, a brig, a schooner, and several large launches were armed, and sent to cruise along the beach to pepper the enemy whenever they might show themselves. These vessels were under the command of Mr. Rogers, a well-to-do lighterman. But this branch of the service was of no use whatever, for it always kept out of shooting range, and finally cleared out seaward on the night of the action.

An advanced post was held by the Moristas for a few days, at about a league distance from the entrenchment, but was untenable. The Government forces opened fire upon them, on the 19th, and obliged them to return within their works, after a smart skirmish, during which both sides sustained considerable loss. The Government troops then took up a position within half a league of the entrenchment, and closely besieged it. Gen Canas's force consisted of some 150 raw recruits, miserably armed, commanded by himself as commander in-chief, and a dozen or so of colonels, among whom were Aranedita, Santander, and others.

A small force was stationed in town at the rifle-fort as a body-guard of the President, and the town was, of course, under martial law. Although so closely investing the place, the Government troops made no attempt to storm, merely getting their guns into position. Meanwhile the entrenchment was quite a fashionable resort, and all who had horses, galloped down every afternoon to shake hands with the old General, and take a look at the enemy, whose feathers were distinguishable with the aid of an opera-glass.

On the morning of the 25th a sortie was made by the Moristas, but they were driven back after capturing one prisoner, who gave them the not very encouraging information that the Government forces actually amounted to fifteen hundred men, with heavy artillery and fresh troops daily arriving. During all this time Mora was indefatigable in endeavoring to add to his means of defense, and by his presence among his soldiers prevented their becoming dispirited by inaction; and he frequently fired the heavy guns with his own hands. On the 6th the Government opened a desultory fire with their big guns, which however, did no execution. On the 27th they again advanced their position, throwing up earth works sufficiently close to annoy their opponents with their Minie rifles, and keeping up a brisk cannonade, which was as briskly returned. On the morning of the 28th Gen. Canas received information from a spy that the enemy had flanked him on the other side of the lagoon, and were making their way up opposite the town; and having no means on hand for a counter movement, sent word to Mora, advising him to evacuate the town, and that he would then capitulate. But Mora seemed infatuated, and begged him to hold out twenty-four hours longer. On that very evening, at about eight o'clock, the Government forces opened a heavy fire from their large guns, which was vigorously responded to by Canas. This lasted without interruption for about an hour, during which time I counted fifty random shots; when, under cover of the smoke and noise of artillery, the Government cavalry made a rush through the surf, flanked the barricade, and were behind it before the Moristas dreamed of the movement. A sharp struggle then ensued, lasting about fifteen minutes, but ended in the complete overthrow of the revolutionary party. You can form some idea of the struggle, when I inform you that the Government party acknowledged to 250 men killed and wounded.

Gen. Canas was the last man at the barricade, and loaded and fired the last gun himself; when, seeing that the battle was lost, mixed unseen among the opposite party, and cheering them on, actually led them into Punta Arenas, when, watching his chance, he darted into a house and stowed himself away.

While the fighting was going on at the barricade, a detachment of the Government troops, having, through the treachery of the Chileno boatmen, got possession of some canoes, crept up the lagoon, and ere any one had an idea of such a thing, they sprang ashore and rushed upon the Citadel, taking it by surprise, with but little resistance. Mora having barely time to escape by a back window. Balls, by this time, were flying about in all directions. Nowhere was one safe, for the houses, being built of wood, the balls whizzled through them as if they had been made of pasteboard. Meanwhile, the troops came rushing in like so many devils from the barricades, and indiscriminate slaughter commenced. Even Moristas were at once taken out and shot, while many others were taken on the wing as they were rushing to and fro. Houses were broken into and rifled, and foreign colors torn down and trampled upon. Both the English and American flags were thus treated, and the owners of the houses over which the flags waved were happy to escape by their back doors. Among the houses broken into was that of Crisanta Madina, agent of the Panama Railroad Company, and it seemed the soldiers were much disappointed in not finding young Madina, having had, it is said, orders to assassinate him during the excitement on Friday.

The town was taken on Saturday evening. Every effort was made to discover the hiding place of Mora and his adherents, who had escaped the massacre, but without avail. On Sunday, Canas gave himself up, and begged Blanco to shoot him and save Mora's life; but his prayer was unheeded, and it was afterwards determined to banish him.

At a late hour in the day, about 2 o'clock P. M., both Mora and Col. Arancibia gave themselves up, having suffered fearfully during their concealment, poor Mora having lain thirty-six hours in a pool of mire and water under Farrar's house. The excitement was intense when it became known that Mora had been taken, and deep interest was felt as to what would be his fate. They did not have to wait long, for, in half an hour a court-martial, composed of Blanco, Montealegre, and one or two others, condemned them both to be shot at 3 o'clock, allowing them only two short hours to prepare for death. They were led out for execution, both very haggard and worn from exposure, but perfectly composed. Indeed, Mora's step was firm, and his eye as bright as ever. On being shot, They were not allowed to come by side. Mora, having asked the privilege of being thus shot, and also begged that they would aim at his heart. They fell side by side; and Mora evincing signs of life, an officer shot him through the head with his revolver.

Things soon quieted down, and we had hoped that the butchery was over, when, on Tuesday, it was announced that Gen. Canas was to be shot, and at 9 A. M., on the 3d, the good old general was led out to execution. He was perfectly calm and cool, and sucked his cigarette till his fell pierced with a dozen balls. This was the last act of as bloody a tragedy as Central America has ever known.

The representatives of the Government having in their possession as prisoner Gen. Mora, the President's brother, Senor Canas, brother of the general, and wife, and several others, and thinking

Children's Column.

A STORY FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

MARION'S TEMPTATION.

"Mamma," said Marion Leslie one day, "do you know how soon I shall be thirteen years old?"

"Yes; in about three weeks," Mrs. Leslie answered.

"Exactly three weeks, mamma, counting from to-morrow. My birthday comes on the thirteenth of October, you know."

"And what of it?" asked Mrs. Leslie, looking down with a smile into the eager face upturned to hers.

"Why, mamma! I should like to have a birthday party so much. May I, mamma?"

The flushed cheek and pleading eyes were more eloquent than words, as Marion waited breathlessly for the answer, which her mother was somewhat slow in giving. She considered it thoughtfully for a minute or more; but presently she said:

"I had not thought of it before, Marion, but since you would like it so much, I think you may. On one condition, however," she added, as the little girl broke out with an exclamation of delight; "a hard condition, too,—nothing less than that you shall keep your temper for the whole time between now and your birthday, and not get into a single fit of passion during all the three weeks. Do you think you can undertake it?"

The little girl blushed deeply, and her eyes dropped before her mother's questioning look. She knew very well that this hasty temper was her besetting sin, which had made trouble for herself and unhappiness for her parents very many times in the course of her life. She was perfectly aware that it was a sin, and she really wished that she could conquer it; she had even made some efforts to do so, but because she could not succeed all at once, she grew impatient and discouraged, and declared that it was no use trying; she never could do any better. The excuse for all her passionate outbreaks and unreasonable angers was: "I can't help it, I'm sure. I have tried till it's no use trying any longer." And so she had grown worse and worse, more and more irritable and passionate, until it had become a matter of very great concern to her mother, who dreaded to see the child growing up with a fault which must certainly so much unhappiness upon herself and others. She waited anxiously for Marion's answer, for she thought that this eager wish of hers might be made an incentive to a real effort for the acquirement of self-control. But Marion was in no haste to reply. She looked up at last, and said, hesitatingly:

"Mamma, oughtn't one to be ashamed to do a thing just for the sake of a reward——?"

"And not because it was right? Certainly, if that were the only motive, we ought to be ashamed," Mrs. Leslie answered. "But I hope it would not be the only motive with you. Your desire for a party, by being often in your thoughts, may help you to be careful, but I hope that at the bottom of your heart you would rather break yourself of the fault than to have a dozen parties."

"So I would, mamma," Marion exclaimed earnestly; "and indeed I will try. Not for the sake of the party—though I want that very much, too," she added, with a smile.

"And I shall be most happy to give it to you," her mother said affectionately, "if the condition is fulfilled. I am sure it can be if you try the right way."

"If you will only help me, mamma," Marion began.

"God will help you, if you ask him; and that will be a great deal better than any help I could give you," was her mother's answer, so impressively spoken that Marion thought of it all the evening, and when she knelt down at night to say her prayers, she prayed more earnestly than she had ever done before for strength to resist her besetting sin.

She remembered it next morning, too, when she prayed, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil;" and throughout the long day at school, whenever she was in danger of losing her temper, she remembered her mother's words, and asked in her heart for the help that is "ever present in our time of need."

She felt very happy when she lay down to sleep that night. It was the first day in a great many days that had passed by without any outbreaks of anger or impatience, and she felt very glad and thankful, and also very much encouraged also to hope that she might really go safely through the whole three weeks. And if she did that, why then indeed she might hope to overcome the fault altogether, in time, to say nothing of the party, which was by no means a small consideration in the little lady's mind. She had it all planned in most delightful style, and had already decided what dress she meant to wear, and which of her schoolmates should be invited, and how there should certainly be ice-cream and any quantity of peaches by way of refreshment. And she felt asleep in the midst of her plans and anticipations, only to live them all over again in dreams.

This dream and she did not find her small part of her probation—and she did not find it very easy—was satisfactory by any means. The old temptation came back very strongly many times, and she did not always fight against the wicked feeling as well as the outward expression of it. She did not always, as at first, seek help from the only true source, and more than once she was only saved from some hasty speech or act which would have spoiled everything, by a warning look or word from her mother. The time passed by, however, and she managed to get through week after week, in a tolerably creditable manner, without any actual violation of the condition imposed. The birthday was close at hand, and Mrs. Leslie, who began to hope that Marion would really deserve her party, was making various preparations for it, in which Marion of course took a very lively interest.

She went to school in high spirits one morning, after trying on the pretty tucked muslin which she intended to wear, to see if it needed any alteration before being "done up" for the grand occasion. She had not ventured to speak of the party to her schoolmates before, for fear of some mishap or accident; but now it seemed so sure a thing, that she could not help telling it to two or three of her most intimate friends, and it was not long before half the school knew it, and were crowding round to congratulate her, or to put in a merry claim for an invitation. All this did not tend to make Marion watchful or careful. She felt very proud and self-satisfied, and every one knows that such a frame of mind is not the best for resistance to temptation. There were but two days before the thirteenth; the next day the invitations were to be given, and since she had got on so far, surely there could be no danger any longer!

But—was it because she felt so sure, or because she had not noticed that morning to be kept "this day without sin"—the danger came just when Marion was least watchful and least prepared.

It was at recess, and she had run in from the playground to find her handkerchief, which she had left in her desk. One of the little girls had been getting an inkstand filled, and was carrying it carefully to her own desk as Marion rushed in heedless and excited with play. The child's eyes were bent down, so that she did not see her schoolmate's approach in time to avoid her, and the consequence was a collision, in which half the contents of the inkstand were spilled over Marion's neat gingham dress.

It was fully as much her fault as little Hetty's if she was not even more to blame, being so much older. But without thinking of her own share in the accident, she grew angry instantly with the child, and broke out into passionate expressions of vexation.

"I couldn't help it, Marion; it was your fault any way; you can against me!" exclaimed Hetty indignantly.

"No such thing!" Marion answered hotly, forgetting every thing but the irritation of the moment. "It was all your carelessness, and now you want to put it on me, you little story-telling thing. Take that, now! I'll teach you how to say such things to me!" and in the sudden passionate impulse, she raised her hand and slapped Hetty violently on the cheek.

The child burst into tears, and Marion's hand fell, and her face, flushed with anger, grew pale suddenly, as the recollection of what she had forfeited flashed upon her. What would she not have given now to have recalled the last few moments! But that was impossible; she had openly violated her mother's condition, and there was nothing to be done now but to give up the party—after she had told all the girls about it, too! Oh! how could she bear such mortification as that!

It was a miserable afternoon at school, and a miserable evening at home. She could not bear to tell her mother what had happened, although she saw her going on with various preparations for the day, and knew that they ought to be stopped. Whenever her conscience urged her to the confession, it was put off with a "By-and-by," or "I'll wait till to-morrow;" and all the time was giving her to a subtle temptation that whispered, "What's the use of telling her, after all? It was such a little thing, and any body else would have done just the same in your place; and when you got on so well all of this time, it would be a shame to have to lose your reward at last for such a trifle as that. After you have told the girls, too—and they will all laugh at you so! Your mother need never find it out, and it would be the best thing for all to keep quiet about it. Of course it will be a lesson to you always, just the same, and that is all your mother cares for."

It was like an actual voice, the evil suggestions were so plain and clear; and if Marion had not been so willing to listen, she would have known that they were verily temptations of Satan, and have prayed with all her might to be delivered from them. But she only thought of her own disappointment and mortification, and not of the sin; and the end of it was, that she went to bed that night without telling her mother, satisfying her conscience by a half-promise to do it in the morning. It was harder than ever of course. Her mother was busy, and there was no opportunity to speak to her before she went to school. At least she was willing to think so, and she did not take pains to make an opportunity, but went off to school with the fault still unconfessed. When she came in the afternoon, her mother showed her a pile of neatly folded papers, each one directed to some friend or companion of Marion's.

"You may carry them to school and distribute them to-morrow," she said; "and I am very happy indeed, Marion, to think that you have fully deserved this pleasure."

Her words were so kind, her look so loving—how could Marion bear to tell her then that she was so unworthy of it all? She despised herself in her heart, but still she said nothing, and the next day she distributed the invitations amongst her schoolmates. After that, of course, it was too late to speak. The party must go on now, at any rate, and she might as well make the best of it.

But she had no pleasure in it, and every thing her mother did, and every kind word she said, added to the shame and misery she felt. She longed as much now to have the party over and done with as she had once longed for its time to come; and not even her pretty dress, with the broad sash and rosetted slippers, or the gay look of the parlors, all decorated with the green boughs and bright fall flowers, could take away the wretched feeling or make her forget for an instant how wicked she had been.

She forced herself to look happy, however, as her guests began to come; and as one niter another arrived, had the parlors grew full of laughing, merry children, she was obliged to go amongst them, and laugh and talk, and seem gay as the rest, until at last she began to enjoy the mirth and the games herself, and for a while her trouble was put out of her mind. But it was not long. One of the girls had left her fan up-stairs, and Marion went up to get it for her. But she wished she had not when she saw that Cornelia Green, little Hetty's sister, was there, without Hetty. She had just arrived, and was talking of her hood and cloak, and Marion of course had to stop to assist her, and to ask her why Hetty did not come, too, although it was very easy to guess the reason. Hetty never had spoken to her since the affair of the ink, or forgiven her for the blow, and nothing could have induced her to come to Marion's party. But still Marion asked: "why did not Hetty come?" and Cornelia answered with a toss of her head:

"Oh! it's no use asking that, Marion Leslie; you know as well as I do that Hetty wouldn't come to your party if she never went to one. She's been mad with you ever since you clapped her so hard the other day,—all for nothing, too, if I must say so, for it was your fault more than Hetty's that the ink was spilled."

It was not a very polite speech to make to one's hostess in her own house, but Cornelia Green was not celebrated for politeness, and she was glad of the opportunity to revenge Hetty. So she flirted out of the room, and as she went out at one door Mrs. Leslie came in at another, and Marion knew that she had heard it all, and the whole story would have to be told now.

I am not sure that she was not glad to be obliged to tell it, for certainly she had been miserable enough in her deceit and falsehood; and when Mrs. Leslie knew all, she saw that the punishment of her own deceitfulness was quite sufficient. Marion never had a birthday party again, but she learned two lessons from this that she never forgot—never to trust in her own strength to do any good thing, and never to think any thing worth having that must be gained by falsehood.

AMONG THE MOUNTAINS.

BY LUTHA FONTELLE.

It is a mountain eccao, and how sublime!
I've led my soul day after day, and week
Succeeding week, with its grandeur, yet
It sated not, but ever as I gazed
I spied new beauties, and a heavenly calm
Stole gently n'er the spirit's sea, whose waves
The rough winds of our trial-world had troubled.

O Nature! with thy truthful face cheering
The sad, lone heart, and bidding it look up
To its Creator and bless Him with love,
And yet with such confiding, holy hwe,
As fills the soul to fullness with a joy
Deep, warm, yet passionless,—do thou lesjire
My humble muse, and tune my lay, so that
In praising thee I Him may praise, Author
Of every beauty, every real good.

Here on a gentle eminence I stand,
The prospect hill of many visions bright
Which natere with her bountenus hand spread out
Before me, and with long enraptured gsze
Take le the extended view. Hills rise from hills
Unnumbered, and with plain and narrow vale
Of every graceful outline intercete,
The shoulders of the humbler servieg still
As steppieg stones to those aspiring higher,
Until dim distance, height'ning every charm,
Throwe over them a half pellucid veil
Of azere. A range of noble hills are theee.
Each varyieg in outline and in shade,
And yet together formieg, like the harp,
Gnitar, and inte, of sweetly veried toue,
A whole harmenious.

Here they are rounded
Gracefelly, and light and shade meet and embrece
In geetle mood, and softly sigh at parting.
There, proudly majestic they lift up their heeds,
And kiss the clouds as if they were their lellaws;
Nor grateful, deign to look upon the hille
From which they sprung.

Then they exteed themselves
Uncoethly, with their huge backs upralsed,
Eenrmous reptiles of the mammoth age
Resembling, as they basked in mid-day eau,
And feared nothing save Him who formed them,
And sources of enjoyment aed of food
Perchasce e'ee now their peers resolved.
Imbedded lay le that vast pile, thrown up
By some eouvulsion to tha light again.

And then they spriog abruptly, with a shede
Thrown here and there of euch fuuercal gloom,
It well might canopy the fabled path
That led from earth to Pluto's drear abode,
Which the brave Eneas trod, uncertain
Of his lived Creusa's fate, and of his eire's,
The young Telemachus, whuse mortal eyes
Its spirit-secrets saw, and safe returned
To tell the weedroue tale.

Aed varied all
In coveriog as in form; soms deneely clothed
With nohle forest-trees, the growth of uges;
And some hut sparsely with the stieted pine,
Or shrubby oak, dreary but picturesque.
These are the garments God gave to the hills,
Bidding them spring from their own surface,
And for the ready nourishment they drew
From natore's bosom, shielding her loved form
From the cold, ruthless blast, ar burning rays
Of Phoebus in midsummer, when the wheels
Of his resplendent chariat slowly roll
The zenith past.

But over nthers man
Has thrown the robe of cultivation;
And where once the Indian reared his hut,
And tanght his hardy sone to wield the bow,
And to endore pain, hunger, and fatigue,
Without complaint,—the ample farm-house stands,
By grateful fields encircled, which repey
With ample interest the science-guided heed,
Enrichieg them.

Bot see! the setting sun
That lingered all the day in the sweet vales,
And made them smile again to his bright smile,
That crested with his silvery sheen
The wavelets of the lake, a mirror now,
With emerald frame, leaves all these summor charms
To tenderly enfold the grand old age
Of the grey rocks that lift their white heads up,
Blanched by so many storms and the stow wasta
Of years. The deepeeing shadows slowly creep
In his bright pathway up the eastern hills;
And as he crowns with his departing smilee
Those furrowed brows, they vail the valley and Then haste to meet him there. But spirit-like,
His leaves the earth behind, and goes to finish
The cloud's white cheeks, and try his pencil's art
With gorgeous colors on ethcial canvas.
Those rainbow hoes have vanished like youth's dreams,
But in the light now fading momently,
We can discern that clear majestic grace,
That perfect symmatry of bold outline,
Which God's touch gave the ecene.

Aod these, a thousand hills,
That rise from one deep vale, and yet caress
As many valleys, glens and plains, that sleep
In their dark bosoms as confidingly
As gentle girlhood in her noble sire's,
Surpass in beauty and in majesty
Many a far-famed acane on nature's face.
I've gazed enraptured on the bold Highlands
Of our imperial Hudson, and with awe
Upon its lofty palisades reared by
No mortal hand; on noble forests, and
Vast plains, and thondering cataracts;
And unawares stole their grand images,
And laid them up as treasures for the mind,
And turned away reluctantly, with heart
Upraised to the great Former of them all.
Yet none can boast a sway so constant and
So purifying as these have exercised.
None have so gently drawn the heart from self,
Or wakened trust so firm in nature's God.
They must exert a calm, subduing power
O'er all who view them eveo unconsciously,
Ever refining and ennobling them.
Sure tendarer heerts or nobler never beat
In human bosoms, since man's fatal fall,
Than those before whose eyes this view extends,
For whom this living picture is hung up—
A treasure rare, a rich inheritance!

And next to God, to you, O hills, I poy
My grateful offering, humble but sincere,
For that rich stream of feeling pure and true,
That flows from their warm hearts through mine, and fills
To fullness the deep fount of gratitude.

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

This institution now contains about 60,000 volumes exclusive of a large number of pamphlets, and about 50,000 public documents. The annual appropriation is $5000 for miscellaneous and $2000 for law books. It was established during the administration of Jefferson, at his suggestion and by his exertions. It at first contained about 2500 volumes, and was destroyed by fire when the British burnt the capitol, in 1814. In the same year a resolution was introduced into Congress to purchase Mr. Jefferson's private library, which was passed, the books bought and brought to Washington, and the library of Congress again organized. Various valuable additions having been made from time to time, the library contained, in 1851, 55,000 volumes. During that year it accidentally caught fire, and 35,000 volumes were destroyed, and the room was very much injured. This accident finally resulted in the room being made perfectly fire-proof by constructing alcoves and shelves of cast iron. Soon after, an appropriation of $75,000 was made by Congress for the purchase of books. This fund was judiciously laid out, and a most excellent collection made of standard and rare works. During the recess of Congress the library is open thrice a week for the public.

THE RIVER OF SPEECH.

There flows a river through the earth,
From hills of heaven it hath its birth;
Through all the lands that stream hath gone,
For men to float their thoughts upon.

Some send rich fleets of myrrh and gold,
Ships ergosied with gems untold;
And though the mee upon the shore
Bind them upon their hearts, the store,
Like prophet's oil, grewe mere and more.

And some send flowers from fiery lands,
That float in little children's hands;
And some—alas! that this should be—
Send ships, that sail to meet the sea,
Beneath the pirate's flag of black,
With wreck and rapine on their track.

And some send idle strews alone;
And some rich seeds, that may be sown
In quiet creeks; for they will rise
Dear flowers to adding hearts and eyes.

And some send holy words that shed
A strange light on the river's bed—
A light so steady, earnest, fair,
You almost think God's stars are there.

Long years ago, past ships and stars,
A fleet sailed through the Eastern bars,
And on the wave a heavenly spell,
A silent consecration fell;
The stream grew holy as it bore
Christ's spoken thoughts from shore to shore.

THE BLIND BOY.

The other day, I went to see a little blind boy. The scarlet fever settled in his eyes, and for many months he has not seen at all. He used to be a sprightly little fellow, upon the run every where. "Well, my dear boy," I said, "this is hard for you, is it not?" He did not answer for a minute, then he said, "I don't know as I ought to say hard; God knows best;" but his lip quivered, and a little tear stole down his cheek.

"Yes, my child, you have a kind heavenly Father, who loves you and feels for you more even than your mother does." "I know it, sir," said the little boy, "and I'll comforts me." "I wish Jesus was here to cure Frank," said his little sister; "Jesus cured a good many blind men when he was on earth, and I am most sure he would cure Frank." "Well," said I, "he will open little Frank's eyes to see what a good Saviour he is. He will show him that a blinded heart is worse than a blind eye, and he will wash his heart in his own blood, and cure it, and make him see and enjoy beautiful heavenly things, so that we may sit here and be a thousand times happier than many children who are running about."

"I can't help wishing he could see," said Lizzie. "I dare say," said I, "but I hope you don't make Frank discontented." "Frank isn't discontented," said Lizzie, earnestly; "he loves God. And love sets every thing right, and makes its own sunshine; does it not, Frank?" "I don't feel cross now," said the blind boy, meekly; when I'm alone, I pray, and sing my Sobbath-school hymns, and sing, and sing, and God's in the room, and it feels light, and—and—I forget I'm blind at all;" and a sweet light stole over his pale features as he spoke; it was heavenly light I was sure. I went to pity and comfort him, but I found God had gone before me. The great God who has a thousand worlds to take care of did not overlook him, but with his heart of love came and turned his mourning into joy, his darkness into light, and made him to his mistortunce as happy as a child can be. Oh! God can do more and better for us than we can ask or think.

THERE IS ROOM UP STAIRS.—We once saw it stated of the late Daniel Webster, that when a young man asked his opinion as to the propriety of studying law, and remarked that he believed the profession was much crowded, he replied, 'There's always room up stairs." True enough. The ground floors of every profession are crowded almost to suffocation, but there's plenty room up stairs. Young men, do you understand? Stop on the lower floors, and you will be crowded and starved to death; go up stairs, and you will find good company, good cheer, plenty room and fine prospects. It is true of lawyers, doctors, preachers, teachers, authors, artisans, farmers and all. Go up stairs, and be at the top of the profession. Plenty room there.

HOW PRAYER BECOMES EASY.—When a pump is frequently used, but little pains are necessary to have water—the water poure out the first stroke, because it is high. But if the pump has not been used for a long time, the water gets low, and if you want it, you must pump a long while and the water comes only after great efforts. It is so with prayer; if we are instant in prayer, every little circumstance awakens the disposition to pray, and desires le dimcult are always ready. But if we neglect prayer it low. [illegible] in the well gets

At the breaking of the ground for the commencement of the Lynchburg and Tennessee Railroad at Lynchburg, a clergyman solemnly and slowly read a manuscript prayer, at the conclusion of which an old negro man, who had been resting one foot on his spade and his arms on the handle, looking intently in the chaplain's face, straightened himself up, and remarked very audibly: "Well, I reckon dat's de first time de Lord's ever been writ to on de subjic ob railroads."

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MR. CHRISTIAN GRENES, aged 42 years, died at his residence, on 7th September, 1860. He was a native of Germany, but emigrated to the United States when he was about seventeen years of age, and settled in the State of Louisiana, in the parish of Livingston, where he became a merchant of some considerable notoriety. He was considered to be a man of great industry and application to the business affairs of this life, and was a man of great probity, and a man whose death has created a stagnation in the place in which he lived—Ponchetonla Depot. Yet he had lived, as too many others have done, without religion; although a firm believer to the Bible, yet he did not attend to its holy precepts, but procrastinated his return to God, to some future period. His mind was so taken up with business, that he has but little time to devote to the sacred duties of religion. He was a man, notwithstanding greatly devoted to his family, and had a great desire to give his children a liberal education. No man, perhaps, was more interested to have his children religiously educated than he was, and in many other respects his course was a praiseworthy one; and thus he lived until he was brought upon a sick bed, when he manifested a very serious concern for his future well being. His wife, who is a member of the Methodist Church, felt the utmost interest for his salvation, and exhorted him to pray fervently in the Lord, that, for Christ's sake, he would have mercy upon him. He replied to her request by saying that he did pray all the time. There were some things that lay with more weight upon his mind than others; he seemed deeply convicted for having desecrated the Sabbath, and implored the Divine forgiveness, and promised, if he lived, he would never desecrate it again. His sickness progressed with very unfavorable symptoms, until he began to think he must die, when he seemed to have the grace of God so fully imparted to him, that he became resigned to the divine will, and requested his wife to put her trust in God, and that he was happy, and Jesus could make a dying bed as soft as downy pillows are. He requested his wife to tell the writer of this obituary notice that he had found peace with God, and that he was going to the better world.—After this great change, he frequently spoke of how soft he had felt, and how easy he was, and how comfortable he felt. He was perfectly rational all the time, and gave satisfactory evidence with his latest breath, that he is gone from the evil to come, and gone to the paradise of God. May the Lord bless his family, and give them grace, that they may meet him in heaven.

JOHN MATTHAWA.

MRS. INDIANA A., consort of Mr. F. H. Darsey, and daughter of Rev. John Sample, M.D., was born July 25th, 1838, in Copiah county, Miss., and died in Franklin county, Miss., Sept. 15th, 1860. She joined the M. E. Church, at Pisgah, Claiborne county, Miss., giving her hand to Rev. John C. Johnson, of precious memory, when only 11 years old. She never forgot the importance of the step she had taken; she lived a consistent christian. The pleasures of youth had no attractions for her.—She grew up in Christ her living head; and in her passage through the "valley and shadow of death," she "feared no evil." Just a week before she died she was in Meadville, and joined with her sisters in their prayer-meeting, and was greatly blessed; and while they were singing, "I have a mother on the happy shore," she took her dear sister by the hand, while her countenance reflected the joys of salvation, and said, "Don't turn back, and you'll get over." While sinking in death, she was very happy; exhorted her husband to meet her in heaven; and when her dear sisters and friends were weeping around her couch, she tried to console them by saying, "We'll all meet in heaven." She tried to sing, "Hallelujah, hallelujah! I'm on my journey home." She exclaimed, "Religion is a fortune;" "I'm going home to die no more." This is only a small portion of the history of that solemn but glorious scene.

WILLIAM BRACK.—The subject of this notice died in great peace at his residence in Caddo parish, on the morning of the 26th September, aged 67. Born, I think, in Onslow county, N. Carolina; spent the early part of his life in Burk county, Ga.; was converted in Montgomery county, Alabama; from thence he removed to Talladega, in the same State, where he lived for years, and will be remembered gratefully by many a traveling preacher. Some ten or twelve years since he removed to this parish. In many respects he was a model man, pious and uniformly consistent in his profession; he served the Church for many years as steward. Many of the traveling preachers will bear witness to his efficiency in that important relation. He has left a wife and two daughters to lament his loss, beside a host of friends. Honor to his memory.

Its beautiful and healthful location in the midst of a community noted for its refined and christian character; its admirably arranged and neatly furnished Boarding House; together with its experienced and skilful Faculty, present such an imposing array of advantages as justly entitle it to be styled a "School of the highest grade and a delightful home."

Many of our patrons were present at the recent Examination; and all, as far as we can learn, were delighted with the school and all its arrangements.

During the past year there were two hundred and twenty in attendance.

Parents may rest assured that the Boarding House will be conducted in the best style.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

Shanghai, China, July 24th, 1860.

Ma. Editor—To continue from the last communication, which left us at the west gate of Qun San, a walled city. We entered the city without any difficulty, and gave out a number of tracts and Testaments as we passed along the street, gazed at by crowds who thronged the streets in every direction, and all seemed busily engaged in moving. We proceeded on, and ascended the hill by a flight of stone steps; one side of the hill is a mass of cragged rocks, and the whole hill has the appearance of having been thrown up by the powerful working of some inward irresistable force bursting forth from its confinement. It presents quite an odd appearance from its summit, where no other elevation can be seen for many miles around. It is, as usual, crowned with temples and a pagoda. We found here some two or three priests, and getting a few persons around me, I talked to them of heaven and of Jesus, and of the folly of believing in idols, the work of men's hands, for salvation from eternal death. The Priest makes a kitchen of one corner of his temple. They were preparing their meal when I went in, but they listened very attentively when I warned them of their danger if they continued to persist in their worship of dumb idols. I noticed here in the crevice of some rocks, on the summit of the mountain, that there are some three stone gods, and they are supposed by the Chinese to uphold the great stones above them, and prevent them from crushing to pieces the mountain beneath them.

We returned to our boats and left Qun-San for the city of Ta-Trong, about twelve miles distant. All along on our way we could see many poor people fleeing from the city of Soo-Chan. Frequently we saw imperial soldiers passing on on horseback, fleeing before the rebels. We reached the city of Ta-Trong about four o'clock in the afternoon, and after getting a number of books for distribution we entered the city at the west gate without any difficulty, and passed on through quite a wide street for some distance without seeing the first shop of any importance. It is not a city of much trade. The meaning of the name of the city is "great plenty." Its ancient name was changed by the Emperor of China, on an occasion of a great famine. In the main street of the city, which is about ten feet in width (this is wide for China), I preached to quite an interesting crowd of men, women and children. All were very quiet and treated us very kindly, and I am persuaded treated us with much more civility than probably we would have been received in some parts of our own Christian land. We walked on a little farther and, not seeing anything of interest, we returned to our boats. When we got to the gate of the city, we found that several Mandarins had already arrived, probably to give orders not to admit any strangers. However, we were not disturbed. When we arrived at the boat, we found that in the mean time great numbers of Nankin poor people had arrived, many of whom were in a wretched condition. We tried to relieve their wants by giving them some cash, for which they seemed to be very grateful. Many soldiers had arrived in small boats, which had been pressed into their service. We left the city of Ta-Trong and passed the night at a large village, six miles from the city. On Saturday morning, 26th, by eight o'clock we were at the walled city of Kar-ding, six miles distant from the village where we had passed the night. The western suburb of the city was crowded with country people bringing in their produce. We passed on to the gate, and as we entered I heard some one say, "we will not examine them." We took no notice of this and went on, but as we passed in through the second arch of the gate, a number of soldiers rushed out and spread their arms before us, saying, "you can go no farther." One of them looked rather savage, and his eyes seemed almost to flash fire as he placed himself before us. The others were calm. I tried to reason with him, by saying we had not been refused entrance to much more important cities than this, and why should we be refused here? He said with a stern voice "I have my orders not to let any foreigners pass in at this gate, Chinese or foreigners." and him we only wanted to pass in at this gate and out at the south gate, to preach on that gate, but you [illegible] through the city." I told him he had [illegible] drinking too freely; he said, "I have not touched a drop, but I have my orders." He was quite right, and I did not wish to oppose him; so we bid them good morning, turned back through the gate, and passed outside of the city to the southern gate. There I preached to a large congregation, and gave them a number of Christian books. One man to whom I gave a copy of the New Testament said to one of his friends, "I have been for a long time begging a large book, and this is the first I have ever received; how glad I am to get it." I hope it was because he was interested for his soul's salvation. We found the people here very rude, and used a great deal of abusive language, calling us all kinds of wicked names. I did all I could to treat them kindly, and point them to Jesus as an all-sufficient Saviour. But Satan hath blinded their eyes, and their understandings are darkened through many-fold transgressions and sins.

We passed through a large village called Nay-zian about ten o'clock. There are, I suppose, about forty thousand inhabitants in this place. I have preached here on former occasions a number of times. About one hour after passing this village we passed a smaller one of some ten thousand inhabitants. Here I preached to a large crowd on the street and gave them some books. One man who seemed to be of influence among the people, came up to us and acknowledged the truth of what was said, and invited us to take tea with him in a shop close by where we stood. We did not accept, as the day was far spent and we wished to get on to Shanghai. All were very kind and pleasant. No one showed any evil disposition.

We reached Shanghai after night, and made the best of our way to our houses through a heavy rain. I found Shanghai in a great state of excitement and alarm. The people were fleeing in every direction to the country, seeking places of refuge. The next day after my return I was surprised, on going into the city, to see so much confusion. The Refugee soldiers were being taken into custody as fast as they came, and the authorities began immediately to decapitate them. Probably there was never more injustice shown to any one, than to some of these poor sufferers.

The next week after I arrived, Shanghai was the theater of many a bloody scene. The heads of dead men were seen suspended from the wall of the city in many places, and also in the neighborhood of the city, to strike terror into the hearts of all who should see them. But, in his judgment, they were pursuing the very plan to cause rebellion among their own soldiers. It has already been the case to a great extent in the taking of the city of Soo-Chan. Fortunately for us all, such a promiscuous slaughter was forbidden by the English and French, who have guards stationed in and around the city.

Since my arrival in Shanghai the insurgents have taken most of the cities from which I have just returned, and they have been within ten miles of Shanghai and are only deterred from coming to this important port for fear of foreign force. Each day brings us news of their success over the Imperial forces and now some of the most important cities are in their hands. They are anxious to be on friendly terms with foreigners. They call us foreign brothers, and are anxious to be taught more plainly concerning the Christian religion. I refer you to the "China Herald," printed in Shanghai. They evidently have a great many errors in their belief, which will have to be corrected when Missionaries have access to them. Some Missionaries have already visited them, but the Insurgents were so much employed in making conquests, that they found it impossible to attend to the observance of the doctrines of Christ as they desired, not having the time. Idols are all demolished, or so mutilated as to render them unfit for use. It greatly astonishes us to see the energy of the Insurgents, and to see them so free and frank. They readily confide in foreigners, and shake hands with you in real foreign style. What will yet be the result of this rebellion we cannot foresee. God can bring order out of confusion, and we trust he will so order everything that His name may be glorified and this people saved from eternal death.

J. W. Lamuth.

Shanghai, August 1, 1860.—No news from the North in reference to the movements of the English and French. On the morning of the 30th of July a battle was fought between the Imperialists and the Insurgents in which the Imperialists were defeated with great loss, though they had some two hundred Manilla men and Americans and some of other nations to aid them. Many of the wounded are now in Shanghai. It is reported that there are foreigners with the Insurgents. Of course these are all lawless men who go only for the money and endanger the lives of peaceable foreigners. We know not what will be the end of all this, but we trust God will overrule all to the glory of his name. Ward, the accomplice of Walker, is at the head of the Imperial forces.

SOMETHING ABOUT PASQUIN.

In 1544, there appeared a thick but small volume, with the title, "Two volumes of Pasquinades," purporting to be printed at Eleutheropolis, or the city of Luther. Its 537 pages contained not only Pasquin's sayings, but the satire of many other persons, and no book of the day was more hated by the church than this. Nearly all the copies were gathered and burnt, but several escaped, and are now in the public libraries of this country and Europe. From this time forth, Pasquin's fame became world-wide, and the words, Pasquil or Pasquinade, were adopted at once into almost every tongue.

The morning after Sixtus V. was elected, (he ruled from 1585 to 1590,) Pasquin's statue was adorned with a plate of tooth-picks, and to Marforio's question, what he was doing with them? he replied, "I am carrying them to Alexander, Medicis, and Ristincucci," the three cardinals who had been deceived by their making him pope, and they could now pick their teeth at their leisure, for their pains!

Leti, in his life of this most incredible of the popes, says, that one morning Pasquin appeared in a very dirty shirt, and on being asked by Marforio, why he wore such foul linen, he replied, he could get no other, for the pope had made his washer-woman a princess, meaning his sister Camilla, who had been a laundress, but was now established with a fortune and a palace! This stinging bit of raillery led the pope to offer a reward of a thousand pistoles and the life of the offender, if the author would reveal himself, but he threatened to hang him, if he found him out otherwise. The author was silly enough to discover himself, received his reward, and got his tongue bored through and his hands cut off, for his pains! This deed filled Rome with the utmost horror.—A few days thereafter Pasquin appeared holding a wet shirt drying in the sun. It was on Sunday morning, and Marforio begged to know why he broke the Sabbath in that way. Pasquin replied, there was no time to be lost, for if he waited till next day, he might have to pay for the sunshine, in allusion to the heavy window taxes which they had so long borne.

The most poetic of all pasquinades, one in which wit rises into imagination, was in the pontificate of Urban VIII., who ruled from 1623 to 1644. The pope issued a bull, excommunicating all persons who took snuff at Seville in Spain. Pasquin quoted Job xiii, 25: "Contra folium, vento pupitor ostendis potentiam tuam, et stipulam siccam perse queris?" Again when Pope Innocent X., abandoned his person, his dignity and his government to Olympia Maldachini, the widow of his brother, Pasquin said: "Magis amat Papa Olympiam quam Olympiadem," or in other words, that "the pope loves Olympia more than heaven (Olympus)." Novaes, the historian, states that nobody would bury him, not even Olympia, and that it was with difficulty he got into the ground at all.

In 1686, when Bishop Burnet was traveling in Italy, he relates, that Molinos, the Spanish priest, the founder of the sect of the Quietists, was very obnoxious to the papal court, that his books were condemned by the inquisition, and that he was compelled to renounce sixty-eight of his propositions, and then condemned to perpetual imprisonment. Burnet, in relating this case, says that he had seen, all in one week, one man condemned to the galleys for what he had said, another hung for something he had written, and Molinos clapped in prison, for insisting that all men ought to bring their minds to a state of inward quietness. Pasquin then spoke as follows, "Si parliamo, en galere; si scrivemmo, impiccati; si stamo in quiete, all' Sant' Ufizio; Eh, che bisogna fare?" "If we speak, we are hustled off to the galleys; if we write, to the gallows; if we keep quiet, to the inquisition; what must we do then, hey?"

When the luxurious Pius VI. was building the Braschi palace, Pasquin said of him: "Cerberus has three mouths to bark with, but you have three, my lord, which bark not, but devour," alluding to his voracious habits in seizing upon every antiquity he could lay his hands on. He repaired the ancient monuments, and boastingly wrote on the pedestals, "Munificentia Pii Sexti." In a season of dearth at Rome, the bakers reduced the size of the loaves, when Pasquin held up one of these loaves, bearing the inscription: "By the munificence of Pius VI." Pasquin is more in his element at Rome, at this moment, than ever, especially since the capture of Lamoriciere. "It is not the German that is grinding the yoke into the skin of the Roman's neck now; it is the Frenchman, and Pasquin speaks no more Latin, no more German, no more Italian, but babbles out his sarcasms in French. He drops the s in Napoleon's name, and makes it read Appolyon, the destroyer. Lamoriciere and Goyon are butts of his ridicule, as well as Pio Nono, and Antonelli, the latter of whom he makes a little Mark Antony. Here is a conversation between Marforio and Pasquin on recent events:

Marforio.—Apollyon wants to know why you hate Lamoriciere so heartily.

Pasquin.—Because he brought death here yesterday (la mort ici hier.)

Marforio.—Well—won't Goyon suit?

Pasquin.—We have no use for a coward (coion).

Marforio.—Do you want Pio Nono again?

Pasquin.—No, no (Nono)—we want no pawn (Pion) to be played by Appolyon. Nine of them have been quite enough for Rome!

Marforio.—But Garibaldi?

Pasquin.—Ah, yes, yes, Garibaldi forever, for he will bring Em-manuel!—Balt. Patriot.

LIFE IN SWITZERLAND.

The taste and skill of the Zurichers in the mechanic arts is not less decided, and the hum of industry is heard literally in all her borders. The manufactures are not crowded into one corner of a great city, but occupy the leisure hours of those who live in the country. Especially is this the case in the weaving of silk. All those beautiful fabrics, which now equal those of any part of the world, are produced in the cottages scattered over hill and dale, and by those who perhaps work in the field in summer and weave silk in the winter, or devote the leisure hours of every season to this light and tasteful labor.

First, you must see the weavers, who wear a white linen cap, ornamented with glass beads on both sides, and tied under the chin with a velvet ribbon. A short, blue jacket, with light blue boddice, on which appears the letter V, wrought, or formed with colored velvet ribbon. What the letter signifies we do not know, and they do not know themselves.

The house is of two stories, built first of timbers, and then a wall of coarse bricks or stones, covered with plaster. On the first floor are a sitting room, two small rooms, and a kitchen. These are finished with panels, painted a light green, looking beautifully neat. The most conspicuous object is the great stove of potter's work, veneered and painted, and wrought into three walls, so as to spread its genial influence in every apartment below and above. These stoves are every where at the North, and very comfortable when thoroughly heated night and day, but require much wood, and in the mild weather of spring or autumn not very economical, unless permitted to remain cold, which is often the case!

Under the windows are long wooden benches, and before these the table, set around with wooden chairs. The unfailing chest, with its various compartments, is near, and on it a tin pail, and copper wash-basin; a hook-shelf is suspended over, and on a nail at its side a towel and a brush. On a little table in the corner is the folio family Bible, and upon two nails over the door rests the family gun, polished to brightness. The next article is a curious relic of the olden times, and here we are able to state exactly what marked the times as old. When they use this term, they mean the age of oatmeal pudding made so thick that the spoon would stand upright in the center. These are the days their grandmothers still remember, and the great wooden spoon hangs by a string to the wall, as does also the bread-knife, with the initials of the heads of the household thereon, and the date of their marriage. It is a curious article on which to preserve the record of so important an event; but being the one they would oftenest have to use, it is not, on the whole, so inappropriate. A slate, an almanac, a looking-glass, and a pair of scales, occupy their wonted posts, and in accordance with their humble offices, the cat's dish, the cradle, and standing-stool. Under the stove are the mocccpied shoes and play-things, and in the most honorable positions, pictures from the Bible, Swiss history, and the never-to-be-forgotten Black Forest clock.

Near the window is the loom. Does it seem marvelous how one of those beautiful and delicate tissues of green, or gold, or purple, can come forth from the midst of such a medley without spot or blemish? We can only answer, that we wonder all the same, though everything is remarkably neat. The loom is like any other, except that it is more light and delicate in its construction. The reed through which the warp is drawn, is fine as gossamer, and the shuttle for the filling might answer for a fairy. The web goes underneath, and winds on a beam like any other web, of tow or of more plebeian pretensions. The threads break, and fingers which are not at all fairy-like tie them together with marvelous celerity, and we watch the cheeks and stripes or figures form with never-ceasing interest and amazement.

These are the homes, and the happy hours, of free and industrious people, who may be said to lack nothing that is absolutely necessary to comfort and happiness. There is none of the abject poverty which is seen in exclusively manufacturing districts, and none of the luxury attendant upon suddenly acquired and immense fortunes.

CLERICAL ELOCUTION.

We were so well pleased with an article in the Home Journal on "Clerical Elocution," that we extract the following:

1. Every clergyman should prepare himself by special and regular study for the various services of each Sunday in the year, so that he shall perfectly understand what he is to read and how to read it.

2. To decide the question of audibleness, let every clergyman have a friend stationed in a somewhat distant part of his church, the duty of which friend shall be to give sole attention to hearing; and if he fails to hear every word, let him report the fact to his pastor, and specify what was unintelligible.

3. Let every clergyman, in private, read aloud what he has to read in public, and whatever may at first be the necessary outlay of patient toil, let him discipline himself, compel himself, to bring his reading utterances down to the simplicity of his own natural conversational tones. And when he afterward enters the church, let him divest himself of that unfortunate preconceived notion which so many clergymen entertain as a matter of course, that his own natural voice is not suited to religious services.

4. When a clergyman is reading the Lessons, let him remember that he is reading the Lessons, and keep his eyes immovably on the Bible. There are many who, in this part of the service, seem to be practising on the problem, how much they can repeat while looking away from the book? and that really seems to be their chief object, without any reference to the words they are pronouncing, or the effect the words may produce. At any rate, no man can read well who divides his attention between the book and the congregation.

5. At whatever sacrifice of cadence, Antoqotion, or other particular of ornamental elocution—supposing such sacrifices involved—never allow the last word, or the several concluding words of a sentence, to be dropped to an inaudible whisper. The universality of this fault is amazing. Even clergyman of long experience, and who are aware of the frequency of the fault, and who have temporarily cured themselves of it, will still perpetually relapse into it.

6. Always keep command of the voice; do not let the feeling run away with it. If occasion calls for a loud utterance, never go to the full extent of the voice; always keep some in reserve; otherwise the voice will be liable to crack and even if it does not, the fact that the utmost power is exerted is always obvious and painful to a congregation, and such effort is inconsistent with, and destructive of true elocution. It belongs neither to nature nor art. And especially avoid this loudness in sonorous words, or words suggestive of sound. "At the voice of thy thunder they are afraid," is often abused to the extent of a poor imitation of thunder; but it is a nice elocutionary point in that and similar passages, to take the opposite course, and by a subdued tone to indicate a fear of the thunder.

7. Never, in any declamatory flight in the pulpit, allow the voice to rise and fall in consecutive words from a high to a low note, and in repeated alternation. That is a sort of zig-zag style that nothing can justify.

8. Be very cautious, in moments or passages of excitement, in the pulpit, about letting the hand come down on the Bible, or its cushion, or its surroundings, with violence and noise. A loud, vehement slap with the hand is one of the tricks of secular oratory, but is always out of place in a church. It adds no force to the words of a sermon.

And finally and in pursuance of the last-mentioned topic—violence, either of [illegible] do not saw the air too much with your hand; but use all gently. For in the very torrent, tempest, and—as I may say—whirlwind of your passion, you must acquire and beget a temperance that may give it smoothness."

AN ADVENTURE IN THE CATACOMBS.

The Paris catacombs, once visited by all the strangers who came sight seeing to the French capital, and afterwards closed to the public as unsafe, are, as most people are doubtless aware, old quarries, extending under a portion of the Faubourg St. Germain—the streets of La Harpe, Saint Jacques, Vaugirard, and others, and also under the Pantheon, Observatory, the Odeon theatre, and other large buildings. The roof or crust of these vast vaults is, as may be imagined from the weight it supports, of great thickness and solidity, but in certain places it is comparatively thin. It was about 1785 that the catacombs first received human remains. A quantity of bones were removed thither from the charnel house of the Innocents. During the revolution of 1789 they served as burial places to numerous victims, and from 1792 to 1811 large quantities of bones were deposited in them, taken from churches that were pulled down and from cemeteries that were closed. Three staircases lead into the catacombs. Great precautions have, of course, been taken to prevent any falling in of the ground, and the place is watched and kept in repair.—Two days ago a M. Kutery, one of the guardians, wishing to have a lock changed in one of the galleries, went down with a locksmith, his apprentice, and an architect. Carrying a lighted candle, he conducted these three persons to a distance of more than a quarter of an hour's walk from the entrance. Incredible as it appears, the candle was unprotected by a lantern, and none of the party had matches! They had scarcely reached the spot where they were to work when a puff of air extinguished the light. In the dark there was little hope of retracing their steps, for the turns and windings were numerous. It was more likely they would get deeper into the labyrinth. Nevertheless, Kutery, judging that from the point where they were it was impossible anybody could hear them, bade his companions follow him, and sought his way out. But after groping for several hours in profound darkness he felt it was a hopeless case, so he called a halt, and the four men strained their lungs in shouting for help. Hour after hour passed, and no answer came, or sound replied. At last, towards two o'clock in the morning, when they had been for eleven hours in this immense subterranean graveyard, when they were exhausted by fatigue and hunger, and tormented by the fear of being forgotten, they suddenly heard a voice inquiring what they were doing there. Some matches were thrown down to them, and the candle was lighted. They found they were just below the street of Hungary Troain. It appeared that a compositor, going to his home in that street at the still hour of two A. M., heard faint cries, which seemed to come from beneath his feet. In the noisy day-time they would have been inaudible. Unable to account for the phenomenon, he hurried off to the nearest police station, whence some sergens de ville accompanied him to the spot. These men knew that the catacombs passed under that street, and it was through a draught-hole nearly opposite to the compositor's house that they were able to communicate with the prisoners.

THE TYROLESE PROVERB.

The Tyrolese have a proverb,

"God has his plan
For every man,"

which expresses an important truth. In the course of Napoleon's wars, he decreed that the Tyrol should belong to Bavaria instead of Austria, and sent a French and Bavarian army to conquer the country. The Tyrolese determined to resist, and arranged signal piles of combustible materials upon the most conspicious mountain tops, which were to be fired upon the approach of the enemy, and thus spread the alarm.—Directly on their line of march was a village in which lived a soldier's widow and her crippled son about fifteen years of age. Hans often mourned that he was so useless, and when all others were busy in preparations for defense, it grieved him that he must be idle. His mother strove to cheer him with the assurance that he was useful to her; but the bitterness of his grief refused the comfort, and he exclaimed, "Why was I made, mother?" "Hush, Hans," replied she, "you know these repining thoughts are wrong. You will yet live to find the truth of our old proverb—

"God has his plan
For every man."

Not long afterward, the Eastern holidays came on, and the people forgot their danger in the sports. One night Hans awoke suddenly, with a strong impression that the French were coming. He arose, and strolled up the mountain path to the signal pile, which he found deserted by its watchers, and he walked around it to a hollow pine tree in which the timber was laid ready for instant service.

Just then he was startled by a slow and stealing tread, then the click of muskets, and then he saw two soldiers move carefully along the hill, and seeing no one, signal to their comrades in the distance. He at once comprehended the danger, and forgetful of himself, he fired the timber and flung the blazing turpentine brand into the pile, which was instantly in flames. The two soldiers were taken by surprise, and for a moment knew not what to do; but seeing no one but Hans running down the path, they fired, and lodged a ball in his shoulder; but it was too late; the country was alarmed, and the enemy were obliged to beat a hasty retreat.

Poor bleeding Hans made his way to the village, when he fell, faint, and almost dying, amid the mustering crowd, whose most anxious inquiry was—"Who lighted the pile?" "I did it—the French were there.—Take me to my mother—at last I have not been useless." They bore him to her, and as she bowed over him in anguish, he exclaimed—"Do not weep for me now, dear mother, I am happy. It is true,

'God has his plan
For every man.'

You see he had it for me, though we did not know what it was.

He lived long enough to know that he had saved his country, and died with the blessings of thousands on his head.

Thus is it with us all.

There is a work for us somewhere, though we may be weak and crippled.

It was a noble thing for him to light the pile at the peril of his life, and we love him for it; and so it is a noble thing to act well our part in any sphere, and such will always be loved.

HEROISM AND LEADERSHIP.

The two great maritime disasters which occurred so recently, both presented examples of heroism. The captain of the Lady Elgin, mindful of the responsibilities of his position, after every other self-sacrifice for the safety of his passengers, added the surrender of his life, when within reach of shore. He would be the last to leave the ship—the last to leave the raft when it struck upon the rocks, and he had his way, which was better than life.

When the steamer Connaught was about sinking, the captain of the little brig which came to her assistance lashed his vessel to the foundering wreck, that no chance of the waves might separate them, until his work of mercy was completed. "Aye, aye," he sung out, "I'll stand by as long as there's a soul on her," and so saying and doing, he saved 200 persons from an ocean grave.—The Troy Times, referring to these facts, states that the names of both captains were alike, John Wilson, a curious coincidence, if true.

It is a glorious memorial that a man died in any station, rather than desert his post of duty, especially when he is a leader. The responsibility of leadership is peculiar, and peculiarly great. The true captain is like the "true shepherd, who giveth his life for the sheep." The hero is unealculating. Not only is his personal safety less to him than that of any other—it is last of all.—This is instinctively recognized by all who follow him. What is their trust, their committal, their clinging to him, but a recognition that he is the man who, having been endowed by the Almighty to be their leader, is also endowed to die, if need be, in their place. Without irreverence, we may refer to the highest example, as an illustration of every man's duty who leads the van in the all sirs of life.

Is the application doubtful or difficult? Is it quixotic or chimerical? It is at least generally appreciated. Men are fond of the rewards of rank and popularity, but they shrink from the highest reward of all. Yet we have another evidence of the validity of this obligation, in the instinctive shame and blame with which not observe any [illegible] a shipwreck reaches us, in which the only survivors are among the officers and crew. We feel this to be exactly wrong, and despise those who saved themselves on such terms. On the other hand, when we hear that boat after boat is saved, and among those who went down was the commander, although we sympathize with him and the more regret his loss, we acknowledge the glory of the impulse which kept him at his post until the last, and cry "well done!"

Ruskin, in a late article, speaking of the duty and celebrity of soldiership, denies that soldiers are distinguished because killing is their trade, but to be killed, and insist that we pay them homage for that, whether we know it or not. He extends the parallel, and argues that a similar heroism is not only practicable, but obligatory upon all classes of men, professional, mechanical and mercantile. The inference, susceptible of a full defense, is, that duty, rather than gain or pleasure, should be the standard in every avocation of life.

THE CHINESE REBELS—THEIR RELIGION.

By the last arrival from China, we have the interesting news that three American Missionaries had visited Foo-Chow, and that on their way they spent some time at Kawn-Shan, the first out-post of the rebels. The chiefs whom they saw were mostly Kwangsi men with whom the movement originated.

The missionaries took pains to inform them that they had no other purpose than to ascertain their religious sentiments, having no political object whatever. The chiefs conversed very freely but modestly. The missionaries were much pleased with them. They did not manifest the usual arrogance of Chinese, but made the impression of men comparatively noble and intelligent.

They said that their views might not be correct in all things, but that they were decidedly Christians. "They believed in one true God, the heavenly Father, and in his Son Jesus Christ, the Savior of the world, and in the Holy Spirit the sacred intelligencer." They declare that it is their "mission" to destroy idolatry. When they take a place their King marches with a number of adherents to the temples, and personally pronounces a curse upon them. The work then begins, and the idols are all destroyed. They keep the Sabbath on the same day as ours. One of the native Christians attended their worship. There was a kind of offering made to God, and singing of praise, but no preaching. They have a form of baptism and offer prayer and thanksgiving at table, and are very particular in repeating certain Doxologies, the doctrine of the Trinity being held in high regard. They have entire confidence that God is on their side and that they are raised up to gain possession of China for Christianity and the destruction of idolatry.—They believe in a universal brotherhood, in which they include foreigners, not holding at all to the Chinese ideas of their own importance as compared with "outside barbarians."

If this be substantially correct, it is difficult to overrate its importance. Should the rebels—so called—be successful, it would seem that China would be thrown open at once to the world, and that pure Christianity, involving our entire civilization, would be invited freely. As China contains one third of the human race, the imagination may find ample scope in this idea. Americans are especially concerned in this matter; for it would seem that we are to have masses of Chinese amongst our population, and in their heathen condition they seem anything but a desirable element. The world is moving fast now, and we may be prepared to hear of almost any forward movement by every arrival from abroad.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

SPANISH INTOLERANCE.

A case has occurred in the North of Spain which exhibits the intolerance of Popery in a striking light. A number of English families who reside in one of its towns, and are connected with a railway there in progress, recently availed themselves of the presence of an English clergyman, who happened to be spending a Sunday in the neighborhood, to have a religious service, which was accordingly held, and in the most unostentatious way possible, in one of the rooms of a private house. Yet, although the Spanish government is called liberal and constitutional, the jealous authorities in that land of the inquisition gave notice to the master of the house, in writing, that "inasmuch as in this nation there are not tolerated nor permitted ceremonies of any other religion than that of the Catholic Apostolic Roman Church," warning is given against a repetition of an offense committed with so much publicity and insolence, (descaro,) and threatening condign punishment in case of "such a scandalous abuse," either in the house of the same offender, or that of any other British subject.—Such is the hospitality of Spain towards those who are strangers in the land. What a contrast between this treatment of English Protestants by the Spanish authorities, and that of Roman Catholics, or persons of any other religious profession, in Great Britain and America!

THE DOUBTING CHRISTIAN.

We cut the following graphic piece of word painting from a sermon of the late Rev. J. Addison Alexander, D.D., on "Abraham as the Friend of God and Father of the Faithful." It is true to the life:

He journeys towards the heavenly city, but he sees it not; Jerusalem is in his heart, but not before his eyes. He even dreams that he has taken the wrong path. Imagination magnifies the dangers of the journey. Every step appears to lead him into some hidden snare, and every stone to be the mark of some deep pitfall. Every thicket is an ambush, every dark spot no expected place of conflict. The hardy plants that bloom along the rugged path seem poisonous; the springs provided by the Master for his pilgrims are passed by in sinful and suspicious thirst. And when at length the body sinks exhausted and in need of slumber, all seems lost, and the man of little faith sleeps in the belief that he shall never wake. And when he does wake, it is only in a repetition of the same illusion. He is still afraid that he shall never reach the city. He is still unable to discover it in the distance; he will not look for it, but keeps his eye fixed upon the ground, or if he looks to the right point he finds the mist too dense, or the light too bright for his diseased vision. Or if he sees the object he refuses to believe his senses, and suspects delusion on the only point where he is free from it. Thus goes the doubter on, often ready to lie down and die, and sometimes tempted to go back, or turn aside, but still moving onward, because Christ is in his heart, and his secret hope that, notwithstanding all his fears, he shall yet appear in Zion before God. But see, the prospect changes. Real dangers now arise. The storm which deluges the valley, sweeps across the mountains also. The doubting Christian gives up all for lost. But the very dangers which alarm his fears, quicken his footsteps, and although he may believe that he is going wrong, the tempest and the earthquake drive him on and up, until the last ascent is gained, until the last cloud breaks away, and he who thought himself approaching to the verge of an abyss, finds himself standing on an everlasting rock, and at the threshold of an everlasting door; it seems can be felt there, he blushes as he looks back for a moment at the scene of his imaginary terrors, which now seem so sweet; the sun breaks out upon the path which he had trodden, and gladdens every dark spot where he wept or trembled; the noises which once terrified him, and still pursue him now, begin to blend with shouts and songs of triumph within; the everlasting doors lift up their heads, and with one farewell look at earth's baseless fabrics, the emancipated soul enters, never to return, the city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God.

ANDREW FULLER'S SEVERITY.

Men of sturdy character and vigorous constitution rarely have an excess of tenderness or charity for others, and the following anecdotes, from the Christian Times, indicate that Andrew Fuller, with all his excellencies, had failings in this direction:

Though Mr. Fuller's natural temper was neither churlish nor morose, it was not distinguished by goodness, meekness or affability. There was a sturdiness about him, which gave an appearance of roughness and severity to his behavior, often forbidding to strangers, and sometimes annoying and disagreeable to his friends. A vigorous constitution, and uncultivated habits, allied to an independent and ardent mind, occasioned an excess of freedom and fidelity not unfrequently at variance with the softer passions, and producing a luxuriance of the severer virtues. "Men of a rough and unsparing address," as the amiable Cowper observes, "should take care that they are always in the right; the justness and propriety of their sentiments and censures being the only tolerable apology that can be made for their severity." Hint this kind of infallibility could no more be predicted of Mr. Fuller than of any other occasions, was never loud of litigation, and seldom engaged in personal disputes. His mein and aspect afforded him the most ample protection from the intrusions of petulance and conceit.

Having been often reminded of his stern behavior, which had been rather a general subject of complaint, he ventured one day to mention it to a company of ministry, by way of appeal.—One of them replied, "Why, sir, you do not seem likely to make war without some just occasion; but it is pretty evident (pointing to his eyebrows) that you keep up a formidable peace establishment." The company, of course, enjoyed the pleasantry of this remark, till another, perceiving the effect it was likely to produce, added, "We had better stop, or we shall be in danger of putting brother Fuller's troops in motion."

Once, at a minister's meeting, he took occasion to correct an erroneous opinion advanced by an injudicious brother; and he laid on his censures so heavily that Dr. Rylund called out vehemently, in his own peculiar tone of voice:—"Brother Fuller, brother Fuller, you can never admonish a mistaken friend, but you must take up a sledge hammer and knock his brains out." Often was this caution repeated afterwards, and the epithet so fitly applied was never forgotten.

THE JESUITS.

One of the first measures of Garibaldi, on taking the reins of government into his own hands at Naples, was to abolish the order of Jesuits. The decree runs as follows:—

"The order of the Jesuits, and all their dependencies, are abolished in the continent of the two Sicilies; their property, moveable and immovable, is declared national. All contracts weighing on property for the benefit of the order are annulled."

A few short words; but of vast moment. What the precise number of Jesuits in the kingdom of the Two Sicilies may be, we do not know; but they are very numerous. Naples has been one of their chief seats, next to Rome; and their possessions all over the kingdom are immense. But it is said that the good and sagacious disciples of Loyola have provided against the stroke which has just fallen on them with their usual forethought. We learn to-day from Naples that the "brethren of the order" in that city have deposited their most precious personal property in the Banque du Saint Esprit, (a sort of public pawn-broker's shop thus blasphemously named,) and have received three-fourths of the value, in cash, of the valuables pawned! It is also added, that they have sold their real estate, in great part, to certain English speculators, and had given the deeds and secured the titles to the new owners before the publication of the Dictator's decree! The last clause of that document—"all contracts relating to property for the benefit of the order, after the landing of the Dictator in Sicily"—was doubtless drawn up to cover such little transactions as that which the brethren have just finished. The question of the validity of the transfers will be one for the law courts, unless the Dictator should decide, in this, as in other cases, of glaring violation of his rights, to take the law into his own hands.

A CHEERFUL RELIGION.

Philip Neri, an Italian priest of the sixteenth century, made, we are told, children his care. He founded the order of the pastors and preachers of the Oratories maintained to our day. The idea of music was invoked, and the modern oratorio originated in the movement.—All other charms were naught. "Be as good as you can," was Neri's familiar charge. And, in all simplicity and fervor, this man of learning, culture, genius, and refinement, addressed himself to the intelligence, affection, confidence, and moral advancement of his charge. His innocence and integrity were only equaled by his humility and piety. A brief, easy, charming service and sermon led to the benediction: "God bless you, my dear little children! Now praise the Lord by enjoying yourselves." And the flock and the shepherd portook of their pleasures together, that they might be pure and good. Imagine the effect of all this, copied as it should be every where in the church in a genial spirit; and does it not seem one of the happiest and best imitations our annals afford us of a divine Founder of a cheerful religion?—Record of Charity.

A Tract Burned, but not Destroyed.—Twenty years ago the late Daniel Fanshaw gave a tract to a young infidel, in whom he took a deep interest. He was indignant, saying: "What right has he to interfere with me or my opinions?" To show his contempt, he drew a match, and setting fire to the tract, lit a cigar with it; and as he supposed, dismissed the matter from his mind. Not long since, on looking over the list of deaths in his paper, this man saw the name of Mr. Fanshaw. The transaction of twenty years ago came to his mind. The contents of the tract, which he had read before burning, to show his coolness as well as contempt, came back to his mind. He attended the funeral, was a deep mourner, because convicted of his sin, was converted, and is now rejoicing in hope of the glory of God.

THERE IS LIFE EVERYWHERE.

Life everywhere! The air is crowded with birds—beautiful, tender, intelligent birds, to whom life is a song, and a thrilling anxiety, the anxiety of love. The air is swarming with insects—those little animated miracles. The waters are peopled with innumerable forms, from the animalcule, so small that one hundred and fifty millions of them would not weigh a grain, to the whale, so large that it seems an island as it sleeps upon the waves. The bed of the seas is alive with polypes, crabs, star-fishes, and numerous shell-animalcules. The rugged face of rocks is scarred by the silent boring of soft creatures, and blackened with countless mussels, barnacles, and limpets. Life everywhere! on the earth, in the earth, crawling, creeping, burrowing, boring, leaping, running. If the sequestered coolness of the wood tempt us to saunter into its checquered shade, we are saluted by the numerous din of insects, the twitter of birds, the scrambling of squirrels, the startled rush of unseen beasts, all telling how populous is this seeming solitude. If we pause before a tree, or shrub, or plant, our cursory and half-abstracted glance detects a colony of various inhabitants. We pluck a flower, and in its bosom we see many a charming insect busy at its appointed labour. We pick up a fallen leaf, and if nothing is visible on it, there is probably the trace of an insect larva hidden in its tissue, awaiting their development. The drop of dew upon this leaf will probably contain its animals, visible under the microscope. This same microscope reveals that the blood-rain suddenly appearing on bread, and awakening superstitious terrors, is nothing but a collection of minute animals; and that the vast tracts of snow which are reddened in a single night, owe their colour to the marvellous rapidity in reproduction of a minute plant. The very mould which covers our cheese, our bread, our jam, or our ink, and disfigures our damp walls, is nothing but a collection of plants. The many-colored fire which sparkles on the surface of a summer sea at night, as the vessel ploughs her way, or which drips from the oars in lines of jewelled light, is produced by millions of minute animals.

THE METEOR.

Of all the descriptions and reflections upon the late meteor, which have appeared in the various daily and weekly journals, none have pleased me so much as a few words noncerning it in a letter from a friend; and thinking that others might be as much benefited by his thoughts as myself, I have transcribed that portion of it, trusting that should it meet his eye, he will pardon the liberty I have taken. He had gone with a party on an excursion to the coal mines of Pennsylvania, and on that evening had paid a visit to the rolling mill, which he says reminded him of some description of Pandemonium with its large black room, lighted with the glare of its huge furnaces, and the half naked forms moving around amongst the flames. He thus proceeds:

"The workers, the palace, and the glare, all conspired to carry the thoughts to other and more fearful scenes. We left the building and groped our way to the omnibus, thinking of the scene we had just left, when suddenly in the western sky behold a star arose, more brilliant than any other. Most splendidly did

APOLOGETIC.

The editor has been absent, attending camp-meetings and other services for a few weeks, the first privilege of the kind he has allowed himself to enjoy since occupying his present position. In consequence, some things have not received customary attention, and some revival and obituary notices have been delayed a little in publication. We know this "mere mention" will be sufficient with any friends who may have become impatient without knowing the cause of delay. An editor can do much, but not everything. Everything behind will appear in next week's issue. The editor will be at his post hereafter, except a few weeks at the Conferences.

BRING UP THE FINANCES.

The Conferences in the Southwest, especially those owning this paper, are near at hand. We expect to meet the preachers at their respective sessions. We affectionately urge them to close up and settle all the accounts due the Advocate, as far as they possibly can, and bring the money to Conference. We have sent out all the accounts twice. If they are all settled, confusion, and trouble to our subscribers and agents, will be easily avoided hereafter. Where the preacher has already met his last appointment, we urge those subscribers who may owe anything, to remit it to us by letter themselves.

POWER OF INDIVIDUAL CHURCHES.

With all the admitted excellences and successes of the Methodist system, as a whole, the power of individual Churches, in advancing the cause of God, has never yet been fully developed. There are individual Churches which could, and, if properly trained, would, give more missionary money than the Conferences to which they belong. There are individual Churches among us which are able, without impoverishing themselves, to pay the present debt of our Missionary Treasury, $40,000.—Many such Churches, under our present plan, pay from $100 to $1000 missionary money annually, and think they have done well. We speak advisedly. These facts show that while we are green and flourishing in some branches of our economy, we are barren and decaying in others. What is to bring out the force of individual Churches among us? Somebody, proper to do it, must answer this question, or else, one of these days, it will be answered by those who have no legitimate business with it. We are far behind other denominations in the development of the power of individual Churches. They, most of them, live and thrive by this power alone. Our system is so great that, upon the whole, we out-prosper them, even while neglecting this power. This is a proof that our system is great, but it is also a proof that it is either imperfect, or imperfectly developed; the latter we [illegible] the truth. The philosophy of our system is correct, and capable of [illegible] application.—We sincerely believe that it possesses all the advantages, and is capable of all the successes, of every other system. But we have stereotyped the first edition. We need no new philosophy, but we need development, expansion, adaptation. In reply to such complaints as those we are now making, it is common to say that, in order to avail ourselves of the advantages of our system, as a whole, we must sacrifice many real advantages of other systems. We do not believe a word of it. We believe that a thorough application and working of the philosophy of our evangelical system would, in addition to the superior excellences it confessedly possesses, as now applied, develop also all the advantages of all other systems, in as superior a degree as the advantages we now claim.

To illustrate our inferiority in the development of the power of individual Churches, we call attention to the following facts, taken from the North Carolina Presbyterian. The Churches mentioned are neither larger, nor richer, nor increasing more rapidly than many of our own Churches. The difference in giving is the point to which we call attention.

"The Presbyterian church in the United States having the largest membership, is the Brick Church in New York, under the joint pastorage of Drs. Spring and Hoge. The number of members last spring was 797; it is now probably over 800. The next is Dr. Blackwood's church in Philadelphia, 758 members. The late Dr. Alexander's has 700 members; Dr. Cheeseman's, 639; Dr. M'Elroy's, 637. The largest church in the South is the Rocky River Church, Rev. D. A. Penic, sen., pastor, 616 members. Rev. J. R. Dow's, in South Carolina, has 570; Dr. Palmer's, in New Orleans, has 502; Dr. Smyth's, in Charleston, 498; and Mr. Girardeau's, in the same city, 492. The following churches received over 100 new members in the last year: Rev. Frederick Stein's (German Presbyterian), in New York, 144; Rev. Chas. J. Jones', in same city, 114; Rev. S. L. Mershon's, on Long Island, 110; and Rev. Joseph Weeks', in Natchez, 108. Among the largest contributing churches are Dr. Phillips's, which gave last year to all purposes, $57,961; the late Dr. Alexander's, $59-487; the Brick Church, $33,112; Dr. Boardman's, in Philadelphia, $20,467; Dr. Palmer's, in New Orleans, $39,811."

A WORK MUCH NEEDED.—CONFERENCE MINUTES.

The publication of the Minutes of our Annual Conferences is a modern achievement. It has not, as yet, become a general and permanent custom. Some of the Conferences publish their Minutes, and some do not. Some Conferences publish them one year, and fail the next. Some of them are well gotten up, and some are miserably "done." Some present a comprehensive, systematic, condensed, and satisfactory view of Church progress within the Conference, and some are incomplete, without form, and unsatisfactory. Sometimes the publication of the Minutes is desired, but there is no money to pay for it. At another time, they are published, relying upon a proposed plan of payment, which fails, and the publishers have to foot the bill.

All this is very irregular, unsatisfactory, and discouraging. Is there no remedy? Cannot some plan be adopted by which the Minutes of every Conference shall be published, uniform, and comprehensive, and satisfactory, as to matter and style? Instead of issuing as many pamphlets as there are Conferences, all differing in form, cannot they all be published in one pamphlet, giving a complete and condensed view of the progress of the Church in each Conference? Besides its other obvious advantages, would not this plan supercede the necessity of publishing "Annual Reports," of all possible sorts? By throwing out all unnecessary words, and publishing only valuable and interesting facts, it seems to us that the pamphlet would not be cumbersomely large.

We would not have it as much confined to names and figures as the General Minutes, nor as verbose and unwieldy as the Missionary and Sunday School Reports. We would have, in as few words as possible, a complete and satisfactory resume, by Conferences, of the progress of the Church during the year, as compared with the year preceding. We would have it include every interest of the Church, regular and irregular, connected with the questions of the Discipline, and outside of them. Such an annual volume would combine all the advantages of the Minutes of the Conferences, the General Minutes, the Annual Reports of Societies, and the Church Almanac. Each Annual Conference could have an editor of its own Minutes, and the General Book Editor could combine and complete the whole. It would be an annual volume of Church history. "Annals of Southern Methodism" would be complete and official. Those who wish to keep posted in the current history of the Church, instead of wading through forty pamphlets, perhaps failing to get some of them, would need to read only one.

It might contain a short, complete, and satisfactory account of every institution of learning connected, directly or indirectly, with the Church, which would be more valuable than all catalogues and advertisements. So with Depositories, Education Societies, Aid Societies, and the like. The last General Conference confessed the need of one book to tell the world all about the character of Methodism; we also need one annual volume to tell us all about the current facts of Methodism.

DR. THOMSON'S VERACITY.

Rev. Edward Thomson, D.D., the present ultra-abolition editor of the New York Christian Advocate and Journal (we use the word "ultra abolition" in a purely descriptive sense), has made three distinct statements, two of them in his speech, in the General Conference, in May last, and one in his journal, to which we wish to call attention. They are as follows:

1. "The judiciary declares that a negro has no rights which a white man is bound to respect."

2. "The Southern Churches generally hold that slavery is a divine institution."

3. "Rev. Anthony Dewly was hung in Texas for no other crime than that of being a minister of the M. E. Church (North)." We care nothing about the gentleman's motives or intentions in making these declarations. We have nothing to do with them in this connection. We record them simply for the purpose of replying that all three of them are untrue.

The "judiciary" (the United States Supreme Court, in the Dred Scott case), decided the question of citizenship, not of personal rights. No "Southern Church," that we know of, has any declaration, in articles of doctrine, or forms of discipline, which "holds" any opinion as to the divinity, or otherwise, of the institution of slavery.

As to hanging men in the South "for no other crime than that of being ministers of the M. E. Church" (North), Dr. Thomson knows better, from personal observation. He was in New Orleans last winter, in company with several other Northern Methodist ministers. He conversed freely with our ministers and people, as did his companions. We knew him to be an abolitionist before he came. He expressed his opinion freely on the slavery question, especially in connection with the M. E. Church (North). He avowed himself, then, as utterly opposed to the so-called Conservative party, headed by Dr. Abel Stevens. He preached in our churches, twice on the same Sabbath. And yet he was not hanged, but treated with Christian courtesy. Two ministers of the Northern Methodist Church are at this moment acting as agents of the Southwestern Bible Society in New Orleans, one in Louisiana, the other in Mississippi. They have not been hanged.

[illegible] if a white man murders one of [illegible] the slave, it is enough to say that He is not a citizen, but he is as much protected by the laws of the land as a white man—more than he is in the Northern States.

Dr. Thomson disingenuously tries, in a reply to Rev. R. Abbey, to mix up the question of citizenship with that of rights. He also cites a quotation made by the Supreme Court, as the language and opinion of the Court itself. The sum of the whole matter is, Dr. Thomson has borne false witness against his neighbor—If unwittingly, he will correct it; if he refuse, let him stand condemned before the civilized world as a man in high religious position, without veracity or honor.

UNION OF METHODIST BODIES.

The Methodist Protestant, of Baltimore, organ of the Church of the same name, invites the border Methodists who are about seceding from the Northern Church, to join the Methodist Protestants. The number of Methodist Protestants, exclusive of an abolition schismatical wing in the Northwest, we suppose to be about 60,000. The number of the Episcopal Methodists on the Border who will probably secede from the Northern Church, we suppose also to be about 60,000. The members in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, are above 700,000. The increase of this year, and the above-named 120,000, would make near 900,000. Suppose we unite the three bodies. On the slavery question, which is troubling all the American Churches, and which has been the bane of American Methodism, we are all agreed. To bring together all the anti-abolition elements of American Methodism, both for the peace of the country and the good of the cause of Christ, we ought to be willing to make concessions on all minor points. We believe the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is willing to do her full share of duty in bringing about this blessed consummation. Let us have a great scriptural Methodist Church, with no sectional name, with no platform on slavery but that of the New Testament, with no political tendencies, with "holiness to the Lord" as our motto, and to "spread scriptural holiness" as our object. And if it please our Protestant brethren better, let us call it the PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL METHODIST CHURCH. If we once agree to unite, we shall soon be able to settle all the questions in the way—even that of lay-delegation.—What a magnificent journal we could make out of the Baltimore Advocate, the Methodist Protestant, and the Richmond Advocate. Let us unite. Let us not be proud, and stickle, and demand concessions and advances and wait for others to come to us. Let us all start at once and come together, in the real old-fashioned Methodist style. We have been advising the Border and Protestant Methodists to "adhere South." We shall not do so any more. We propose that we all adhere to one another. What says the Methodist Protestant? What will our brethren of the Border say in their approaching Conventions? Is there anything in the way? What is it?

CLOSING SUNDAY SCHOOLS IN WINTER.

This is a common thing, and it is a common evil, in the country. As is usually the case, it is the indication of many other evils. One of these is, that in many places we have such poor miserable barns of churches that nobody can stand them of a cold day. Thus one evil is the parent of a numerous kindred brood. This state of things is a shame, especially in the South, where the winters are so mild, and the few cold days are so easily provided against. A ceiled or plastered house, with a stove or two in it, would be ample protection against the cold. With such comforts, winter is the best time for Sunday School. The oppressive heat of the summer is harder to bear in going to and from Church, than the cold of winter. Winter is the best time for study.—Mind and body are both more vigorous. It is the season of the greatest leisure, the nights are long, and every thing favors study and reading.

We trust our preachers and people will think of these things, and, wherever possible, keep the schools going all winter. Even a log church can have a chimney put to it, and a large log fire for the comfort of the Sunday School. See to these things, brethren.

SAVE THE UNION.

In another place in this issue our readers will find a paper on the Presidential Election. In the fear of God, it is an honest conscientious, non-partisan view of the facts and prospects of our present political situation. It is not inspired by preference for any one of the three candidates opposing the sectional nominee. We would not, if we could, influence a single vote. It is written from a stand-point which regards all Southern men, and all conservative men in the North, as friends of the South, and of the Union. It is written by one who "belongs" to no political party, and never will; by one who, whatever his present preferences, would, in the present crisis, vote for any man who could unite the friends and defeat the enemies of the Constitution and the Union. This is no time for partisan jealousies and recriminations among Southern and conservative men. These things have well nigh ruined the country already. The cry of "the people" now is, "Men and brethren what shall we do to be saved?" Some may ridicule the idea, but we know whereof we affirm when we tell them there is danger. And the greatest immediate danger is, that the Southern people, divided in policy, will divide in feeling and action, fall into furious anarchy, and go to pieces like a stranded ship in a storm. "A United South," if possible, is indispensable, before any fixed policy can be adopted with wisdom and safety. Upon the election of a sectional President, a portion of our people are determined to resist, and a portion seem determined to oppose resistance. This is a fearful state of things.

The first thing done, in case the nominee of the sectionalists is elected, should be the adoption of a plan for consultation between all Southern and conservative men, and an earnest effort to agree upon a future policy. If office-hunters are allowed to control us, those on opposite sides will push their views to extremes, divide us more widely than ever, and drive us to discord and ruin. If one state goes out of the Union alone, though others may not immediately follow, the disintegration of the Confederacy, once commenced, cannot be arrested. The Union once broken will never be restored. If a state retire, she will never return. Coercion will never be attempted, we believe; but if it should be, not only the South, but the whole country, would be ruined. A Black Republican inauguration might not be resisted, but Black Republican coercion would be. And the resistance would not be confined to the South. War would rage between the coercion and anti-coercion parties throughout the Union.

An effort should first be made to unite the South, and the conservative men North; and then an effort should be made to save the Union. There are two things to prevent, if possible: the ruin of the Union, and the ruin of the South. Let no man deceive himself into the belief that there is such an antagonism between the safety of the Union and the safety of the South, that by giving up the latter we can preserve the former.—But, first of all, after consultation and union among ourselves, we should make an earnest and exhaustive effort to save the Union, if possible to be done without putting the South beyond the power of preservation.—After the election is over, there will be ample time for consultation and effort, and no need, therefore, for a hasty committal to an irrevocable policy.

The great question for consideration in the interval is, will the election of a Black Republican President secure to that party the permanent control of the Government, or can sufficient opposition strength be organized to prevent evil during his administration, and to rescue the Government from sectional control at the election in 1864?

[illegible] policy and course of the South [illegible] as we can see, the clear decision of this question. A single sectional administration would not seriously injure the South, but permanent sectional control would ruin both the South and the Union. A united and friendly effort should be made to clearly ascertain the probabilities involved in the above-stated question. It should not be a Southern effort alone, but should also include all our friends at the North. Though defeated, the fight they have made for us readers such an effort due to them. Shall we leave them alone, after they have perilled and lost all in our behalf? Shall we abandon them to the tender mercies of the Black Republicans? Shall we throw away all the strength and help they may yet afford us in the war with fanaticism and in the salvation of the Union? We do not include in these remarks the gambling politicians at the North, who, though they may vote against the Black Republican nominee, were the men that sacrificed the unity of the anti-abolitionists to their own selfish conspiracies. Let them never find a place for political repentance, though they seek it carefully and with tears. Let them go to the Black Republicans, whose epics they are.

Moreover, as we have been defeated because of our divisions, shall we not make an effort for success united? Is there not a strong and hopeful probability that the success of the sectional party will unite the entire anti-abolition strength of the Union? At least, this hope should be exhausted before it is abandoned. Shall we abandon the field because defeated in the first great battle? Shall we not fight a second battle under the banner of the Constitution and the Union before we adopt another flag? Because caught divided, inharmonious, and at a disadvantage, and therefore defeated, shall we not try the fortune of battle united and harmonious, before giving up the contest? Shall we not attempt to unite an inharmonious majority in the Union, before attempting to unite an inharmonious minority out of it? We have fought the Black Republicans and been defeated, while a wing of our forces had possession of the offices of government; shall we not fight another battle when our enemies are in office, and we are all out, and therefore equal in position? We have vainly tried to unite upon Constitutional and Union principles and platforms while a portion of us were in office and a portion out; shall we not be better able to agree upon principles and programme when we are all out? May not the success of the enemies of the Constitution be the only means, in the wisdom of Providence, by which a great Constitutional and Union party could be formed, to conduct the Government to its future glory? Having foolishly and sinfully divided, and before been justly punished with defeat shall we not repent and unite, and try again, instead of taking advantage of our own folly and dissolving the Union? If our defeat were the result of the Black Republican organization alone, against the united strength of the friends of the South and of the Union, even then we should make another effort if any reasonable hope remained. Much more, then, should we make another effort, when our defeat is not our own fault, and when, if we unite, there is reasonable hope.

Party politics is not within our legitimate range as christian journalists. Therefore, we have written not from partisan, but a christian stand point, and; we trust, with a sincerely christian spirit and motive. Party leaders, on both sides, may not be pleased with what we have said. If so, we shall regret it, but cannot help it. There may be neither wisdom nor practicability in what we have recommended. We have done what we could. We should not have been content in conscience had we not done it. God save our native land! We cannot bring ourselves to believe that He has abandoned us, and that all is lost. We still hope that the Union and the rights of the South, like the mercies of God, may "endure forever." Amen!

ADAMS' EXPRESS.—This "institution" brings us under obligation every week. We hereby tender our thanks, and heartily commend the Express to the patronage of our friends.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

The present is an hour of doubt and danger such as we have never seen since the days of Lexington and Concord. The election of a sectional President, by a party inflamed with a deadly hostility to the people, institutions, and social and domestic peace of fifteen States of the Union, is now almost a certainty. Such an event will present a dilemma, and environ us with dangers, from which we cannot escape, turn which way we will. Much as has been said and written on the subject, the solemnity of "the situation" and the momentousness of the issue have never been adequately conceived by the popular mind. Many there are who are ready to prescribe a remedy for the evils that threaten us, and to point out a path of deliverance from the dangers that thicken around us. But the very number and variety of these political doctors and prophets is proof that no plan of safety is clearly discovered, and also that, if it were, it promises no certainty of benefit, because of the number of opposing plans recommended. Men may make light of the crisis, and of the fears it excites, but time will prove, unless God in his mercy make a way for our escape, that they have only been absorbed in selfish pleasures, while the hand of doom was writing upon the wall. Look at the prospect as we may, there is nothing but cloud and gloom upon the horizon. Neither sky nor sunshine appear.

The character and aims of the fanatical party about to obtain the control of the Government allows of no hope. The overthrow of our institutions, the dismemberment of our social organization, the destruction of our domestic peace, involving commercial ruin, and danger to life and property, are their avowed objects—platforms, and recent protestations, to the contrary notwithstanding. The man is a fool who doubts it. The John Brown and Texas conspiracies are legitimate fruits of their agitation. These things they hope to make common throughout the South by their control of the administration.—Many of their leading men, some in office and some candidates, and the mass of their party, openly avow their sympathy with these things. The evidence is before us in abundance as we write, in their own taunting and treasonous words. We could fill pages with it. Their rostrums and their pulpits, their secular and religious presses, teem with vindictive and mendacious denunciations of us. And they only lead and echo the hounding cry of the visionaries and fanatics of the civilized world. As we said week before last, the mere election of a sectional President would not endanger our institutions.—If they get and keep control of the United States Government, however; the abolition of our system of labor, and the era of free-negro equality, are only questions of time. Come they will, as certainly as death or the day of judgment, and with as little necessity for "overt acts."

Whether their success in the coming election will give them permanent control of the Government, or be the means of uniting all parties against them, of crippling their administration, and of overthrowing them in the election of 1864, we cannot tell. We trust the latter will be the case, though it is a hope beclouded with many doubts and fears. Small as is this hope, it is, in our humble judgment, the only one that lights the way of the South out of a dilemma where the alternative is, either permanent submission, subjugation, and certain ruin, or resistance and its uncertainties and dangers.—This view of the case is worthy at least of thorough and candid consideration. To save the South and to save the Union, should be the motto of all good men, as long as the double salvation seems possible. At the present moment, and until a definite conclusion be reached, all our Southern statesmen, and all our constitutional statesmen throughout the Union, should unitedly consult upon question in the coming State conventions. Is there good hope that we can unite all the elements of opposition to the abolitionists, throughout the Union, and place them both in a Congressional and popular minority? Can we accomplish such a conservative union without giving up the sacred principles of constitutional right and equality for which we have so long contended? If there is reasonable hope in this direction, it should be exhausted before the dernier resort. We should be able to justify all that we do, especially in a matter so solemnly important—one affecting our posterity, and the hopes of the world—to our consciences in the sight of God. For ourselves, we honestly think there is hope in this direction. If this hope fail, what is to become of us? Permanent Black Republican control, and the destruction of the institutions of the South, are synonymous. If we are to submit to such permanent control, let us not be deceived; let us understand what it means; it means the abolition of slavery and free-negro equality. When we agree to submit to permanent abolition rule, we agree to give up the institution of slavery. We agree to sink gradually into the political and commercial insignificance of the British West Indies. We agree to risk the fate of San Domingo.

Is there no hope of defeating them? Is the success of this party certain? We honestly believe that no human power can now prevent its triumph. It is true that there is a noble band of patriots at the North who are now fighting a battle for the salvation of the country, almost equal in glory to the struggle of our revolutionary sires. But they have been defeated in every State in which there was any hope but New York. There they are marshalling their forces for the last great battle. New York is the Thermopylæ of the contest. All honor to our friends there. No doubt most of them differ in opinion with their Southern brethren upon the abstract question which divides the sections; but as we have never sought to force our views upon them, they claim no rights to force their views upon us. Against the flowing tide of public opinion in their own section, they are battling for justice, peace, and American brotherhood. We pray God to give them the victory. But whether they succeed or fail, they should never be forgotten. From all the indications, however, we have scarcely a hope of their success.

In our own section, omens of danger begin to appear. Preparations are being made to call together State legislatures and State conventions, upon the election of a sectional President. Notes of the most determined resistance are being sounded from one end of the country to the other. Military companies are being formed, and people and States are openly arming. It is declared that some of the States will certainly secede if the hostile party succeed in the election. Alas, alas, for our country and our patriotic pride and hopes! Who of us imagined, a few years since, that we should ever witness such a time in the history of our glorious Republic! Is it true that Republicanism is a failure! Has the blood of the revolution been shed in vain? Was there ever such a time and such a need to take counsel of heaven! Was there ever such a time and such a need for fasting, humiliation, and prayer to the God of our fathers?—Where is the patriot-prophet to counsel and lead us in this our hour of extremity! The Southern people love the Union—the Union of their fathers—the Union of the Constitution—the Union of the original, constitutional equality of the sovereign States voluntarily forming it. They would, to a man, defend that Union to the death. Let no man, especially no Southern man, deny it. For long years they have suffered bitter wrong and persecution for the sake of the Union. But there is that which is dearer than the Union itself—namely, the rights and honor, which the Union was formed to protect. They are dearer than life, or anything short of the favor of God and everlasting salvation.

Next to the success of sectional fanaticism, the greatest danger of the Southern people is discord among themselves. This, indeed, is the cause of their present dangerous dilemma. May God cause it to cease hereafter, and guide to wisdom and unanimity of counsel. We do earnestly pray our people, however they may differ as to policy, to remember that they are all involved in the same fate, and to strive for peace and unity among themselves. Whatever may be our destiny, let us all cleave together as a band of brothers. We are all sons of the same glorious clime, born or homed upon the same beloved soil, heirs of the same renowned history. Our fathers and our friends sleep under the same precious sod. Let us stand together for weal or for woe. Let there be no resistance until there is absolute necessity for it. Let no mad impulse overthrow prudence. Let us exhaust every other remedy and every other hope. But if the necessity do come, then let us manfully strike for our altars and our fires, and the green graves of our sires. Let us not take our cause out of the hands of God. He can save us when human wisdom and effort fail. Let us do nothing upon which we cannot ask his blessing.

AUTHORS AND BOOKS.

NEW YORK, Oct. 22, 1860.

Messrs. Derby & Jackson have just ready for the Trade a holiday book which will find especial favor with readers of your region. It is called "The Women of the South," and is gotten up in the finest manner, both for print and illustrations; the latter portraits. The "women of the South" treated of are Mrs. LeVert, of Alabama; Caroline Gilman and Caroline Howard, of South Carolina; Anna Cora Ritchie, Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth, Marion Harland, Susan Archer Tully, Lizzie Petit, and Jane T. Worthington, of Virginia; Catherine A. Warfield (author of the Household of Bouverie); Rosa Verner Johnson, Sallie Rochester Ford, Anne T. H. Cross, Mary Dana Shindler, and Amelia B. Welby, of Kentucky. Eleanor Percy Bee, of Mississippi; Maria J. M'Intosh, Caroline Lee Hentz, Mary E. Bryan; Annie R. Blount, and Carrie B. Sinclair, of Georgia; Almira Lincoln Phelps, and Georgiana Melrod, of Maryland; Augusta J. Evans, and Rachel Jacobus of Alabama; Ann Eliza Dupuy, and Anne Peyre Dennis, of Louisiana; L. Virginia French, and Emilie Chilton, of Tennessee; Kate A. Du Bosse, Sallie A. Reade, Louise S. McCord, Mary E. Lee, and Jessie B. Cheseborough, of South Carolina; and Mary J. Windle, of Delaware. A fair list. It is stated that Messrs. Derby & Jackson will issue for the holidays of 1861-2 a companion volume to this, "The women of the North."—But that is looking a long way ahead.

Speaking of Southern Ladies reminds me that those among them who are authors have been both busy and successful during the year. "Beulah," by Miss Evans, of Mobile; "Nemesis," by Marion Harland, of Virginia, "Rutledge," said to be by a lady of Montgomery, Ala; the "Household of Bouverie," by a lady of Kentucky; the "Black Gauntlet," a tale of plantation life in South Carolina, by Mrs. Henry R. Schoolcraft, wife of the historian of the Indians, and author of "African Letters;" the "Ladies' Southern Florist," by Mary C. Keon, of South Carolina; "Ellen, or the Fanatic's daughter," by Mrs. V. G. Cawdon, of Alabama; and Rev. Mr. Taylor's interesting work on China—these make part of the list, which is a tolerably long one, and includes some of the most successful books of the year.

Though Christmas is not near yet, the publishers are sending out notes of preparation, and as I have begun my letter with a holiday book, I may as well give you and your readers some idea of what farther is doing in that line. Messrs. D. Appleton & Co., who have for some years made Holiday Books, splendidly illustrated, printed and bound, a speciality, have a very formidable list, from which almost anybody might make satisfactory choice. The "Promises of Jesus," is a small quarto so long and so reverently treasured by the Christian world. It is printed in gold and colors, and the initial letters are in the style of the old illuminated manuscripts. Next comes the "Moral Emblems" of Catz, with Aphorisms, Adages, and Proverbs of all ages and nations; a book that was a classic nearly a century ago, and is now reproduced with all the quaint illustrations of the original edition. Of the large engravings there are sixty, and an equal number of tail-pieces. Each engraving is accompanied by a poem from Catz, translated into English by Richard Pigot; a selection from every language, of proverbs upon the same theme; and a poem from the "Lych no cansia," of Robert Fairlie, published in London in 1638. Then a collection of poems from Chaucer, Wyatt, Milton, Suckling, Ambrose Phillips, Sir Wm. Davenant, Cowley, Samuel Butler, Andrew Marvel, and others of equal eminence as wits, humorists, and poets, besides many anonymous pieces, brought together by Mr. W. H. Wills, a gentleman who was formerly Mr. Dickens' right hand man in Household Words, and illustrated by Chas. Bennett and George H. Thomas, English artists. "The May Queen," by Alfred Tennyson, with Illustrations by the Hon. Mrs. Boyle; "The Poetry of Nature," with thirty Illustrations by Harrison Weir; "The Poets Gallery," a series of Illustrations of the British Poets; an American edition of Mr. Doyle's famous "Adventures of Brown, Jones, and Robinson, on the Continent," of which I may mention that the plates are produced by a novel process in lithography: the originals are photographed on a prepared stone, and copies are printed from these photographs—making an immense saving on the first cost of the stone.

These are all picture books—very good things in their way, but there is getting to be too much picture and too little text in our Holiday literature—as though the inevitable and delicious turkey should disable us from sensible reading, and reduce us to the extreme of mere picture gazers. But even a dinner-out on Christmas, may spend an evening pleasantly with Charles Lamb, if he gets him in such beautiful shape as his works have just been published in by Crosby, Nichols, Lee, & Co.—There are four volumes, printed on tinted paper, and with an excellent likeness of the man, whom all his readers love with a feeling, I am sure, they have for no other author.

Then there is the beautiful Boston edition of the works of Baron, for those who care to philosophize on a hearty dinner; while Messrs. Sheldon & Co. issue also a fine edition of Milman's Latin Christianity; Messrs. Taknor & Fields are preparing Walter Savage Landor's works; and with Messrs. Harper, who always aim to combine the useful with the ornamental, among various other matters in preparation may be mentioned that M. Paul Duchaillu's Adventures and Explorations in Equatorial Africa is progressing, and will be ready for Christmas. It is being very fully and splendidly illustrated, and will prove, I judge, the finest and most interesting of all the books yet published on Africa—as exciting in its hunts and wild adventure as Gordon Cummings, and as important and interesting for commercial, geographical, and missionary purposes as Livingstone's.

And then, last of all, come three books which deserve to be mentioned by themselves. Palmer's Folk Songs, a beautiful volume, to be published by Scribner; Bryant's Forest Hymns, by Messrs. Townsend; Stoddard's "Loves of the Poets," by Derby & Jackson.

And so I am done with Christmas literature, at least for the present. October brings the English Quarterlies, of the contents of which, however, I can give you in the present letter only a list. The National, which is the youngest and of the best, has articles on "the Franks and the Gauls;" "The English Translators of Homer;" "Builders' Combinations in London and Paris;" "Russian Literature; Michael Lermontoff;" "The Middle Ages in England;" "The Natural History of Ceylon;" "French Fiction; "the Lowest Deep;" "Baron Ricasoli and his Political Career;" "Nathaniel Hawthorne;" "Nature and God."

The London Review, which is the Methodist quarterly of England, treats on "English, Literary and Vernacular; "Recent Discoveries in Eastern Africa;" "Ruskin on Modern Painters;" "The Methodist Episcopal Church and Slavery;" "Lebanon—The Druses and Maronites;" "Sicily;" "England at the Accession of George III;" "Etheridge's Life of Dr. Coke;" "Henry Drummond;" "Italy in Transition."

The Westminster reviews "Neo-Christianity;" "The North American Indians;" "Robert Owen;" "The Organization of Italy;" "The Antiquity of the Human Race;" "Russia—Present and Future;" "Our National Defences;" "W. M. Thackeray as Novelist and Photographer."

The British Quarterly contains papers on "Ireland—Past and Present;" "Atkinson's Travels—Amoor, India, China;" "Glaciers;" "Heinrich von Kleist;" "Burton's Lake Regions of Central Africa;" "Ruskin's Modern Painters;" "Egyptology and the two Exodus;" "Christian Races under Turkish Rulers;" "Hours with the Mystics."

It is stated that a French savant and traveler of reputation denies altogether that the remains discovered by Mr. Layard, and now in the British Museum, have anything to do with Nineveh. He will have to bring forward some pretty strong facts to prove his case.

The Atlantic Monthly for November contains an article on Hood, which is by Rev. Henry Giles; Italian Experiences in collecting old masters, is by J. Jackson Jarves, Esq., Midsummer and May is by Miss Harriet Prescott; Tenty Serna is by Miss Rose Terry; Some Recollections of Irving are by Mr. Putnam, the Publisher; and the Professor's Story is of course by Dr. Holmes. The publishers advertise new novels by Mrs. Stowe and Charles Reade, new stories by Miss Prescott, and a new romance by the author of "Charles Auchester,"—all of which are to appear in the Atlantic for 1861.

Messrs. Harper & Bros. will publish in a few days, "The Life and Correspondence of John A. Quitman, Major General U.S.A., and Governor of the State of Mississippi," by J. F. H. Claiborne, of Mississippi, 2 vols; and "Travels in the Regions of the Upper and Lower Amoor, and the Russian acquisitions on the confines of India and China; with Adventures among the mountain Kirghis, and the Manjours, Munyargs, Tonnguse, Goldi, and Gelyaks," by T. W. Atkinson, author of "Oriental and Western Siberia," with 83 illustrations; also Mr. Thackeray's "Lectures on the Four Georges," of which, by the way, the Fourth lecture—which appears in the November number of Harper's Magazine—is decidedly the best of the series; opening with one of those pieces of sarcastic portraiture in which Mr. Thackeray excels. This in his finest vein. They have in preparation "The Wits and Beaux of Society," by Grace and Philip Wharton, whose former volume, "The Queens of Society," has been very successful here as well as in England.

An attempt is being made in England to revive the discussion as to the authorship of "Adam Bede," and the claims of Mr. Liggins, of Nuneton, are again to be put forward. The grounds for the claim are that Mr. Liggins was known to be writing a series of stories such as were published as "Scenes of Clerical Life", that the adventures of the heroine of "Janet's Repentance" actually occured in the town where Mr. Liggins is resident; that the so-called "George Eliot," though denying Liggins's authorship, never denied his occupations; and that Liggins himself, though so prominently alluded to, has avoided any public statement. The Liggins partisans would now have it that he actually supplies the original matter, which is revised and improved by Miss Evans.

Messrs. Scribner & Co. have in press two [illegible] by the Rev. James W. Alexander: Thoughts [illegible] on Faith." Also, the concluding [illegible] Addison Alexander's "Commentary on the Gospel of St. Mathew." They have in preparation a volume of miscellanies, by Rev. Dr. Bushnel, to include his celebrated oration "on Work and Play." The volume will have the title of "Work and Play," and will contain a first rate engraved portrait of the author, which will be welcome to his many friends.

Messrs. Derby and Jackson have nearly ready for press, "Will He Find Her? a Romance of New York and New Orleans," by Samaner Winterton, esq., a lawyer of New Orleans.

AN INTERESTING MEETING.

Last year the evangelical denominations of Philadelphia held a "union" meeting, for prayer for the "unity of the Spirit." It was a most blessed occasion, and the report of its proceedings spread new hope among the friends of Christian catholicity throughout the country. The rising of the crowded assembly for the audible utterance of the "Apostles' Creed," was described as a sublime scene. This ancient symbol of the common faith was the only dogmatic feature of the occasion, and met with unanimous concurrence. The scene has just been repeated in Philadelphia, and will be, it is hoped, every year. The meeting was held on the 1st inst., in the large Protestant Episcopal Church of the Epiphany—Pastors and people of all denominations were present. We learn from the Intelligencer that the Rev. Richard Newton, D. D., of the Episcopal Church, conducted. The Scriptures were read by the Rev. W. J. R. Taylor, D. D. Addresses were made by Rev. Dr. Brantley, Baptist; Rev. Dr. How, Dutch Reformed, of New Brunswick, N. J.; Rev. Dr. Jenkins, Presbyterian, N. S; Rev. Dr. Nevin, Presbyterian, O. S.; Rev. Dr. Stockton, chaplain of the U. S. House of Representatives; Rev. Alfred Cookman and Rev. J. H. Torrance, Methodist; and Rev. John Chambers, Independent. The next day meeting was devoted to the same object, and was largely attended. The Rev. Mr. Fernley, of the Methodist Church, presided. It was an interesting hour. At 4 P. M., the old Union Methodist Church, in Fourth street, of which Rev. Alfred Cookman is pastor, and which is fragrant with memories of George Whitefield, who gave the lot, and preached on this very ground, was well filled for the concluding services of the day.—Rev. John Chambers presided. Prayer was offered by the venerable minister into whose heart God had put the idea of this annual meeting—the Rev. Dr. Vaughan, of the Episcopal Church. Addresses were made by Rev. Dr. Kennard, Baptist; Rev. Dr. Joseph H. Jones, O. S. Presbyterian; Rev. Dr. Wallace, N. S. Presbyterian; Rev. James M. Crowell, O. S. Presbyterian; Rev. Mr. Craycraft, Episcopalian. Brethren of various denominations offered prayer. In the morning, at the suggestion of the Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements, Rev. Dr. Nevin, at the close of a touching address, the whole congregation arose, and led by the presiding minister, recited aloud the Apostles' Creed. The same thing will doubtless be annually repeated. The correspondent of the Intelligencer says that the influence of these observances will not seem trivial to those who can realize the great change which they have wrought in the fraternal intercourse of Philadelphia ministers, churches, and Christians.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS.—Reports from about twenty-eight Methodist Conferences show that during the last four years the number of conversions among Sabbath School children had reached 84,339. The Northwestern Advocate thinks that the figures would have reached 100,000, had all the Conferences reported.

There are in New York city 14,387 members of the Presbyterian, 10,036 members of the Methodist, and 9127 members of the Baptist church.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

FOREIGN NEWS.

By the arrival of the steamship Asia at New York, on the 29th inst., bringing dates from Liverpool to the 14th inst., and the arrival of the Felton at St. John's on the 29th, with dates from Southampton to the 17th, we are in possession of the following European news, per telegraph:—

Italian Affairs.—It is reported that the French army in Rome will be augmented to 60,000. France is supplying Sardinia with a large amount of arms and ammunition. A report was current that Garibaldi was wounded at the battle of the Volturno. A decree had been issued for a vote on the 21st, by universal suffrage, as to the union of Italy under Victor Emanuel. The Sardinian Chamber of Deputies had approved of the projected law for annexation by 290 against 0. Count Cavour urged the union, and said he desired Rome for the Capital of Italy. He uttered a menace against Austria, and denied that Russia and Prussia had sent a protest to Turin identical with that of Austria. La Presse says that all of the Great Powers, except England, had notified the Cabinet at Turin that they will not recognize the blockade at Gaeta. The Neapolitan princes have ordered a renewal of the attack on the Garibaldians. It is asserted that great consternation prevails in the Cabinet at Turin in consequence of the Prussian and Russian embassadors having remitted formal protests against a Sardinian invasion of Naples. Victor Emanuel entered Naples on the 16th. The diplomats of Gaeta have protested against the decree relative to Milan, Gen. Goyon had reoccupied Viterbo.

Important Movements in China.—Advices from China by the Overland mail state that the allies had attacked a Tartar camp, and completely routed its occupants. A grand attack on the Takie forts was to have taken place on the 15th of August. The rebels attacked Shanghai on the 18th August, and were repulsed. The affair had caused a stoppage of trade.

The following Resume of foreign news we glean from our home and foreign exchanges received during the past week:—

GREAT BRITAIN.

Record of Wrecks.—During the month of September the number of wrecks reported in the London Shipping Gazette was 103. In the month of January, 229; in February, 154; in March, 166; in April, 133; in May, 124; in June, 146; in July, 69; and in August 96—making a total during the present year of 1211.

Layard's Remains Pronounced a Hoax.—It is stated that a French savant and traveler of reputation denies altogether that the remains discovered by Layerd, and now in the British Museum, have anything to do with Nineveh. His proof will be looked for.

The Cotton Industry of England.—Late statistics of British industrial enterprise show that five million persons are supported in England by cotton; that thirty million spindles are employed in the production of the yarn, and that the capital absorbed exceeds $750,000,000. Four-fifths of the cotton consumed in England (800,000,000 pounds) is American; 120,000,000 pounds come from other foreign countries, while only 8 per cent. (80,000,000 pounds) are received from British colonies and dependencies.

The Princess Alice, second daughter of Queen Victoria, will be betrothed next month to Prince Louis of Hesso Darmstadt, one of the principal of the petty duchies of Germany.

Sir Henry Smith is dead.

FRANCE.

The Empress Eugenie, since the death of her sister, the Duchess of Alba, has absolutely refused to receive company or to appear in public.

The expenses of governing France amount to $1,000,000 per day, including interest on the public debt. This is about $9 a year to each inhabitant. The navy alone costs $93,000,000 a year.

RUSSIA AND AUSTRIA.

The Royal Conference.—It was stated that Austria intended to propose that the different powers should not recognise any settlement of the Italian question as binding without her consent. It was re-asserted that the Emperor of Austria and the prince of Prussia would arrive at Warsaw simultaneously, and remain there three days.

Advices from Vienna say that an extraordinary credit has been granted the Naval Department for the construction of naval batteries to defend the entrance of Austrian sea-ports.

ITALY.

Count Cavour's Message.—The important message delivered by Count Cavour to the Sardinian Parliament at the recent opening of its session is a clear and comprehensive document, reviewing, up to the point of the convocation of the Chambers, the exciting events which have lately occured in Italy. Having taken a cursory glance at the state of affairs in Southern Italy and the Papal States, Cavour declares that with the exception of Venetia, the whole of Italy is free and emancipated from degenerating despotism. Much, however, he emphatically states, remains to be done, and first of all the lesson of anarchy must be suppressed. Europe and the whole world, he says, will hold Victor Emanuel responsible if the Italians do not organize a government in accordance with the requirements of law and Alliance, he has convoked the representatives of the Sardinian people, and now asks the power from Parliament to accomplish the wishes of the whole Italian people, who have so expressed a desire to range themselves under the banner of Victor Emanuel. He would not wish, however, to encourage any idle bravado, then he contemplates the annexation of Central and Southern Italy, so as to form one kingdom with Sardinia.

Naples.—Bertani, late Secretary-General of the Dictator, writes to contradict the statement that he had given orders to oppose by force the entry of the Piedmontese troops into the Neapolitan territory. He also states that neither himself nor Garibaldi ever thought of connecting the immediate occupation of Rome at a risk of a conflict with France.

At last advices the Pope still remained at Rome. Gen. Lamoriciere had returned to France.

The French troops had occupied numerous places in the vicinity of Rome; and it was reported that a third division would be sent from France to reinforce the French troops there.

A letter from Rome says that the Piedmontese lancers galloped close to the gates of Rome in the chase of the pontifical gendarmes.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says the accounts from the Island of Sardinia speak of the commencement of measures by a secret agency there in favor of the annexation of the Island to France by the same means as were employed for the annexation of Savoy and Nice.

Gen. Cialdini has received orders to cross the Neapolitan frontier.

Garibaldi is about to enavoke an electoral college of the two Sicilies to vote by universal suffrage.

The Piedmontese corps d'armo in Naples will reach 20,000.

The new Pro-Dictator of Naples complimented Mazzini on his patriotism, but asked him to give proof thereof by leaving the country, telling him that even without intending he caused disunion.

There is now some probability of a Congress on the affairs of Italy.

The Piedmontese troops were expected before Capua on the 15th. It was anticipated that the Neapolitans would evacuate before their arrival and retire to Capua.

The Sardinian Chambers were debating the annexation vote, expected on the 11th.

It is reported that Russia was about to recall her ambassador at Turin.

Affairs in the States of the Church are unchenged.

A report was current that Gen. Lamoriciere had telegraphed to Marseilles to secure his passage in a steamer for Civita Vecchia.

The statement that the French would occupy Viterbo is confirmed. Marquis Depholi has gone to Viterbo to reassure the inhabitants that Victor Emanuel was at Macerata.

The statement is confirmed that Spain has proposed a Congress of the Catholic Powers at Gaeta.

It is reported that the French army of Rome is to be increased to 60,000 men. The garrison of Lyons is to be placed on a war footing.

Garibaldi had taken the south bastion of Capua, and the Royalists were retiring in the direction of Gaeta.

Victor Emanuel, after issuing a manifesto to the Southern States, had left for Naples. The Sardinian troops under his command would enter the Neapolitan territory at three different points on the 9th.

Austria is reinforcing her troops in Cilistria and Danatia.

The French troops have occupied Vitorbo, Velctor, Civita Vecchie, Castellano, Tivoli, Palestrino, Frascati, Albano and Valmelasson.

The programme for a future Congress will be examined at Warsaw, and then submitted for the approval of the French and English Governments.

The Pope's official journal claims Peter's Pence from all the faithful, but declared that the Pope will not accept a subsidy from any secular power.

THE EAST.

Damascus.—The official record of the executions at Damascus, which has just been published at Constantinople, says: "Of the 167 persons condemned to death among the insurgents arrested for having taken an active part in the events of Damascus, 56 have been publicly hanged in the streets of the town, and 111 have been shot in the principal square. Among the guilty who deserved capital punishment were men belonging to the notable families of the country, and they were executed without any distinction being made." On the 8th ult., Foad Pacha followed up these executions with those of the ex-governor of Damascus, Osman Bey, the Cahnacun of Hasbela, and Ali Bey. These persons were all shot and the whole of the Grand Council were afterwards arrested. Suspected persons to the number of nearly 4,000, had been arrested up to August 28, but the investigations had made the fact clear that the 66,000 Mussulmans in Damascus were alike guilty, and between 12,000 and 14,000 of them acknowledged the fact by fleeing the city and taking refuge with the Bedouins.

Jerusalem.—A letter from Jerusalem to Lo Mondo details an outrage which had recently been perpetrated in that vicinity. Some Bedouins seized a Christian woman who was assisting to guarding the vineyards from depredation, and having asked her whether she knew how "her prophet Jesus" died, stretched her upon the ground, and laid on her hands, feet and breast heavy stones. Then they left her. She was discovered hours after nearly dead.

Work of the A.-A. Relief Committee.—The "Anglo-American Relief committee" are now feeding about 13,000 persons every day, besides giving beds and clothing. Three or four of the American missionaries give pretty much of all their time to the work, and owing to the failure of supplies in the Leconal district of Lebanon, whither thousands of the refugees had fled, the tide of humanity is now pouring into Beirut. It is vain to urge the people to return to their villages while the Druses remain unsubdued, for there is no security.

Since the departure of Fuad Pasha from Syria, the Mussalman fanatics commenced to massacre, and killed twenty Christians. The remainder of the Christians are emigrating to Palestine. The Mussulman were furious against the Christians, and had threatened the life of the Russian Consul.

JAPAN.

Violation of the European Treaties.—A vessel, arrived at Victoria, British Columbia, from Hakodadi, Japan, after a month's passage, reports having found the Japanese unwilling to carry out the provisions of the treaty with the United States, in consequence of which she was unable to procure a cargo. All foreign coins passed only at a discount of fifty per cent. The Japanese had concluded a new treaty with Portugal. The French minister had resigned, as his representations in respect to the treaty met with no attention from the Japanese authorities.

CHINA.

Advices from China say that six hundred Pekin militia had been sent against the English, but that the Pekinese were generally favorable to the English.

The insurrection continues to extend.

DOMESTIC.

LOUISIANA.

Population of Shreveport and Caddo Parish.—The total population of Shreveport, according to the census, is 2856, against 1728 in 1850. The population of the parish is 16,490, against 8881 in 1850. Whites, 7239; blacks, 8257.

Death of a Louisiana Representative.—The Baton Rouge Advocate, of the 22d, says: We learn that the Hon. H. H. Miller, a Representative from the parish of St. Martin, was killed by falling from the upper deck of a steamboat which he was having repaired. His skull was badly fractured, besides receiving much internal injury.

Dengue.—This troublesome disease is prevailing in New Iberia and other parts of the parish of St. Martin to a considerable extent.

The Crops.—Almost every paper from the upper parishes speaks of heavy frosts, though no material damage appears to have resulted to the crops. In Alexandria, the cotton crops will sum up a full average one, and many planters will make heavy crops. Some of our planters have already commenced grinding, but the crop will hardly be a half one. Cotton beginn to be hauled in pretty freely, and in a few days the shipments of sugar and molasses will commence.

Remains of an Ancient Monster.—In the National Democrat, published in Rapides parish, we find the following: Our friend B. Mallefret has disentombed the remains of some gigantic antediluvian monster. We visited him on Tuesday, when he succeeded in taking out the upper jaw and head of some animal bearing some resemblance to the elephant—two tusks, about four feet in length, were taken out with the jaw and head. From the position of the remains they had accidentally been scattered, as the balance of the bones are not yet found. The spot in which these remains were found is just a few hundred yards above the lower falls, ten feet from the present height of the water, and on the Alexandria side.

MISSISSIPPI.

Cotton Crop in Western Mississippi.—The Hinds county Gazette says: The shortness of the present crop of cotton in this region may be inferred when we state that we have met with a number of planters during the past week who have already picked out their entire crops. When it is remembered that picking usually continues until December, it is evident that a great falling off has occurred. We subjoin to the opinion, expressed a month or two since, that the crop of Hinds county for 1860 will fall little one-half short of a full average crop.

Hinds County.—The total taxable wealth of Hinds county, Miss., in 1860, in land and negroes, is $29,000,000, divided among a total white population of 8337. Thus there are lands and negroes in the county sufficient to settle upon every white man, woman and child the snug sum of about three thousand four hundred and eighty dollars. Hinds stands at the head of all the counties in the State with its $29,000,000—Lowndes comes next, with $26,000,000—Bolivar and Yazoo next, with $25,000,000.

The Northeastern portion of Mississippi has also been visited with an unprecedented drouth, and there are thousands at acres of corn that will not make a peck to the acre.

ALABAMA.

An Old Man Murdered.—The Montgomery Advertiser of Tuesday last has the following: On Sunday morning last, just before daylight, a poor old man by the name of William Meredith, who resided in the vicinity of the Montgomery and West Point Railroad depot, was inhumanly assaulted, in front of his own door, by some unknown person. No one except the wife of the unfortunate man seems to have any knowledge of the affair; and although she saw several of the fatal blows struck, she was unable to discover whether the assaulting party was a white or black man. From the effect of the wounds received, which were probably produced with a club, the old man expired on Sunday night, in a perfect state of unconsciousness. He leaves a large family. We hope the perpetrator of this diabolical deed will yet be brought to justice.

Cotton at Montgomery.—The Mail of Tuesday says: Court street was excited this morning; cotton was in demand. We learn that dealers went out as far as Bogue Homa to meet the wagons. Good sign, cotton is yet king. It would not surprise us, if good middling should bring 11c. yet.

New Alabama Railroad.—The city of Columbus, Ga., has subscribed the handsome sum of $221,000 for the Opelika and Talladega railroad, and fifteen miles of the same, one-third of the stock, has been taken by the planters in work. A force of 100 hands is already on the ground, and this will soon be doubled.

TEXAS.

Indian Depredations.—The Waco Democrat, of the 19th says:—A letter from Belknap to parties here, says that the Indians had stolen some fifty or sixty head of horses from Captain Pete Ross and his scouting party, somewhere beyond Fort Radzulaski.

The Weather and the Crops.—The San Augustine Express says that the planters of Guadalupe county will make more cotton than they can pick. The LaGrange Democrat says that if warm weather continues a couple of weeks, and there be no worm, the second crop of cotton will "testify" by the first. Many acres have already been destroyed, and the ravages are going on. On the 14th inst. there was a frost in Houston—heavier than ever seen there before the middle of November. From Eastern and Northeastern Texas, we learn that crops of every description have been burnt up, as rain having fallen for months past.

Runaway Negroes.—The Gonzales Inquirer mentions a gang of five runaway negroes being found in that county, but escaping. Four others were taken and confined in jail; two of the last four were from the Brazos, and two from the railroad near Columbus.

Latest from the Rio Grande.—The San Antonio Ledger, of the 18th, says: By authentic information received at Department Headquarters, we learn that the best relations exist between Gen. Garcia, commanding at Matamoras and our officers on that line. The General had officially notified them that he had received a communication from Cortina, dated beyond the Sierra Madre, asking for pardon, with permission to come to Matamoros; he was answered that imprisonment and trial awaited his return. Subsequently Cortina went into Mexico, had rumor says has joined Miramon.

TENNESSEE.

Memphis.—During the past five years no city in the Union, except Chicago, has grown with the same rapidity as Memphis. In that time she has more than doubled her population and trebled her wealth and business. If she but increases in the same ratio that she has in the past, this city will contain a population of 100,000 by the year 1865.

Gen. Harding, a gentleman of great wealth, residing near Nashville, Tennessee, has a park including eight hundred acres. In it he has three hundred deer, about thirty buffaloes, and a herd of elk.

The Louisville and Nasbyille railroad is constructing a new depot in Nashville, to cost $85,000. It will be two hundred and ninety by one hundred and forty feet.

VIRGINIA.

Increase of Population.—The Richmond Enquirer states that in the last report of the Auditor of Public Accounts, is an estimate of the population in the state, showing an increase of 235,000. The Auditor has recently procured from the Deputy Marshal returns from a considerable number of counties, which shows that his estimate approximates quite nearly the result.—The actual returns of the counties referred to exceed the estimate in the West and fall below it in the East. The Enquirer observes that if the present representation in Congress is preserved, the increased population in the State, when taken in connection with the fractional excess at the last apportionment, will give three additional members of Congress.

Death of Commodore Skinner.—Another of the naval veterans of 1812 is dead. Commodore Charles M. Skinner, who had been nearly half a century an officer in the navy, departed this life on Monday, at Richmond.

KENTUCKY.

Artesian Well in Louisville, Ky.—The Artesian Well of Louisville, Ky., is the deepest that has been successfully bored. It was begun in 1857, by the Messrs. Dupont; is 2086 feet in depth; discharges 330,000 gallons every twenty-four hours and carries its flow to the height of 170 feet above the surface.

Prof. Herman M. Johnson has been elected President of Dickinson College, in place of Charles Collins, D.D., resigned. The graduating class this year was twenty-four.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The Clarendon (S.C.) Banner professes to have information of a plot in which a number of negroes and white men were implicated, having for its object the destruction of life and property. The negroes had procured armed by means of forged orders, and the design was to make an attack on the whites at a camp-ground near Sumpter.

The Dahlonega Mountain Signal, of the 13th inst., says that a deposit of twenty pounds five and a half ounces of gold was made at the branch mint, at that place, on Thursday last, from the Dora mine in South Carolina—the result of one week's work.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Improvements.—The people of North Carolina are enjoying their first excitement over the completion of their initial public improvement. The deepening, widening and straightening of the channel of the Beep River, navigable heretofore for only about 100 miles from the Seaport, (Wilmington,) has been so far improved as to afford safe transit for barges equal in capacity to our largest canal boats, as far as Farmville, something over two hundred miles from Wilmington. By this improvement the great coal and iron beds of the Farmville region have been reached, and facilities obtained for the cheap transport of ore and coal to the seaboard. The public inauguration of the completion of this work took place about the first of October. So much importance was attached to it, and so much pride felt by the people of "Old Rip Van Winkle," that the Governor and State officers were determined to commemorate the event by a grand public festival.

ARKANSAS.

The Crop.—From all we can glean from our exchanges, the evidence is plain that Arkansas, although suffering to a great extent from the recent drought, will be enabled to raise her own bread and some to spare, to say nothing of the cotton crop, which will be, at least, an average one.

Pine Bluff and Napoleon Railroad.—A portion of this road is to be let out to contractors about the 1st prox.

Telegraphic Communication.—New lines of telegraph are being rapidly put up in various sections of the state.

The dengue fever prevails in many of the towns on the Arkansas and white Rivers.

GEORGIA.

Spontaneous Productions of Georgia.—The Marietta Advocate says: Of mast there is a profusion sufficient to satisfy even the hoggish appetite of all porkers, and make great inroads for the scarcity of the corn crop. The woods are full of feeding animals, which have no need to go home hungry.—Of nuts there is no estimating the quantity. Chinquepins grin at you from every bush, while chestnuts, on a day when there is a brisk wind astir, fall at your feet, as if inviting you to take them up. As a consequence, the market is glutted, prices range low, and every urchin who has the least ambition to employ his masticators, can munch all day at a very trifling outlay.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Melancholy Incident.—Mr. Thomas Richards, an honored merchant of Philadelphia, died at his residence in that city on Thursday last, the fiftieth anniversary of his wedding. At the time of his decease the family were preparing for the celebration of a golden wedding, and the marriage of a daughter was to have been solemnized in a few days. Mr. Richards was taken with mortal illness a few minutes before the time fixed for the assembling of the company, and expired soon afterwards, in the 81st year of his age.

CALIFORNIA AND OREGON.

Terrible Massacre by Indians.—The Oregon overland mail arrived at Treka, Northern California, Oct. 9th, bringing dates from Vancouver, a town on the Columbia river, to the 3rd inst. H. Schreiber had just arrived at that place, with news of the massacre by the Snake Indians, of an entire emigrant train, consisting of forty-six persons, nineteen of whom were men, and the balance women and children. The party were first attacked about forty miles on the west side of Salmon Falls, on the 6th of September. The attack lasted about an hour. The Indians then withdrew and allowed the train to proceed five miles, and then attacked them again. The fight lasted two days and one night. On the afternoon of the 10th the Indians had possession of the whole train, with the exception of six men, who, being mounted, escaped. After traveling through the woods for nine days, these six were again attacked, and five of the party killed. Schreiber alone escaped by hiding in the bushes. After travelling seven days without food, he was found in an exhausted condition by some persons who took him to the Dalles. Of the nineteen males in the party, six were discharged soldiers from Fort Hall. Mr. Schreiber is the only one who escaped. He says that the six men who left on horseback did not leave until the Indians had complete possession of the train, and from the screams of the women and children he was led to believe that the whole party were butchered.

New Telegraph Lines.—On the 8th, telegraphic communication between Los Angeles and San Francisco was inaugurated, and was the occasion of a general jollification at Los Angeles. The line is to be continued further east on the Butterfield route, as fast as the company are able. The Placerville and Salt Lake Line is also progressing eastward from Carson Valley. Another stretch of thirty miles beyond Miller's station is about ready for use. Both lines anticipate connection with the great Continental Line, recently authorized by Congress.

The Italians of San Francisco held a grand celebration on the 9th, in honor of the entrance of Garibaldi into Naples.

The Broderick will, after a long contest to prove it a forgery, has finally been admitted into probate.

The population is set down thus: White males at 49,313; white females 23,965; Chinese 3,150; colored 1,605; total population, 78,083. The names registered in the Directory number 25,000, more than last year by 4,500. Since June, 1859, nearly 400 new buildings have been begun or completed, of which 140 are of brick. Several of the latter, for solidity, size and architecture, would be notable in any city in the Union. The number of buildings in the city and county is returned at 10,123. Of these 8,803 are wood, 1,461 of brick, 47 of iron, 6 of adobe, and 3 of stone. We have 208 attorneys, 248 boarding-house keepers, 170 brokers, 150 butchers, 120 carpenters, 136 cigar-makers, 275 clothiers and tailors, 62 dress-makers, 121 dry goods men, 373 in the furniture business, 800 liquor dealers, (!) 180 physicians, 84 watchmakers and jewellers, 84 restaurant keepers, 43 milliners, 61 stove and tin men, 30 upholsterers, 65 painters, 33 lumber establishments, 66 bakers, and 78 fruiterers.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Crops.—While great complaints are made concerning the crops of England and France, our own country, and especially the West, is sending most abundant fruit to the market. The grain crops of the United States this year are estimated by an experienced dealer at Chicago, as follows: "The whole wheat crop at 160,000,000 bushels, the Indian corn at 900,000,000 bushels, the other grains at 220,000,000 bushels, and the potatoes at 120,000,000 bushels, making the whole yield of breadstuffs, and the staple root, which comes into the same category, one thousand four hundred million bushels—enough to feed two hundred million people. The Mississippi Valley, properly cultivated, could victual the whole world.

Fearful Accident on the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway.—In the morning of Oct. 19, at about nine o'clock, the freight train going east, and the passenger train going west, at the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway, collided on a curve a mile and a-half west of Birmingham, and some twenty from Detroit, killing Dexter M. C. Nichols, express messenger, George M. Sines, mail agent of the passenger train, and Alexander Wilkie, fireman of the freight train. George Spencer, engineer of the freight train, had an arm broken. No others received injuries worthy of mention. Two baggage cars, two platform, and five box freight cars, with locomotives, were wrecked.

Population of Ohio.—The returns of the Marshall for the Northern district give 1,982,000—an increase in ten years, in the counties that now compose this district, of about 165,000. The returns of the Marshal for the southern district give the population at 1,474,187. This shows an increase of 200,000 in that district. The population of Ohio in 1850 was 1,980,329; in 1860, 2,556,187; increase 575,858.

Mayador.—Her son is also there, having preceded her a month. This re-union of the family at Paris may have been brought about by the late death of the Prince Jerome, as it is well known that Mr. Jerome Bonaparte is still anxious to test the legal questions involved in his mother's marriage.

A Treaty with the Indians.—Commissioner Greenwood returned from an official visit to the Cheyenne and Arapahoes, in the Pike's Peak country, having arranged with them the basis of a treaty. These Indians continue to be friendly, and some of their chiefs will exert themselves to induce the Kioways and Comanches to be on peaceful terms with the United States.

Mr. Bonsted, U.S. agent for the Stockbridge and Menominee Indians, of Wisconsin, has arrived in Washington. He reports that the Indians under his superintendence are divided into two classes—the Christians (of the Roman Catholic persuasion) and the Pagan, who hold to the doctrine of their fathers. They are well, and living very happily together.

New York city is getting to be almost as bad as Paris in the non-attendance of its population at church on the Sabbath. Reliable statistics, according to the New York Evangelist, a Presbyterian organ, show that only 200,000 out of 900,000 in the city go to all the churches on Sunday.

A Sweet Prince.—A candy statue of the Prince of Wales was manufactured by a St. Louis confectioner during the recent visit of the Prince to that city. It was placed upon the table where the Prince and his companions dined, and the Duke of Newcastle was so well pleased with it that he purchased it for presentation to the Queen.

Population of Minnesota.—The St. Paul Pioneer has complete returns from forty-five counties, which foot up 114,214 of population. Fourteen counties are yet to be heard from, whose population, the Pioneer estimates (on the basis of the census of 1857) at 62,500. This would give a total of 176,714.

Washington City Items.—Information from a reliable source has reached Washington, that the congress of Nicaragua will be convened to ratify the treaty between the United States and that republic within the time therein specified. Gen. Paez, a few days since, presented his credentials as Minister from Venezuela, and was received by the President in that capacity.

A firm in Amherst, Mass., are manufacturing about fifteen hundred pounds of artificial leather daily, from scraps of leather and old pieces of rope. It has not been introduced out of New England, yet the demand is reported to be greater than the supply. The process of making is similar to that of manufacturing paper.

KANSAS.

A telegram from Leavenworth, dated Oct. 23th, states that a company of sixty-dragoons, under the command of Captain Sturgess, accompanied by Indian Agent Corran, have been driving the settlers from the Cherokee neutral land. Seventy-four houses were destroyed by fire, and the occupants ejected. This affair has created much excitement in Southern Kansas. The statements, it is thought, have been exaggerated.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

Revivals.—The Baltimore Advocate says: "Revival meetings are still in progress in many of our churches. Many souls are converted every week, and considerable additions have been made to the membership of the church. In North Baltimore Station, at Monument-street church, some seventy souls have recently been converted, fifty of whom have joined the church.

The Methodists are pronounced the largest christian denomination in Ohio. They have effective institutions for education, and abundant wealth for their support. Methodism has done much in the formation of the moral character of the State. The denomination was never more vigorous there than it is at present.

The present year is the centenary of Methodism in the West Indies—Nathaniel Hilbert, speaker of the house of Antigua, having begun his Wesleyan labors there in 1760. Nearly 50,000 Methodists now belong to the West Indian missions.

The Cincinnati Conference, including the two German districts, has in active service 170 preachers, whose average salary is $170 a-year.

Since the erection of the first Methodist church in America, in 1760, there have been 14,000 erected—an average of three a-week.

That we consider it the duty of ministers of the Gospel, and would urge the discharge of that duty upon the ministers of this Synod, to preach frequently on the subject of missions, that the people may understand the nature of the missionary cause, and its claims to their support. 2. That we also consider it the duty of ministers to teach more fully the duty of consecrating our temporal substance to God, and of setting apart a portion of it to his special service; so that missionary operations may not lack support."

Legacy by Dr. Van Rensselaer.—The late Rev. Cortland Van Rensselaer has left to the Presbyterian Church in Burlington, N. J., a legacy of $6000, of which he directed $3000 to be expended in the purchase of a parsonage, $2000 for the support of the school attached to the church, and $1000 towards discharging the debt of the latter building. This has always been a feeble church, pecuniarly; and the deceased, during his life, was a steady and generous contributor to its wants. This contribution he has thus continued and made permanent at his death.

The Cumberland Presbyterian church has probably one of the most flourishing missions among the Choctaw Indians. There are seven hundred members.

CITY NEWS.

The Calamity on Lafayette Street.—Verdict.—The Inquest about the fearful calamity which occured a month ago, on Lafayette street, by the tumbling down of a wall, corner Lafayette and Tchoupitoulas streets, was closed yesterday. The verdict states that, the mass of testimony duly weighed, the jury has come to the conclusion that the accident was caused by the defient manner in which the house had been erected. As the local authorities have no right to oblige persons who build in this city, to have walls walls put up in a safe manner, the jury prays the Legislature to pass a law by which a board of supervisors may be appointed for New Orleans, whose duty it shall be to see that all new structures present every condition of solidity.

Health of the City.—The last report of Board of Health shows that there were 115 interments in the city cemeteries last week. Of the number, 42 were children of two years of age. Of the adults, 24 died by consumption.

COMMERCIAL:

Monday Evening, October 29, 1860.

Operations in our general market have been to a fair extent during the past week, with some irregularity in the demand for Cotton, the movement in which has been active and languid by turns. In Tobacco only a moderate business has been done. Sugar and Molasses at the new crop have begun to arrive pretty freely, but the supplies have generally met with a ready demand at full prices for desirable qualities. In Western Produce the transactions have been of a moderate character, without any important change in the condition of the market for the various articles coming under that head.

COTTON.—The market closed with some irregularity in prices but the business generally has been done at about the range of our quotations, which have undergone no material change during the week.

The receiptant this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrival from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 340,184 bales, against 397,732 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 164,996 bales. In the exports of the U.S. to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 48,630 bales to Great Britain, and of 15,718 to France, while to other foreign ports there is an increase of 1307 bales.

THE EMPEROR'S NEW CLOTHES.

[illegible] OF THE EMPEROR'S NEW CLOTHES.

[illegible] impression with which we presume ourselves, and [illegible] readily seize upon, as possessed others, of [illegible] by true observers, are never so admirably [illegible] the history of the Emperor's New [illegible]

[illegible] is the most difficult how every body in [illegible] of his own vision and his own fi[illegible] [illegible] just; and with what cautious wisdom [illegible] of trust in all the why [illegible] of a little [illegible]

[illegible] there lived an Emperor who cared so very [illegible] about having new clothes, that he spent all his money [illegible] for the sake of being very smartly dressed. He [illegible] his troops; he did not care [illegible] to the play or driving out, unless it [illegible] show his new clothes. He had a new [illegible] for every hour in the day; and as one usually says of [illegible] "He is in his council," one would [illegible] of him it was always said, "The Emperor is [illegible] his wardrobe."

[illegible] city of his residence went so merry. Who had no [illegible] of strangers arrived at court; [illegible] a couple of swindlers, who called themselves weavers, and made their appearance. They [illegible] not only the colors and patterns were extremely [illegible] but the clothes made of such stuffs possessed [illegible] property of remaining invisible to him [illegible] was not fit for the office he held, or who was extremely [illegible]

"What capital clothes they must be!" thought the Emperor. "If I had but one of a suit I could directly find out what people in my empire were not equal to their office; and besides, I should be able to distinguish the clever from the stupid. I must have some of this stuff made directly for me." And so he ordered large sums of money to be given to the two swindlers, that they might set to work immediately.

The men erected two looms, and did as if they worked very diligently; but in reality they had got nothing on the loom. They boldly demanded the finest silk and gold thread, put it all in their own pockets, and worked away at the empty loom till quite late at night.

"I should like to know how the two weavers are getting on with my stuff," said the Emperor, one day, to himself; but he was rather embarrassed when he remembered that a silly fellow, or one unfitted for his office, would not be able to see the stuff. 'Tis true, he thought, as far as himself, there was no risk what; but yet [illegible] sending [illegible] one else to bring his diligence [illegible] weavers. How every [illegible] of [illegible] wonderful property that this stuff was said to possess, and all were curious to know how clever or [illegible] their neighbors might be found to be.

"I will send my worthy old minister," said the Emperor, "to the weavers, that he may see how the stuff looks; for he is a man of sense, and nobody can be more fit for his office than he is."

The worthy old minister went to the room where the knaves were working away with all their might at the empty looms. "Lord help me!" thought the old man, and opened his eyes as wide as possible; "why I can't see anything!" But he took care not to give voice to his thoughts.

The swindlers begged him most politely to have the goodness to step nearer to the looms; and then asked him if the colors were not very beautiful, and the pattern [illegible] They then pointed to the empty frames, and the poor old minister looked and looked, and could see nothing whatever; for indeed, there was nothing at all there. "Bless me!" thought he to himself, "can it be possible I am a simpleton? Well, I never [illegible] and nobody dare know it. I not fit for my [illegible] nothing on earth shall make me say that I cannot see the stuff."

"Well, sir," said one of the swindlers, still working busily, "you don't say if the stuff pleases you or not."

"Oh, beautiful, beautiful! the work is admirable!" said the minister, looking at the loom through his spectacles. "This pattern, and these colors!—well, well; I shall not fail to tell the Emperor that both are most admirable."

"Well, we shall be delighted if you do so," said the men, and named the different colors and patterns which were really there. The old minister listened attentively to what they said, in order that he might be able to repeat it to the Emperor on his return.

The swindlers then asked for more money, and silk and gold thread, which they said they wanted to finish the piece they had begun. But they put as before, all that was given to them into their own pockets, and still continued to work with apparent diligence at the empty loom.

Some time after the Emperor sent another officer to see how the work was getting on, and if the piece of brocade would soon be finished. But he fared like the others, and looked at the loom from every side; but as there was nothing there, of course he could only see the empty looms. "Does not the stuff appear to you as much as it did the honorable gentleman, your predecessor?" asked the swindlers, and talking of splendid colors and [illegible]

"Stupid I certainly am not," thought the new commissioner; "then it must be that I am not fitted for my lucrative office—that were a good joke! however no one must observe—[illegible] reads a thing." And so he began praising the stuff, which he could not see, and told the two swindlers how pleased he was to behold such colors and such charming patterns. "Indeed, your Majesty," said he to the Emperor on his return, "the stuff which the weavers are preparing is extraordinary!"

The magnificent brocade that the Emperor was having woven at his own expense was the talk of the whole town.

[illegible] wished to see the costly stuff while it was on the loom; so accompanied by a chosen train of courtiers, among whom were the two trusty men who had so received the weaver, he went to the two cunning cheats. As soon as they heard of the Emperor's approach they [illegible] with all diligence, although as yet there was not a single thread on the loom.

"Is it not magnificent?" said the two officers of the crown. "Will your Majesty only look? What a charming pattern! what splendid colors!" said they, pointing to the empty frames, for they thought the others really could see the stuff.

"What's the meaning of this?" said the Emperor to himself. "I see nothing! This is a terrible matter! Am I [illegible] or am I not fit to be Emperor? Why, that is the worst and could happen to me!" Oh charming," said he aloud, "it has my most gracious approbation!" And he smiled graciously, and examined the looms attentively; for he would not for all the world say that he could not see what the officers had so much praise. The whole suite examined their eyes to discover something on the looms, but they could see as little as the Emperor. "Oh, how beautiful!" and counselled his Majesty to have some robes made out of this magnificent stuff for the great procession which was soon to take place. "Exquisite! charming!" was echoed from mouth to mouth, and every one seemed pleased. The Emperor was as [illegible] his courtiers and conferred on each of the cheats [illegible] which they were to wear in their button-hole, and gave them the title of "Knights of the most honorable Order of the Loom."

The night preceding the day on which the procession was to take place, the two men stayed up all night, and had sixteen candles burning [illegible] as to get the Emperor's [illegible] observed [illegible] pretended to unroll [illegible] the air with their [illegible] as if cut [illegible] with a pair of [illegible] that had no thread. Now [illegible] said they, "the Emperor's new suit is ready at [illegible]

[illegible] the Emperor came in the chamber [illegible] the Most Honorable Order of the Loom" [illegible] accompanied by his chamberlains of the highest [illegible] and the two cheats held up their arms as though [illegible] something in their hands, and said, "Here are [illegible] here is the coat, and here [illegible] mantle. The whole suit is as light as a cobweb; one might [illegible] one [illegible] would almost fancy one had [illegible] nothing on; but that is just the beauty of the stuff!"

"Of course!" said all the courtiers, although not a single one of them could see anything of the clothes.

"Will your Imperial Majesty most graciously be pleased to undress?" said they; "we will then try on the new things before the glass."

The Emperor allowed himself to be undressed, and the two cheats did exactly as if each one helped him on with an article of dress, while his Majesty turned himself about and about before the mirror.

"How well the dress becomes your Majesty! and how well all that! What a pattern! What colors! This is indeed a dress worthy of a king!"

"The canopy which is to be borne above your Majesty in the procession is in readiness without," announced the chief master of the ceremonies.

"I am quite ready," replied the Emperor. "Do my dress look well?" asked he, turning round once more before the looking-glass, in order that it might appear that he examined the dress very minutely.

The grooms who were to carry the Emperor's train felt about on the ground as if to lift up the end of the mantle, and did exactly as if they were carrying something, for they also did not wish to betray simplicity or unfitness for their post.

And so the Emperor walked on, under the high canopy through the streets of the metropolis, and all the people in the streets and at the windows cried out, 'Oh, how beautiful the Emperor's new dress is! what a splendid train there is to the mantle, how well it sits!' In short, there was nobody that wished to chest himself in the belief that he saw the highly valued clothes, for otherwise he would have had to acknowledged himself either a simpleton or an awkward fellow. As yet none of the Emperor's new dresses had met with such approval as these invisible ones.

"But the Emperor has nothing on!" said a little child.

"Ah, listen to the voice of innocence!" said the father, and one person whispered to the other what the child had said.

"But he really has nothing on!" exclaimed at last all the people.

This vexed the Emperor, for he felt that they were right. But he thought to himself, "I must bear the procession now!" And the lords of the bed-chamber placed themselves more proudly than ever, for they pretended to enroll [illegible] they got hold in the air with their [illegible] as if they were carrying a train which [illegible] and were [illegible]

HOW TO FORETELL WEATHER.

In a manual of the barometer, compiled by Rear Admiral Fitzroy, and just published by the board of trade, the following useful observations occur:

Whether clear or cloudy, a rosy sky at sunset presages fine weather; a red sky in the morning bad weather, or much wind, perhaps rain; a high dawn, wind; and a low dawn, fair weather. Soft looking or delicate clouds foretell fine weather, with moderate or light breezes; hard edged, oily looking clouds, wind. A dark, gloomy, blue sky is windy; but a light, bright blue sky indicates fine weather. Generally, the softer clouds look the less wind, but perhaps more rain may be expected; and the harder, more "greasy," rolled, lofted, or ragged, the stronger the coming wind will prove. Also, a bright yellow sky at sunset presages wind; a pale yellow, wet; and these, by the prevalence of red, yellow, or gray tints, the coming weather may be told very nearly; indeed, if aided by instruments, almost exactly. Small inky-looking clouds foretell rain; light scud clouds driving across heavy masses show wind and rain; but it alone, may indicate wind only.

High upper clouds crossing the sun, moon or stars, in a direction different from the lower clouds, or the wind, a direction different from that below, foretell a change of wind. When sea-birds fly out early, and far to seaward, moderate wind and fair weather is expected. When they hang about the land, or over it, sometimes flying inland, expect a strong wind with stormy weather. There are other signs of a coming change in the weather known less generally than they be desirable, and therefore worth notice; such as when birds of long flight, rooks, swallows, or others, hang about home, and fly up and down, or low—rain and wind may be expected. Also, when animals seek sheltered places, instead of spreading over their usual range; when pigs carry straw to their sties; when smoke from chimneys does not ascend readily, or straight upward during a calm, an unfavorable change is probable. Dew is an indication of fine weather; so is fog. Neither of these two formations occur under an overcast sky, or when there is much wind. One sees fog occasionally rolled away, as it were, by wind, but seldom or never formed while it is blowing.

DON'T BE DISCOURAGED, MOTHER.

Don't be discouraged, mother. What though the boys are rude and rough; that should not discourage you.—The new farm is rough and rugged when the husbandman first set his foot to till it, but by patient toil, he gradually extirpates the noxious [illegible] boulders, levels the knolls, and fills the hollows. If the soil seem at first to refuse a return for its toil—presenting only heaps of rocks, and sore unsightly heaps of barren earth—don't let him be discouraged, for there is a mine of wealth in the deeply dug and well-wrought field, which shall soon yield ample [illegible] for the labor and patience invested. The old marsh shall be [illegible] with beauty and health. The sand-hill shall yet be spread with a carpet of green that a monarch even might be proud to own and tread. The boulders shall yet kiss the feet of both the proud and humble—the poor and the rich, and draw forth praises from the man of science and of taste. The tough, unsightly stone shall yet yield the food that feeds the tiller. Don't be discouraged, mother; for those very forbidding characteristics in your boy, when checked and moulded by an intelligent and persevering discipline, will be of vast worth to him when a man. It may cost more to subdue and direct a stubborn will, but when the work is done you have made an efficient commander. It may cost more to polish the rude boy, but you have succeeded in giving the world a man instead of a statue. There is a jewel under that forbidding frown and hostile resentment. If you would realize its full value, be very patient. Train surely and carefully. Your investment may not at once yield you a return; nay it may be years ere it affords you much fruit of a desirable beauty or richness; but be well assured of this—the more diligent and patient your toil, the sooner will you be blessed with a satisfactory return.

VALUE OF SYMPATHY.

A poor widow, the mother of two children, used to call on them, at the close of each day, for the report of the good they had done. One night the oldest hesitated in her reply to her mother's question: "What kindness have you shown?" "I don't know, mother." The mother, touched with the tone of her answer, resolved to unravel the mystery, and the little, sensitive thing, when re-assured, went on to say: "Going to school this morning, I found little Annie G., who had been absent some days, crying very hard. I asked her, mother, what made her cry so, which made her cry more, so that I could not help leaning my head on her neck, and crying too. Then her sobs grew less and less, till she told me of her dear little baby brother whom she nursed so long and loved so much; how he had sickened, grown pale and thin, whining with pain until he died, and then they put him away from her forever. Mother, she told me this; and then she hid her face and cried as if her heart would break. I took out my page of the book, and cried, too, as if her heart would break. page of the book, and cried, too, as if her heart would break. ter we had cried together a long time, she hugged and kissed me, telling me I had done her good. Mother, I don't know how I did her good, for I only cried with her. That is all I can tell, for I can't tell how I did her good."

SLEEPING UNDER THE CLOTHES.

There is reason to believe that not a few of the apparently unaccountable cases of scrofula among children proceed from the habit of sleeping with the head under the bed clothes, and so inhaling air already breathed, which is further contaminated by exhalations from the skin.

Parents are sometimes given to a similar habit; and it often happens that the bed-clothes are so disposed that the patient must necessarily breathe air more or less contaminated by exhalations from the skin. A good nurse will be careful to attend to this. It is an important part, so to speak, of ventilation.

It may be worth while to remark, that when there is any danger of bed sores, a blanket should never be placed under a patient. It remains damp, and acts like a poultice. Never use anything but light Whitney blankets as covering for the sick. The heavy cotton impervious counterpane is bad, for the very reason that it keeps in the exhalations from the sick person; while the blanket allows them through. Weak patients are inevitably distressed by the great weight of bedclothes, which often prevent their getting any sound sleep whatever.—Florence Nightingale.

CHEWING GUM.

Trifling as the subject may appear, yet it is of importance. It is of importance to have sound teeth in middle life and old age; proper precaution must be used in childhood. The habit of chewing gum is like applying small air-pumps to the bases of the teeth. When the gum is separated from the teeth, it forms a vacuum between itself and the tooth, and the consequence is a violent strain on the dental nerves. Bad results may not show themselves immediately, but the boy or girl who indulges in the habit may calculate on having rotten teeth when in the prime of life. Nor is this all. The habit, like tobacco-chewing, induces an unnatural flow of the humors toward the mouth, where it must be ejected as saliva.—This is bad enough when it can be ejected; but, when from sickness or other causes the habit must be discontinued, the result may be, and no doubt has been, fatal.

AMERICAN NEWSPAPERS.—There are about three hundred daily papers in the United States. A first class daily paper in the large commercial cities has generally about twelve editors and reporters, forty printers, two proof-readers, thirteen pressmen, engineers, and others employed in the press-room; half-a-dozen correspondents in Europe, two or three regular correspondents in Washington, thirty-five person in the clerk, wrapping and mailing departments, and about as many more engeged as carriers.

As our large and noble forests are fast disappearing before the rapid strides of advancing civilization, the question often suggests itself: "From what source are those who come after us to derive their wood for building, fuel, etc.?" The islands surrounding the continent contain sufficient timber lands to meet whatever demands there may be for ages to come. Cuba alone has 13,400,000 acres of forest land, whose wood is valuable either for purposes of use or ornament.

FROM THE SABBATH-SCHOOL TO THE CHURCH.—"The Rev. Dr. Tyng states," says the Tribune, "that in the thirty-one years he has been a city pastor, and personally connected with large Sabbath-schools, he has received over 500 youths of both sexes to the Lord's table directly from the Sabbath-schools, and he has no doubt that 200 more united with his church as a result of the influencement previous Sunday-school instruction."

The population of Philadelphia is 640,000. Manufacturing capital, $150,000,000.

A Californian, while chopping wood a while ago, found in the butt of a hollow tree a bag of gold-dust worth $7,000.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MR. WILLIAM TABOR died in Lafourche Parish, Louisiana, aged 66 years, on 23d October. The deceased was long and well known among us. He had been a soldier, a citizen officer, and an old sinner. About two years since, he joined the Methodist Church on probation. Twelve months ago a heavy affliction rested upon him, which led him to the foot of the cross, during which time the clouds of doubt and error disappeared, and Heaven shed a flood of light upon his awakened soul. He died in peace.

CIRCUIT ANNALS.

The time has been, if circuit preaching were announced, people went out expecting to hear preaching. There is, in the Alabama Conference, a circuit generally called a hard circuit; some do not like to be sent there. The writer has held membership in this circuit for twenty-one years, and from close observation we see that there is as much fault among the preachers as there is in the people. In 1841 it was common for "old John" to be fed, the night preceding the appointment for preaching, some where near the church. The congregation hurried to get there by the regular hour, knowing his rider was a fast man, and did things up in the right way when he got there. A few years after this we hear of old John and his persevering master, on a certain district. No matter how cold, nor how rainy, even if the bridges were gone, old John headed or swam the creeks, and always got to quarterly meeting. We should like to have a few more of these energetic men; they are the men to keep the church alive and in a healthy condition.

In 1849 we were served by Rev. D. B. L.; in 1851 by T. W. M.; in 1852 and 1853 by R. W. S.; all of them now sleep in Jesus. Though dead, they yet speak, and their works do follow them. Scarcely a family can say "they never visited me." No, we were visited at our humble cottages; the children were catechised and prayed with; some that were just old enough to call them "buddie," were so attached to them, that when their obituaries, one by one, came out (they by this time have learned to read) they read a little, and, with flowing tears, exclaimed, "I am so sorry he is dead! I thought I would get to see him again!" Some of the dear ones have no doubt met them, and they are now singing praises together. Some are here yet, cherishing in their young hearts a hope of meeting them in that happy land. Children never forget such examples.

Let us have such a man as we had the latter part of 1856 and 1857, and we will insure his quarterage, his missionary and his conference money. And by his diligence, perseverance, and practicality, he will send you from almost every appointment on his work, something for publication. We see his name frequently among the receipts, and revivals, organizing societies, getting new churches built. We can sympathize with those good people over there, when they have to give him up, at the end of this Conference year. But they must not complain; let him go, and do all the good he can for others. Send him back, and let us share of his labours, for we really need some one to preach for us.

The first Sunday in January was unusually cold, but being the day appointed for preaching, some ventured over snow and ice to hear the new preacher. It was a disappointment. We continue it for February. The time rolls round, the roads very muddy, but being a bright day, and having had no preaching since October, at an early hour there is a good congregation assembled. All anxious to see what for a looking man he is, and what he has to say. General inquiry, "did he stay at your house last night? Has he not come into the neighborhood yet?" "He may have come to brother C's." But here comes brother C.'s family, and they have heard nothing of him. We continue the appointment, hoping to hear from him soon—not a word, until about dusk on Saturday evening, before the first Sunday in March. He gets to old brother F's; the news gets out, the long looked for new preacher has come. When he gets to church he finds a very fair collection of persons, who gladly hail him. After preaching, he tells us the first quarterly meeting is over, and he knew nothing of it. This is accounted for by the high waters and irregularity in the mail; tells us he was sick when he should have been here before, and that we may look for him at every appointment, unless sickness or some unavoidable circumstance prevents.

Friday morning, before the first Sunday in April, the Presiding Elder gets here, and says "there is to be quarterly meeting at your church to-morrow and next day." We had not heard of it before. The preacher in charge gets here and tells us he has let the official members know of it. Saturday, on ordinary turn out; Sunday night; no preaching. Sunday, a beautiful day; large congregation; and so valiantly did that venerable elder defend his Master's cause, that he will long be remembered by his dear ones! He then administered the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; and the same to the colored members in the evening. So ends our second quarterly meeting. The first Sunday in May our preacher gets here, preaches, and receives one by letter into the church; baptizes and receives a probationer; drops one who has been indulging in the use of ardent spirits, bears rather hard on drunkenness; some think a little hard of him, but as he was only dealing with unruly members of the church, we commend him, and think it the duty of every preacher to deal plainly with the members under his charge, and prune the unfruitful branches of the vine, that it may flourish. Preaches to the blacks, and is gone. Some complain, but he promises to come early in the week next time, and bring wife with him, and visit round. The sisters brush up considerably; every one thinks he will be at her house by Saturday night. Sunday morning he gets in at 11 o'clock; preaches; we cant tell from whence he came nor whither he is gone. The first Sunday in July we meet, and as we are trying to organize a Sabbath School, we are engaged till the hour for preaching. He has never said a word about Sabbath Schools, nor told the young that it was wrong to break the Sabbath. We think he is not coming. After singing a hymn, and engaging in prayer, we purpose leaving. But while prayer is being offered in his behalf, he comes at half past 11 o'clock, warm and tired, having ridden between fifteen and twenty miles; preaches, and renders in his excuse. We think, under the circumstances, we could have borne with him if he had not come at all, having left a dear sister very ill, and wishes to be with her in her last hours. The first Sunday in August we meet early, hurrying, through Sabbath school. Eleven o'clock, and no preacher; but as he has been in the habit of coming in at and after the eleventh hour, we think he may get here yet. After the congregation has adjourned, some gone home, a brother gets a note from him stating he has a chill this morning, eight or nine miles from the church. Of course we bear with him, but perhaps if he had come a little nearer the church the day before, he might have missed that chill, and we could have sympathized more with him, if he had been where we could have waited on him. Two weeks after this the stewards gets a letter from him stating he will commence a protracted meeting for us on Saturday before the first Sunday in September. We make ready for attending all the time. Saturday, a large congregation for a week day; some at night; Sunday a large congregation, and several from a distance; but no preacher. We feel bad enough for ourselves, but worse for those who have come so far expecting to be at a good meeting. Fortunately there is a good brother from a neighboring circuit here. We get him to make a few remarks in the way of exhortation. O, that we had more such men to fill our vacant pulpits! No news from our preacher until Friday morning; we see a young man passing through the neighborhood, inforning us that there is to be preaching at the church to-morrow. Some ask him if he thinks he will get here. "Yes, I left him at our house; the steward and another brother to guard him till I get back. We will have him there this time." Saturday, there is a few out; some, like doubting Thomas, stay away till they hear he is there fulfilling his promise. Tells us the reason he was not here last week; he had a good meeting and could not leave it. He hopes to have a good time here, and so do we. At night his congregation increases. Sunday, it is larger than we anticipated. Night, five mourners at the altar. Monday, brother K., a Baptist preacher, is here, remains Tuesday, doing us good service. Night, brother Mac. is here, going to remain several days. Wednesday, our preacher is sick; sends word to brother Mac. to do the best he can. This he does, almost alone. Thursday, our preacher is out, but able to preach; his presence does us good. The meeting is prosperous. Friday night, brother Mac. sends word that he is unable to be with us even the next day, but thinks he can preach for us on Sunday. It grieves us to hear our preacher say he is going to leave to-morrow, to attend his sister's funeral on Sunday. Yet we remember he could not leave a good meeting last week to come here, and as here are over 20 penitents at the altar, he will certainly fulfil his promise, get help, and come back that we may have a revival that shall long be remembered. Before the exercises are closed he opens the door of the church to receive members; says it is unnecessary to make any remarks, as the rules of our church are known. How is this known? Has he read them once a quarter? Has he read them once in three quarters? Has he met the class? Has he told us to remember Friday before each quarterly meeting, as a day of fasting and prayer for the prosperity of Zion? Has he visited his members, and distributed disciplines and other good works among them? We cannot say what he has done elsewhere. Saturday morning before leaving, tells some one if he should not get back, to have an appointment made for him for the third Sunday in October, as the fourth quarterly meeting embraces the first. This has never been mentioned from the pulpit; not half the members know it is quarterly meeting. We have never heard of him since. We should not be surprised to hear that our hard circuit is complained of again. But we cannot help it. It is bad enough to have to bear with these disappointments without our paying a man for them. We love our preachers, and some of us, if we have but one dollar, want our preacher to have his share of that. If any of you should see him, send him on, and if you cannot get him to come, write to us; postage is cheap now-a-days.

A METHODIST.

J. R. GRAVES AND THE METHODIST CHURCH.

We never allow, in this paper, attacks upon any of our sister Churches, treating them always as co-ordinate branches of the "Holy Catholic Church." In sometimes noticing, under peculiar circumstances, the attacks of the aolorious J. R. Graves and his satellites, we do not regard ourselves as departing from the rule. He has been regularly expelled from the Baptist Church, and that is his position at the present time. In proof, we quote the following from the Baptist Standard, of August 25, published at Nashville, Tenn. That paper says:

"We have of late received frequent letters, of which the following extract from a brother is a specimen: 'The report has reached here that J. R. Graves is an excluded member of the Baptist Church. Graves himself, when here, told us that the report was entirely unfounded. Is he an excluded member, or not? Please let me know.' For the information of his brother, and all others, we take occasion to say thus publicly, that, in October, 1858, J. R. Graves was charged before the Church with 'grossly immoral and unchristian conduct;' was found guilty, and was expelled from the Church; that, soon after, he was advertised as an expelled member; that he has never been restored; and is this day an expelled member, having no connection with any regular Baptist Church whatever; the pretended Church with which he claims connection being a little faction, expelled soon after he was, for schism, disorder, and abuse, and defamation of the Church. Mr. J. R. Graves is an expelled member of the Baptist Church His true status is therefore that of any other person of like character, who goes preaching through the country, and imposing upon the Churches."

The above will enable all our readers to understand the following account from Rev. John A. Spence, of the Alabama Conference, of a discussion at Campbellton, Florida, between Rev. Mr. Carver, of the same Conference, and Rev. Mr. Lacy, not a Baptist, but a Gravesite. Should our preachers discuss with such men? Mr. Spence says:

I would not have troubled you with this notice, had I not seen a one-sided view of it in the Landmark Banner, a Baptist paper published at Athens, Georgia. The discussion was on the "merits" of the Iron Wheel, between Mr. Lacy (Baptist), and brother Carver, of the Alabama Conference. It lasted two days, when it was suddenly closed by the committee who presided, and the vote of the congregation, before brother Carver had proceeded half through his specifications. Here perhaps the matter would have ended, had not Mr. L. introduced new matter in his closing speech, repeating meanwhile a string of falsehoods, to which brother C. was not allowed to reply. This determined brother C. to appoint another time and place to reply to Mr. L., and also to finish his expose of the Wheel. He notified Mr. L. of the "time and place," and requested his attendance and replication if he desired it. But Mr. L., for reasons best known to himself, declined attendance. Brother C. is a young man, but sustained every point the day that I heard him, which was the last, beyond successful contradiction. The following "points" were under discussion, and taken from the Iron Wheel. "Bishops and Presiding Elders do not preach;" "bishops control all our presses, and hold all our church property;" "bishops are not responsible to any tribunal;" "Mr. Wesley was the right of petition;" "Methodist ministers can receive, try, and expel from the Church whom they please."

Now, every Methodist, and unprejudiced Baptist in the land, know every one of the above assertions to be false. But Mr. L. did attempt proof. To disprove brother C's. argument on the right of petition, he quoted Henderson and Hamil. Pardon us if we know no such rights, if we comprehend no such privileges! This quotation referred to no book, chapter or verse, and I don't think brother Hamil corrected the perversion. It is taken from Bangs' History of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is its If a reply to a petition, received and acted on by the general Conference. It reads thus:—"But if by rights and privileges it is intended to signify something foreign from the institutions of the church, as we received them from our fathers, pardon us if we know no such rights, if we cannot comprehend such privileges."

The word "petition" is not in the quotation at all, and had no reference to it; it was a reply to the memorialists, who claimed the natural right (aside from the Scriptures) of lay representation. But let him try again. He quoted from Bishop Hamline's speech before the General Conference of 1844, on Bishop Andrew's case, to prove that Methodist ministers could expel whom they pleased from the Church, without even the form of a trial. Who ever heard before of Methodists being tried and expelled by Bishop Hamline's speech? Bishop Hamline endeavored to show that as Bishops and Presiding Elders could remove and change ministers, in view of greater ministerial success, without any form of trial, so the General Conference had power to remove Bishop Andrew for the same reason. Bishop Hamline said nothing about the trial, etc. of church members. The co-editor of the Landmark Baptist, who gave a one-sided view of the discussion, tells us that Mr. Lacy's opponent was a "circuit rider," a "consequential hero," "a superfellious Methodist preacher," "a nameless somebody." He blames brother Carver for "vainly attempting to crush his brother Graves, for exercising full religious freedom." So I suppose Graves must be permitted to enjoy "full religious freedom," in telling lies upon the Methodist Episcopal Church, a freedom, no doubt, he would delight to enjoy. This new "Landmark" luminary tells us that, "no Pedo-baptist organization is the kingdom (or church)." Hence not only Methodists, but Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Lutherans, &c. are all outside worldlings. The Baptist is the only church, and their ministers the only Gospel ministers.

A PASTORAL LETTER.

MR. EDITOR:—Through the goodness and mercy of my Heavenly Father, I am permitted to record the triumphs of the gospel of his grace, in these ends of the earth; a result of which I, at one time, almost despaired. For, being attacked, soon after the last session of our Conference, with hemorrhage of the lungs, I was compelled to abate my labors in a great degree. Not, however, to the neglect of the work; for though suffering more or less almost constantly up to the 1st of August, I lost no time, but could not preach with that energy which I believe to be necessary to success. Hence my despondency. "But man's extremity is" often "God's opportunity;" and this strength is always "made perfect in weakness." Most gladly, therefore, will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me." To Him be glory for ever and ever: Amen.

The good work has not abated through human weakness, but constantly increased in volume and power—has deepened and widened during the year, and throughout the entire charge, with the exception of two places, at which their profiting is not so manifest.

The Church, in this region, is in a flourishing condition—Methodism was never more prosperous than at present. To illustrate which, and in attestation of the fact: First, an unusually large proportion—in fact, nearly all, of our last year's ingathering have been received to full fellowship. And what is equally convincing is, that notwithstanding the long domination of the Baptist Church in this country, and the consequent general predilection in favor of their peculiar dogma, that Immersion is the only valid baptism; not one of our large increase has demanded the ordinance by that mode. Nay, even the children of Baptist parents—for some of them have joined our Church—have asked it by affusion; which things prove clearly, to those acquainted with the past history of this country, that a great reaction has taken place in the public mind, within a comparatively short period; for as late as 1856, the few,—and they were but few—adult applicants for baptism, mostly preferred it by immersion. In view of the reaction of public sentiment on this subject, as well as of the controlling influence which our Church now possesses over the masses, "my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth."

Secondly, quite an encouraging number, fifty in all, have been admitted to probationary membership; and the prospect is good for the addition of many others before the year closes.

Thirdly, and pre-eminently, as evincing the thoroughness and divine character of the work, conversions—clear, powerful, Scriptural conversions.—I know not how many, but a goodly number have gladdened the hearts of God's people, and swelled the chorus of their song to thrilling peals of rapturous praise.

Fourthly, the membership of the Church are generally united in heart, and harmonious in action; manifesting greater zeal and activity than they have done for years past. May they become still more firmly cemented in love, and abound in all good works.

Fifth and finally. The congregations have held up and constantly increased; showing marked attention and seriousness on all occasions. From the whole, Methodism—which is but another name for Bible Christianity—is becoming a power in the land, and I anticipate the day not very far distant when it will forever subvert and take the place of error and bigotry, which have so long, too long alas! trammeled and enslaved the minds of men. It is not assumed that the Methodist Church will embrace the entire community, by no means; but only that while the old cognomens may remain, the vital organism, and consequently the distinctive features will be Methodistic. This result, however, will not, cannot be attained by heated public discussions or pulpit animadversions and raillery; nor yet by private personal controversies—these serve only to engender strife and every evil work, and should be avoided as the bane of religion; but by preaching the pure word of God without any admixture of foreign elements; and a persistent consistency in administering the ordinances and discipline of the Church, conjoined with a godly walk and conversation on the part of all, both ministers and people. That the preachers who may succeed to this charge, and the membership thereof may walk by this rule and realize the above results, these suggestions are made; and as they are clearly deducible from the word of God, and confirmed and illustrated by experience and observation, it is hoped that they will not be unacceptable to a majority of your readers.

I have now been, in some way, associated with this dear people for four years, first and last; have labored hard, even to almost entire exhaustion, but have had cause for almost constant rejoicing in the success of my Master's cause, and in the affections of a devoted people. And now that the time is at hand when I must give place to others, I devoutly pray the Great Head of the Church to give them "pastors according to his heart, and who shall feed them with knowledge and understanding, and lead them beside the still waters of life. May my successors prove more abundantly useful in forwarding the great gospel enterprize than their predecessors have been, and be the honored instruments in bringing, not hundreds only, but thousands of wayward sinners to the Cross of Christ.

B. H. WHITTINGTON.

WESTVILLE CIRCUIT, Miss. Conf., Oct. 3, 1860.

LETTER FROM BALTIMORE.

MR. EDITOR:—The excitement of the visit of the Prince of Wales and suite is now over with us. His visit was but a short one here, as he arrived on Monday evening, and departed on Tuesday at noon. Many of our citizens had seen him when he passed through here last week on his way to Washington city. He was conveyed in an open barouche, accompanied by Mayor Swann.

Our Municipal election passed off on Wednesday last with entire quiet. Rowdyism has been entirely subdued, and the elective franchise restored to all our citizens under our new police arrangements, and the prompt administration of justice by the newly appointed Judge of the Criminal Court. The late subdivision of all the wards into four different election precincts, tended also materially to prevent any disorder at the polls. The Reform [illegible] Council were elected by large majorities. The results of this election, however, indicate no party triumph, and no party defeat, as citizens of all political parties supported the Reform ticket. Our people prefer to have a city government irrespective of political or party preferences, or party prejudices. No city in the Union can now boast of greater order, quiet and safety, than Baltimore.

You are doubtless familiar with our ecclesiastical agitations. It is feared that our situation is a perilous one. There appears to be such a diversity of sentiment both among our preachers and people, that there seems to be danger of a general break up among us.—Dr. Bond, we think, has been laboring honestly to secure unanimity of sentiment among both the ministry and laity for the purpose of carrying out or consummating in good faith the pledges heretofore made to our people by the preachers of the Baltimore Conference, that they would submit to no further legislation on the subject of slavery. But when we see such men as the Revs. N. J. B. Morgan, John Lanahan, B. N. Brown, and some others, come out openly and protest against the spirit of resistance already manifested by so large a part of our people, we fear the result. Those great men in high places would try to impress upon us that "no rights have been invaded," and that we had better submit quietly at least four years longer to see if the General Conference will not make amends for having done us what?—no harm at all. Now under all this variety of views among our ministers, what is to become of us as a people?—We think it will be utterly impracticable to move in a body to maintain a central, or an independent position as a Conference, like the division which took place in 1844, when all the people of your Conferences were agreed and acted in harmony and unity.

If we have a division, the separated forces will be too feeble to organize, of necessity they will have to unite with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and the remaining part will adhere to the North. We shall have divisions in the ministry, and divisions in the membership, divisions in circuits and divisions in stations; divisions in Churches and divisions in families; with all the strife and perplexity attending such dissensions.—There seems to be but one thing that will prevent this deplorable state of affairs, and that is the calling of an extra General Conference in 1862, which may put off any decisive action for two years. The Church South, we think, is the proper element for the Baltimore Conference, but there are too many among us, who, we fear, prefer the North, ever to make a unanimous move towards the Southern Church.

ANOTHER LETTER FROM THAT OLD BOOK.

"Mississippi Territory, March 20th, 1804.—Through divine mercy my life has been preserved. I have enjoyed my health this winter rather better than usual.—Praise the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his favors.

"It was not convenient for us to come here by water; therefore we set off through the wilderness on the last day of October, and, after thirteen days and twelve nights toil, we came safe to this place. I have formed a four weeks' circuit, and called it Washington. A revival has taken place among the black people, and it increases every round. About thirty of them have joined the society, and the greater part of them are, I believe, happy in the Lord. In various places our white congregations are serious and attentive. Some are like Agrippa, almost persuaded to be Christians; but pride, and the honor of the world, have hitherto hindered them. Thank the Lord, I have, however, seen blossoms and a little fruit in this remote part of the vineyard of the Lord. Our brethren seem stirred up to seek their first love, and sinners weep before the Lord. O, that God would turn our captivity as the streams of the South.

"Brother Gilson was sick when we came here, and still continues so: his legs are swelled up to his knees, and he has also a violent cough. He has not preached more than seven or eight times in nine or ten months. He told me, a little while past, that he was willing to meet with death. He and other friends urge me to stay in this place a year or more; and, from the situation of things, I suppose it will be best for me to continue.—Tell my dear brethren (the young preachers) not to be afraid of this place, for God is here, and souls have been converted this winter in public and private, and others are inquiring the way to heaven. Here are also a great many souls that must die like heathens, except they are visited by faithful ministers of the gospel.

"There are various places in the country, which Congress purchased from the French, where scarcely a faithful sermon was ever heard.

"My hope revives in secret, and in public preaching, that God will pour his Spirit on us more abundantly, and that our brethren will come and help us.—HEZEKIAH HARRISON."

October 13th, 1860.

DEATH OF REV. L. CAMPBELL.

Alas! Can we never become at all familiar with announcements of this sort? Each successive notice comes as new and strange, and unexpected, almost, as if we had never heard the like before.

In the year 1838, Brother Campbell was appointed from the Kentucky Conference, Missionary to Texas; and a few weeks thereafter he landed at Natchez, on his way to that far off missionary field. He had never before been south of Kentucky. Alone in a strange country, he inquired of almost the first man he met if he could inform him where he could find a Methodist preacher. The stranger could not tell him, but could show him where he could get any information of that sort; and he directed him to my store, in the upper part of the city. Bro. Campbell remained at my house about ten days, during which time he preached for us several times. And I well remember we were all much pleased with the young Kentucky preacher.

Brother Elias R. Porter was then preacher in charge at Natchez, and was a member of my family, and I well remember some pleasant hours we three spent together in "the preacher's office." That office was an upper room of a small brick building, detached from the main residence, occupying a very conspicuous portion, overlooking much of the city and the far distant country in Louisiana, and it generally went, under the singular name of "The Folly." It was a small, old, massive brick building, and from its financial history or otherwise, in by gone days, it had acquired the title of "Van Doons' folly." This office was occupied by R. D. Smith, Steele, Ross, a saint though not a preacher, Hawkins, Porter and F. A. Owen, and occasionally by many other comers and goers, among whom I remember at the moment, Campbell, Overall, Maffitt, Rogers, Holland, Nash, Winans, Drake, Lane, Harper and the sainted Bishop McKendre. One of the very last sermons preached by the Bishop, he preached sitting, near the foot of the stairway leading to that office.

And alas, they are all dead save Brother Frank Owen and myself.

When an opportunity offered to ascend Red river Brother Campbell left us and proceeded to Texas, and in a few years afterward he returned, and has since labored in the Mississippi Conference. None have labored more faithfully, and few if any more usefully.

I esteem it a privilege to have known him well, and to have enjoyed his friendship and his confidence.

No man knew Lewel Campbell who did not know him well. Few men had a better heart or better religion.

The preachers of the Mississippi Conference will remember that at our last session, in Jackson, last November, Brother Campbell more than once, in tones unusually sympathetic and with more than ordinary feeling, alluded to the strong probability that he should never again meet the preachers in Conference. It was his last Conference, he repeated, in all likelihood. How soon has that probability become history!

Bro. Campbell was a self made man. His mind possessed great strength and uncommon vigor. The Church never had a better friend. He was benevolent in the truest sense. And he was a philanthropist of the truest type. Truly, death has made large assessments upon our Conference the present year.

And, brethren, how long before some one will be writing just this way, or in strains of this sort, about us! Let us be ready. But before we go, let us do all possible harm and damage to the devil's kingdom.

CENTENARY INSTITUTE.

MR. EDITOR:—Centenary Institute, situated at Summerfield, Alabama, is already well known to the Methodist public through the many educated young ladies who have gone forth from her halls to adorn Southern homes. But I wish, through the columns of your justly popular paper, to call the attention of the public and the friends of Centenary, to the many important improvements which have recently been made for the comfort of these inmates by Prof. Richardson and his excellent lady. All the dormitories for the young ladies have been supplied with a new and elegant set of furniture, consisting of bedsteads, bureaus, wardrobes, and all the other articles which make up a complete set of fine cottage furniture. Every room in the Institute is furnished with a neat and substantial carpet, and there is a hydraulic ram connected with the building which forces into every room an abundant supply of water for all purposes. These comforts take away from Centenary all the apparent loneliness of a boarding-school, and give to it the elegancies and refinement of home. There are also in the compass in front of the College building, two literary halls furnished with complete libraries, where the young ladies meet for improvement in composition and belles lettres. These various improvements have been made at a cost of between four and five thousand dollars, and call for exertion on the part of the friends of Centenary, that Prof. Richardson and the trustees may be rewarded for the expenditures which they have incurred. The Rev. J. T. Montgomery is still the popular President of the Institute, and is assisted in the various departments by an able faculty, consisting of three male and seven female teachers, whose past success is the best evidence of their qualifications and faithfulness as teachers. And in every respect, Centenary now affords the highest advantages to all who wish to acquire a complete and elegant education.

The Institute is situated at Summerfield, Alabama, eight miles from Selma, and the wealth and refinement of Summerfield, as well as the moral tone of the community, make it one of the very best locations for a female institution.

Those who want full information may apply to Prof. Richardson, secretary of the faculty, for a catalogue, and we hope parents and guardians will consider the claims and advantages of Summerfield, and feel satisfied they will become convinced that they cannot do better than to patronize Centenary.

KINDNESS OF GARIBALDI TO WOUNDED SOLDIERS.

The following extracts from a private letter to the editor of the Medical Times and Gazette, written by a friend who has recently visited Naples, will be read with interest. The letter is dated Naples, September 27, and was received last week:

"A few days ago I was one of a party which went down to Caserta to visit the military hospital, where the wounded were brought after the unfortunate affair of Capua. We first walked in the gardens of the palace, where we were so fortunate as to come, accidentally, on a body of officers practising rifle shooting. Among these was no less a personage than Garibaldi himself. As soon as he perceived us he came frankly forward to Mrs. W——, who had with her a large hamper of lemons and oranges for the wounded. On her requesting him to give orders that she might be admitted to the hospital, he immediately offered to escort her thither himself. A few minutes afterward the people were a little astonished to see Garibaldi drive off with an English lady and her two daughters, without any of his staff, to visit the hospital. I was perched on the box.

"After a ten-minutes' drive we arrived at the hospital—a fine modern building to look on from without, but the wards are too small, and the ventilation is bad. As to organization, there is none. When the crowd outside knew that the General was there, they flocked into the ward in such numbers that he could hardly move about. It was a most affecting sight, to see the tenderness with which the weather-beaten warrior approached the sick bed. Every one was visited in turn, and he had a few words of consolation for each individual. He laid his rough hand so kindly on the fevered brows of the most suffering that the tears started from their eyes. It was a hot, sultry day, and the air was carefully excluded. The reason given to me, on my asking why the windows were not open, was, that air, too freely admitted, was apt to cause fever among wounded men. Of course there was no answering such a profound observation, but after a few minutes Garibaldi ordered the windows to be thrown open, Mrs. W. having suggested to him the propriety of so doing.

"Before leaving the wards, where there were about sixty wounded—the most of them having been sent into Naples—Garibaldi made his Secretary, who had followed him, give each patient a dollar to get any little thing he might fancy. On seeing one poor fellow very uncomfortable with a dry dressing, the usual Neapolitan one, he caused him to be properly dressed, and made some observations about using water for dressings, by which the surgeons here might profit. He asked particularly if they used chloroform during operations, and was answered in the affirmative. This is a step in advance. On the visit to the common soldiers being finished, Garibaldi went to see the officers, of whom there were about a dozen. He kissed some of them affectionately, and shook hands warmly with all, requesting every one to make known to him any wants, &c. Not one of them complained to him, but on being questioned by Mrs. W——, it was evident that there were many things required for their comfort, above all, night attendance.

SPAIN.

The meeting of the Spanish Cortes was to take place on the 25th ult. The session is likely to be an interesting and important one. There can be no doubt that Spain, within a few years, has made considerable progress in works of internal improvement; that her trade and commerce have revived; and that, notwithstanding all her drawbacks, she is progressive and prosperous.—The Carlist troubles—which, during the present reign, have been productive of so much bloodshed, have been so great an obstacle to internal peace and prosperity, and have been such a cause of national weakness—have in a great measure subsided, and it is asserted that the principal Carlist chiefs are now disposed to recognize Queen Isabella. In that event, internal peace being assured, the way will be open for combined effort to forward schemes of improvement, on the consummation of which depends largely the future welfare of Spain. It may be expected that—the financial condition of the nation being favorable—measures, with a view to agricultural and commercial development, and the commencement and prosecution of works of internal improvement, will to some extent occupy the attention of the Cortes. In relation to foreign affairs, the session is likely to possess considerable interest. Since the successful war with Morocco, Spain has assumed a loftier port, and in her foreign relations holds a higher tone than formerly.—The idea that she is one of the great powers of Europe, although her pretension is not recognized, appears to possess her, and visions of conquest and aggrandisement in other parts of the world, are once more entertained, and cherished by her. The latest movement of the Spanish Government in European affairs, of which we have intelligence—we allude to the note the government is said to have addressed to the different powers, supporting the protest issued by the King of Naples when retiring to Gaeta—is not likely, by its effect, to prove the greatness of Spanish influence. The note, it is said, recalls that, by the treaty of the Quadruple Alliance of 1718, the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies had been ceded by Austria to the Spanish Bourbons. This cession was afterwards confirmed by the treaty of Vienna. The article 114 of the final act of Vienna having, under the guarantee of Europe, again sanctioned these stipulations, the Spanish Government considers it its duty to maintain, in the most formal manner, the rights of a member of the august family of Spain, and to raise every opposition against the flagrant violation of solemn arrangements. We imagine that notwithstanding whatever Russia and Austria, in connection with Spain, may think on the subject, the time for maintaining dynasties on thrones in opposition to the people's wishes, by force of arms, has passed away, and that the right of the people of the Two Sicilies to choose their own rulers will be recognized in Europe as superior to the "rights of a member of the august family of Spain," assumed to exist under and by virtue of musty, and often infringed and set-aside treaties, entered into when the rights of sovereigns and dynasties were the main subjects of recognition. Since then the world has advanced, and at this day the rights of the people are acknowledged to the settlement of the affairs of nations. It is not very likely that by such diplomatic movements as this, Spain will succeed in regaining any of her former influence as a first-rate European power. Of course we may expect, at the present session of the Cortes, some developments respecting Spanish West Indian policy, especially in respect to Dominica; also as to the relations with and the policy in respect to Mexico. These, in which we have the most immediate interest, will be anxiously looked for.

THE NEW BAPTIST BIBLE.

In spite of [illegible] of a large portion of the Baptists themselves, the "American Bible Union" is still prosecuting its work of "amending" the Bible in a Baptist sense. The New York World has the following upon the subject, and it fully expresses our own estimate of the enterprise.

"An association, composed of very respectable, but we think very mistaken gentlemen, mainly of the Baptist Church, calling themselves the American Bible Union, having for its chief object the revision of the King James version of the Scriptures, held its eleventh anniversary in our city last week. It reported an expenditure of forty thousand dollars in furtherance of its objects during the last year, and the completion of the first of the four gospels, which is issued in a quarto volume of about three hundred pages, now before us. This does not claim to be a final revision; a final committee of revisers has yet to pass upon it. It would not be right, therefore, to make the convention responsible for what seems to us the absurdity of the so-called emendations—an absurdity which any one who has any taste for English pure and undefiled cannot help observing.

"We rejoice that the Baptists, as as a body, give the amended version no countenance. We rejoice at it simply in the interests of Christianity, and out of no sectarian predilections. The King James version of the Holy Scriptures is a work of incomparable beauty and worth, and those only makes it more beautiful and lovely. To fifty millions of human beings it is endeared by the most sacred ancestral memories, and the most sacred associations. It is the bond of Protestant brotherhood—the tabernacle of their common Christian hopes. If it has its inaccuracies, they are not to be determined upon or corrected by single individuals or denominations. Respect for the religious sentiments of Christendom, and regard for the interests of Christianity itself, forbid it. Protestants now have a commonly recognized standard of belief; but when innovations upon it, like those here designed, are tolerated and accredited, no matter in what spirit or with what ends, a precedent is established of the most dangerous tendency. What one sect may do all sects may do, and what they may do to a given extent they may do to any extent, and if carried out, the Bible would be turned into a veritable Babel—a concatenation of doubtful readings—a miscellaneous scriptural polyglot in all the Christian tongues. An emendation of the received version of our Bible should never be undertaken, except by the most competent agency, and with the universal concurrence of all Christian denominations. Otherwise the most deplorable mischiefs may ensue, and without the gain of one substantial advantage."

LIFE IN CHINA.

A French gentleman, writing from Hong Kong, says: "On entering the town and passing along the principal street, the visitor is astonished at the beauty and richness of the Chinese shops on either hand. They are filled with the most curious articles of the East China crapes, porcelain vases of the most valuable kind, camphor-wood boxes, lacquered furniture of all descriptions, etc. Everything is arranged in excellent order, and in good taste. The shopmen are well dressed and extremely polite; one sits at a desk with a camel-hair brush in his hand, for they do not use pens, and sets down in the Chinese character every article sold; others are employed in displaying the goods to the gaze of the stranger, and this they do so cleverly as often to decide the hesitating purchaser. At short intervals, near the shop doors, may be seen a Chinese money-changer, seated at a small counter covered with rolls of sapeques, the current coin of the country. In our evening rambles through the town we often heard the sound of music and female voices singing. One night we made bold to enter a house where we heard a concert, at the risk of being thought intruders. Our intrusion, however, was not resented, for the persons present immediately offered us seats, and made signs for us to stay and hear. The room was on the first floor, extremely clean and neat, well lighted by large windows, with blinds, which opened on a balcony towards the street. Four musicians, with stringed instruments, castanets, and a tamtam, accompanied a young girl, who sang and also played a kind of guitar. Near her stood several of her companions, who were to sing in their turn. They appeared not to be above twelve or thirteen years of age, and were really pretty for Chinese. These ladies indulged in a cigarette from time to time, and handled their palm-leaf fans very gracefully. In the middle of the room stood a small table covered with sweetmeats and tea-things. On one side sat three or four merry looking Chinamen, who listened attentively to the music, at intervals blowing clouds of tobacco-smoke from their mouths and nostrils. At the top of the room, on a divan, reclined two more men, who were smoking opium, and seemed to enjoy it amazingly. When the singers, whose voices were too shrill to be melodious, had all sung in turn, the persons present drew round the table and prepared to do honor to the supper. Nor were we forgotten, for the gentlemen invited us to take a cup of tea and some sweetmeats, which we found not at all bad."

CORAL CAVE IN CALIFORNIA.

This cave is situated on the Whisky Bar road, (shame on the name!) five miles from Centerville, in Eldorado county, and a beauty of a cave it is. A single step takes you from the street into the hall of the silent mansion. This entrance is not the one first discovered, but has been cut through the solid rock from another chamber to the outer world. Passing through this, the visitor is ushered into an irregular apartment two hundred feet in length by perhaps seventy-five in width, and of various heights, with numerous elevations, depressions, recesses, galleries, etc. A scene of wonderful magnificence is before him. Millions of jewels appear to be glittering from the walls. Shining pendants, some large, some small, some short, some very long, some reaching from ceiling to floor, some thick, some slender, some tapering, some uniform, some tubular, some solid, some clear as crystal, some of a bluish tinge, hang thickly from the marble roof. Here a little wrinkly stab of a stalagmite pushes itself up from the floor; and there stands Lot's wife turned not into a pillar of salt, but of marble; and there again is Mt. Blanc, rising with its snowy lobs several feet above your head. Passing through this first chamber and descending a little, you turn to the left, through a cross section, from which shoot out several passages, some brilliantly lit and beautiful to behold, and others, one at least, as yet unexplored. Turning still to the left, you enter the last chamber, lying exactly parallel to the one first entered, and nearly though not quite so large, but if anything more beautiful. This is called the chapel, and has its belfry and pulpit as well. The pulpit especially is a thing of rare beauty, probably built in the olden time, as it is rather too near the ceiling to be of modern design. It has been formed by droppings from above, catching on a projection of rock, and then rising and spreading and folding over with the most graceful drapery underneath.

Words can give but a poor idea of this splendid handiwork of the great Creator. For himself he made it.—Through all the long centuries, while shrouded in sepulchral darkness, unseen by human eye, its splendor was not in vain, for God saw it and knew its beauty, to whom the night shineth as day. How many may be the palaces of splendor, full of the gorgeous displays of his power, which he hath made deep in the earth, where no light of day will ever penetrate and no earthly vision will ever come. The great Deity himself may reign in the magnificence, though ever so thick a covering of earth veil it from the sky.

Coral Cave has been open to the public but about three months, and yet the writer found that he was the two thousand one hundred and thirteenth visitor.—Pacific.

POETRY IN PROSE.

N. P. Willis, in a letter to the Home Journal, thus describes the performance of "God Save the Queen," on the organ at Grace Church:—

The church was empty in a few minutes, all except two or three expectant listeners who lingered in the aisle; and the slow measure of the hymn was first murmured low, like the source articulate utterance of a prayer in solitude. With the dimness of the light upon the splendid architecture around, and with the absolute stillness of the atmosphere, this beginning was most impressively reverential. And then came the few notes of the air, played with massive solemnity and strength—like the chant of a whole army on their knees—impossible to hear without an awe that hushed the breath. And the variations commenced, progressing upward with the exquisite complexities of inspired composition—the original, simple air, dominant throughout—and brain and heart, thus far, keeping pace with the anthem's stately tread. But, how describe the gathering together of all these wonders of sound, these miracles of surprises in harmony, and the [illegible] power forth in one burst of a [illegible] instrument! The hush of the deserted building, and the reverber

CAMP-MEETINGS AND REVIVALS.

The Scriptures are fulfilled in our day. Their divine authority can never be overthrown while history and human nature preach and illustrate the gospel. Passing years, and centuries, and cycles add their confirmation and interpretation of the obscurely-spoken and dimly-understood "word" of the olden time. One of the grandest promises of the Holy Writings is the gift of the Holy Spirit. "It shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams: and on my servants and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my Spirit, and they shall prophesy." On the day of Pentecost, as all the disciples prayed with one accord in one place, suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, * * and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost." Peter, in his exposition of this wonderful phenomenon, said: "Jesus, * * being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear." Since that blessed day the good work has been going on. In the days of the Wesleys and Whitefield, it began anew. The modern pentecost was almost as wonderful as the ancient one. The early Methodist preachers in America, Edwards, the Tennents, and others, heralded the blessed promise on this continent: "Repent, and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you and your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call."

We are highly honored of God in this present year in that we witness the continued fulfilment of the Scriptures, in the continued out-pouring of the Holy Ghost, and the continued work of the salvation of souls. From all quarters come the blessed news. From beyond the seas, from almost every region of the old world, and from nearly every section and corner of our own beloved land, we hear the glad tidings of salvation. Thousands upon thousands of precious souls for which Jesus died are being reconciled to God through the death of his Son, and being baptised with the Holy Ghost. Camp-meetings, protracted meetings, and revival meetings of various kinds, at which the power of God is manifest, at which the souls of his people are blessed with "times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord," and at which scores and hundreds and thousands of sinners are brought to the saving knowledge of God through faith in the blood of his Son, are being reported all over the land.

God has blessed the writer of this with the privilege of attending some of these camp-meetings, and now, while he writes, a protracted meeting of great power is going on in a little piney woods Church on the Jackson railroad, and the young and the old are turning to "the Lord that he may have mercy upon them, and to our [illegible] abundantly pardon" them. Within the last six weeks [illegible] and enjoyed seasons of grace and heavenly joy for which we will [illegible] and thousands of others shall praise and bless God throughout eternal ages. We have seen strong and brave men, and tender and beautiful women, grey-headed fathers and mothers, and little Sunday-school children, bowing together in crowds in the altar of prayer, in the straw at camp-meeting, and at the consecrated house of God. We have seen whole families, which were far away from God, brought to salvation by the conversion of one dear little one in whose heart the good seed of the kingdom was sown in a little irregular and apparently unimportant Sunday-school. "Hallelujah! The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth." "The Lord's hand is not shortened that it cannot save, nor his ear heavy that it cannot hear." "The Son of Man hath" yet "power on earth to forgive sins."

Long live camp-meetings! Revivals and camp-meetings forever! They are needed. They do good in a thousand ways. They bring to vivid remembrance and feeling the teachings of the Sunday-school, the family fire-side, and the regular preaching of the gospel, as did the Holy Ghost the teachings of Christ. They cheer the lonely and the weary; they comfort the tempted and the tried; they console the sorrowful and the broken-hearted; they lead to repentance and conversion; they refresh and strengthen the Church and the ministry. They smoothe out the wrinkles of the past year. Mutual wrongs and resentments are forgiven under the pervading influence of the Holy Spirit, and the sympathetic joy resulting therefrom. Young Christians who had become worldly-minded, are renewed in their first love. Backsliders are reclaimed. Men go home to pray in their families who had never done so before. Friendships are formed which last forever. Prejudices against evangelical religion are broken down under an overpowering spiritual influence which is above all logic and all argument. Those whom God designates as his chosen ones to preach the gospel of his Son, when converted at a camp-meeting, or revival, go out with an important lesson already learned—a lesson which no other teaching could ever impart.

There is no fault in camp-meetings or revivals, but there is fault in "our pastoral inefficiency," by which much of the fruit of these meetings is lost. Let camp-meetings and revivals continue forever, and let our pastorate be made equal to the work of taking care of the harvest of souls.

A DEFENDER OF CONSPIRACY.

We have received a letter from "Sandwich, C. W.," dated Oct. 8., signed "Thomas Cleworth," containing eight pages of as vindictive wrath and abuse as the writer seems able to put in words, in response to our article on the "Texas Conspiracy." He assumes that we wrote about and approved the hanging of Bewly. We had not heard a word of that affair when we wrote that article, and have written nothing definite about it yet, because we know nothing definite. Our position on that case, in advance, is, however, that if Bewly was convicted of connection with the conspiracy for inciting servile insurrection, and general arson, murder, and rape, he suffered as justly as any other desperate villain. If he was hanged merely upon suspicion, because he was a minister of the Northern Methodist Church, it was an outrageous murder. What will our wrathful correspondent, and his sympathizers, say to that position? We have Northern Methodist ministers among us in the South constantly, and not a hair of their heads is hurt. They are in our office frequently.

The latest news of Bewly's case is, that he was not hanged at the time reported, having left. Since then, a letter was found, addressed to him, from a Rev. Mr. Bailey, a copy of which we have in our possession, revealing the darkest and bloodiest conspiracy known to history. Since then, it is said, Bewly was pursued, overtaken, brought back, and, having acknowledged the genuineness of the letter, was hanged. The whole truth will come out after a while.

This letter, however, is a curiosity. Like Dr. Thompson, of the Advocate and Journal, the writer does not let us know whether he believes slaveholders have any right to defend their lives, and those of their families, against any murderous incendiary, if he happen to be an abolitionist.

REV. J. A. CLEMENT AND THE ADVOCATE.

"Save me from my friends."

Authorship must surely affect the nerves. And when man is nervous, especially an author, he is at a disadvantage. Was this one of the reasons why Job exclaimed, "O that mine adversary had written a book?"

Our old friend and fellow-member of the Alabama Conference, Rev. J. A. Clement, has recently published a work entitled, "An Exposition of the Pretensions of Baptists to Antiquity." We have not seen it as yet, but hope to soon. We first published his announcement, and then an extended notice by Rev. W. A. McCarty. Mr. Clement complains that Mr. McCarty's notice was headed, "A New Book on Baptism." That may have been an inadvertence of ours, instead of Mr. McCarty's; we do not recollect. No matter, it is explained. Mr. Clement also seems annoyed at Mr. McCarty's remarks as to the style; but, as the notice of the book is eminently friendly and eulogistic, and as they agree as to the style and its propriety, we do not see cause of annoyance.

But a foot-note appended to the notice, which is also from Mr. McCarty's pen, but which Mr. Clement erroneously attributes to us, seems most exceptionable to him. With this explanation, of course the little fling at somebody about that "sermon in Florida" is only an illustration of "how he could a fout," as the young man in the "Georgia scenes" explained when discovered mauling and gouging the unresisting earth. We imagine that the writer of this also heard that sermon, but we really had forgotten that our old friend was there. As to whether it was aided by "the immortal Dick," or was "unique and original," we do not well recollect; it is really of no consequence. But was it fair to tell? But we had a glorious time at the camp-meeting; ten years has not dimmed the precious memory; and would like to be there again.

Why Mr. Clement should be annoyed by what he calls the "charge" of being "unique and original"—a high compliment—we cannot imagine. The truth seems to be that our friend is Quixotically fighting a phantom of his own fancy. We are friendly to the success of his book in advance; Mr. McCarty has written a highly complimentary notice of it; and nobody has said a word against it. We beg that he will not turn the artillery, intended for his enemies, against his friends. We suggest that it is a wise custom, when an author publishes a book, to let it take its chances, without "interference for protection." Moreover, our brother should overcome his sensitiveness. If he is so nervous at the compliments of his friends, what will he do when the Baptists get after him! But here is Mr. Clement's letter:

MR. EDITOR:—I see in the Advocate of the 10th inst., a notice of my book, just issued from the Publishing House, Nashville, by Rev. W. A. McCarty, in reference to which I wish to say just a word or two.

Bro. M. styles it "a new book on Baptism." Now, I did not aim to write a book on Beptism at all, though there is a discussion of both the subjects and the mode of Baptism. This could not be avoided in view of the subject taken in hand. My purpose was to expose the pretensions of Baptists to antiquity: hence the book is entitled, "An Exposition of the Pretensions of Baptists to Antiquity." This much, I deem it necessary to say, to prevent any misapprehension in reference to the object of the book.

In reference to its style, I adopted that in preference to any other. I could have written otherwise, had I intended it for the literary man. For these there are plenty of books on Baptism. I wrote for the common people—the class mostly trodden by those of the water creed.

In conclusion: In a foot-note, you say that I am indebted to Dr. Newton of Mississippi, or the author of "Theophilus Walton," for a "retort," as quoted by Bro. McCarty, about "who baptizes the lower part" of the subject in a case of immersion? Well, it is true, I have in my library both "Theophilus Walton," and two volumes of Dr. Newton's work on Baptism, but did not know that I was indebted to either of them for that "retort," until I was so informed by you. I have been in the habit for years past of using that "retort," and did not know that any person else ever used it but myself. And do not now know, only upon your authority, that these writers use it, for I have no recollection of ever seeing it in either of those authors. Yet I do not presume to be its author—even if it be worth anything—and as I have ordered a copy for your table, you will find a good deal that is used by other writers, but not claimed as any more original than a sermon was once heard from a certain preacher in Florida, on the "Immortality of the Soul," drawn largely from the works of the immortal Dick.

You seem to think I am "unique and original" when the meaning "wet all over" is given to baptize. Now, my dear brother, if you had been posted up on this baptismal question, as a man should be who attempts to criticise a work on that subject, you would never have charged me with being "unique and original" in this case of "wetting."

So far as editors' criticisms, or others, are concerned, I shall care nothing. I have written this work for a special purpose, and for a certain class of people, and those, we trust, it will benefit. The above we have written mostly to correct the notice of its design as stated by Bro. M'Carty.

A GRAND MISSIONARY MONUMENT.

The American Board, the first foreign missionary society in America, and the most important representative of the cause in this country, recently held its fifth annual meeting, which was celebrated as a jubilee.—This enterprise had its origin among young men. A boy heard his mother say that she had consecrated her son to the work of missions. A few years later, with some fellow-students at college, he sought shelter from rain by the side of a haystack. While the lightning flashed, and the rain poured, the subject of missions was talked over. Young Mills said: "The cause of missions can be carried forward if we will." They then made it a subject of prayer. What a contrast! On the one side, a few young men of the lower class of one of the infant colleges, so secluded that a mail reaches it but once a week; on the other, a mighty continent, the abode of paganism, whither they proposed to send the gospel. By the side of that hay-stack was the "handful of corn on the top of the mountains." What was its fruit? The American Board. The first year its receipts were $1,000, now they are $350,000. Then it had no missions; now they belt the globe. It has disbursed $8,000,000, and employed 1200 missionaries; and its mission churches now number 55,000 members, with more than 10,000 children in its schools. One billion of pages have been printed, and an entire nation—the Sandwich Islands—raised from cannibalism to civilization and Christianity. Judson and Rice, two of the first missionaries sent out, became Baptists. They returned to stir up that denomination, and from this event originated the Baptist Missionary Union. Subsequently the Presbyterian Missionary Board, the American missionary Society, and the Society of the Reformed Dutch churches, were organized, chiefly by separation from the American Board.—Thus there are now five Boards of missions, all the direct fruits of this Board, springing from the "handful of corn on the top of the mountains."

In 1796 the established Church of Scotland rejected as absurd a proposal to send missionaries to foreign nations; in 1829 the same church commissioned the devoted Dr. Duff, as its representative, to carry the Gospel to the natives of India.

Look back a little farther than half a century; a brief exploration beyond the year 1810 brings us to the era of the formation of the most important missionary associations of the Protestant Churches. The impulse which led to the founding of foreign missions by Protestants was felt at two distinct periods not very far apart. At the close of the last century the powerful reaction against the prevalent rationalism, which was led on by the Wesleys, resulted in the cotemporaneous formation of what are now the leading Missionary Societies of Great Britain. Wesleyan missions date from the year 1786; the Baptist Missionary Society was organized in 1792, the London Society in 1795, and the Church Society in 1799. These have grown to be mighty agencies—mighty in wealth and all the resources of spiritual power—In the extension of the kingdom of Christ. A period of like fruitfulness was the general pacification of Europe in 1814. The American Board was organized in 1810, the Baptist Union in 1814, the Methodist Missionary Society in 1819, the Protestant Episcopal in 1820. Thus Christian bodies that have been in appearance acting spontaneously, have been, in reality, working in concert.

THE PRINCE AND THE ORANGEMEN.

The London Times, as we expected, very earnestly sustains the course of the Duke of Newcastle in not following the Prince to recognize the Orange demonstrations in Canada, and denounces the Orangemen with great heartiness. There are two sides to the question, however. The pretensions of the Catholics in Canada have roused a deep and vigorous opposition in all the Protestant classes in that country. Nevertheless, the Orangemen acted outrageously, as Irishmen are apt to do, when excited. The Times says: "That they have by this time seen the folly and impropriety of their course we feel certain, and that when the heir to the British Throne leaves the New World he will leave behind him no more attached friends than the Canadian Protestants, although it has been necessary for his principal adviser, the Duke of Newcastle, to administer to them somewhat severe rebukes. Most of our readers, though unable to divine the reasons of this sudden agitation, will readily imagine that there must be something in the constitution of Canadian society or politics which gives this vitality to the Orange body. And this is indeed the case. Orangeism is not merely a religious, but a political association in British America, and it is an association which is chiefly defensive. The preponderance of the Catholic population in numbers and their able drilling at elections have enabled them to pass measures against which the Protestants are still strongly incensed. The voice of the extreme Protestants is heard through the Orange Lodges, and we cannot wonder, though we may regret, that they should assert their claims both in season and out of season."

PRESBYTERIAN UNION.

The negotiations which have been pending for nearly fifteen years between the "Presbyterian Church of Canada," and the "United Presbyterian Church of Canada," says the Canada Christian Advocate, have now nearly approached a happy and harmonious issue. The special meetings of the two Synods in Toronto, have at last resolved to discuss no longer the points on which they differ, but to look solely at those on which they agree.—So far as we are able to judge, neither body has given in one single hair breadth to the other. We cannot discern the slightest inch of ground on either side. But these two grand, gun-inch of ground on either side. But these two grand, gun-boat views of the great mission assigned them by their Great Head, have sheathed their swords at last, and agreed to become ONE at Montreal, in June, 1861. Some few on both sides dissented, but, on the whole, much christian forbearance and harmony characterized their Conferences and we cordially wish them God speed. Moreover, we shall rejoice to see the third and last, but not least (for we venerate the old Mother Kirk) Presbyterian body, and these two forming a no longer glorious trinity, but a glorious UNITY in this land. We sincerely pray for the time when these sections, and all others of Christ's body mystical

"Shall hang the trumpet in the Hall,
And study war no more."

GAVAZZI IN NAPLES.

Father Gavazzi, whose picturesque attitudes and wonderful skill in declamation attracted as much attention a few years ago as did his fierce denunciations of the abuses of the Papal power, is now a great "power" himself in Naples. A few weeks ago he preached in the open air, in the Place St. Francis-Le-Paolo, to an immense multitude. Clad in the Garibaldian red shirt, the soldier-priest proclaimed to listening thousands the "unity of Italy" as the will of God, and taught his excited auditory to look in the "four gospels" for the justification of the whole Italian movement. With his old vehemence of gesture, he denounced the temporal power of the Pope as the curse of Christendom, and especially of Italy. The discourse was interrupted, time and again, by enthusiastic applause from the vast throng that surrounded the preacher. Among the multitude were many priests, who clapped their hands and shouted as lustily as any of the audience.

OUACHITA CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR—The Ouachita Conference convened Oct. 24th, at Pine Bluff. Bishop Pierce not having arrived, A. Hunter, D.D., was elected President, pro tem, and J. S. M'Alister was elected Secretary. Bishop Pierce arrived about 11 o'clock and took the chair. We have had a harmonious session. There are several transfers from Tennessee. Some nine or ten young men have been admitted on trial. With these additions the Bishop has been enabled to supply the circuits with a few exceptions. This is the first time I have had the pleasure of attending the Ouachita Conference. They are the right kind of men, and the cause of God and Methodism is destined to prosper under their administration. Dr. J. B. M'Ferrin was with us, and preached for us three times, in demonstration of the Spirit and with power. Several persons have been converted during the session of the Conference, and 16 have joined the church.

The Conference adjourned Tuesday, October 30th. Camden was selected as the place for holding the next Conference.

The missionary anniversary was held on Saturday night. Dr. C. Taylor gave us a very interesting talk on the character and customs of the Chinese. Speeches were also made by Dr. M'Ferrin and Bishop Pierce. Over $1000 was raised.

AUTHORS AND BOOKS.

NEW YORK, Oct. 30, 1860.

It is rumored again that Mr. Thackeray has in contemplation what may be called, by a stretch of the imagination, a continuation of the History of England, from the period reached by Lord Macaulay at his death. The great novelist, it is stated, intends really to give a history of the "Times of Queen Anne," that Princess whom Johnson remembered vaguely as a "stately lady, in diamonds and a black hood," and who touched him for the King's Evil, in 1712. This would be a history of that period with which Thackeray is best acquainted by all the studies of his life. No one who remembers his four lectures on the English Humorists, or who has read that best written of all his books, that splendid specimen of fine rich old English, the "History of Henry Esmonde, Esq.," will doubt his eminent fitness, on the score of knowledge, for the historian of that period. But Novelists are by right of their trade special pleaders. Their habit is to project one or two characters in the story to the exclusion or injury of others, and the very necessity of their trade makes them rely more on fancy and instinct, and less on stubborn facts, than an historian ought. After all, the closest photographers of certain phases of society, such as Mr. Thackeray and the author of Adam Bede are, give but a small portion of the world. The canvass is necessarily narrow; like the photograph itself, which gives us a building, a face, and figure, or a patch of landscape, with inimitable fidelity; but loses its force and power when it is applied to a fresh landscape. Now historical painting needs a bigger canvass than our novelists are used to.

Nevertheless we may be thankful for even a history from Mr. Thackeray's pen. That it will be full of curiously minute and sharply drawn pictures of the society, and manners, and customs of that period, and picturesque and interesting, if not very reliable, no one will doubt. And that is precisely what some say of Lord Macaulay's history.

It seems to be settled that Mr. Dickens will appear next year with another novel. How, or in what shape, is not yet stated. Also Mr. Trollope, whose admirable story of "Farmley Parsonage" the Harpers are about to publish, is, it is said, to begin the new year with another serial in monthly numbers.

Lately British authors and readers have complained of the partiality and bigotry of Mr. Mudie, the great Circulating Library man, who, for $25 per year, furnishes any one, in any part of England, with all the new books, as soon as issued. His patronage is so immense, that his custom alone sometimes settles the question of the publication of a book; of Adam Bede, for instance, he alone bought 3000 copies at once, which, for England, and for a seven dollar book (which is the English price of that work) is a very considerable edition; and at once makes a book a paying venture. Wherefore shrewd publishers ask Mr. Mudie's advice beforehand. Now this gentleman, it appears, is mortal, as well as the rest of us. He has his prejudices: for instance, he refuses to admit Mr. Charles Reade's books, and some others are specified. We know that such a course must be found oppressive, and though Mr. Reade has never made complaint, having made probably a sufficient public patronage for himself, some of the less lucky cry out. Mr. Mudie in his reply gives a curious insight into his vast business. He says:—"I have always endeavoured to act fairly towards my subscribers, and with great regard to the interests of all good authorship; and I shall continue so to do. The following list of the total number of works added since January, 1858, to Sept., 1860, may interest your readers, as it indicates to some extent the relative circulation of various classes of works in the current literature:—History and Biography, 87,210 vols.; Travel Miscellaneous, including works of General Literature, 65,445 vols.; and the principal Reviews, 87,856 vols.; total, 391,083 vols."

Such a market must have its influence, and probably accounts for the publication of some of the many trashy novels—even trashier than the common run of American novels—with which British publishers have for some years deluged Great Britain, till it has come to be believed that of every hundred Britons, male and female, who can write their names, at least ten try their hand at a novel. Thank God, then, such books are mostly still-born, and don't need even the Herodian hand of the critic to put them out of the way.

The Cosmopolitan Art Association have just ready their annual presentation plate. The subject is, "Falstaff mustering his troops." The engraving is by John Rodgers, from a painting by Schrodter, one of the Dusseldorf artists. It is an excellently done thing, and will be especially welcome to lovers of Shakspeare. It alone is abundantly worth the price of subscription ($3), which also entitles to their Quarterly, which has additional engravings, and to a share in the annual distribution of objects of art. It seems that when the Prince of Wales was in New York, he and the Duke of Newcastle subscribed to the Quarterly, and had their engravings sent home (to Buckingham Palace, and to Clumber Park, Nottinghamshire).

Lord Brougham, who is now past 82 years of age, delivered a lecture recently in England in which he spoke of that very disagreeable subject, work, in the following enthusiastic strain: "I began work more than sixty years ago, and from that hour to this I have constantly been, like yourselves, a working man; and to be a working man will I continue as long as Providence blesses me with health of body and strength of mind to continue my avocations. And I claim no merit for this; I like it. It has become my second nature. It has become my habit. I cannot possibly lay it aside; I do not see why I should lay it aside; if I see any reason—if I see that the public would be better served by my laying it aside, then I would lay it aside and take the ease which I had earned, or thought I had earned. But till I find that I can work no longer, or that there is any good reason why I should work no longer, work I shall, and work I will, as long as work I can."

For myself, I have always believed that the taste for work, like the taste for olives and sour wines, is not natural but acquired—and then needs a good deal of perseverance before one can heartily enjoy olives or work.

Literary news is just beginning. When cold weather comes on, days grow short, and reading lamps are lit, the publishers begin to tempt their constant public.—The following list includes all that is doing in England just now. Of these parts you shall hear in my next.

Mr. Hepworth Dixon's biographical work on the great "Chancellor of Human Nature," which is to be called "Personal History of Francis Bacon." The completion of Mr. Macknight's "History of the Life and Times of Edward Burke," (of which volumes I and II. were published by Messrs. Chapman & Hall, in 1858), and of Mr. W. C. Haslett's "History of the Republic of Venice." A second volume of "The Autobiography of Dr. Joseph Wolff;" a "Memoir of Jerome Bonaparte;" two additional volumes of "Memoirs by the Duke of Buckingham, from his family papers of "The Courts and Cabinets of William IV. and Queen Victoria." Miss Bremer's "Two Years in Switzerland," and a book on "The Western Prairies," from the Hon. Grantley Berkeley. A reimpression of "Hogarth's Works," with an essay on his genius by James Hannay, is probably due to Mr. Salu's series of papers on the subject in The Cornhill Magazine. There may also be looked for in separate form, a "Life of William Cobbett," by his son, John P. Cobbett; Lady Chatterton's "Memoirs of Admiral Gambier," and several minor works of travels, &c. Of books heretofore announced, but now definitely promised to be forthcoming, the most important are Lord Mahon's "Life of William Pitt," Lady Llanover's "Memoirs and Diary of Mr. Delaney," volumes IIId and IVth of Carlyle's "Frederic the Great," the first installment of Mr. Kinglake's "History of the Crimean War," the 2d volume of Lord Dundonald's "Autobiography of a Seaman," and Leslie's "Sir Joshua Reynolds and his Cotemporaries." ***

EXHIBIT OF THE SOUTHERN METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE, JULY 1, 1860.

REV. AND DEAR BRETHREN.—In compliance with the law of the General Conference, I submit my Annual Exhibit. You will perceive that the balance in favor of the Publishing House, over and above the report of last year, is $16,121 42. To ascertain the real profits of the establishment during the year, it will be necessary to add the amount that has been deducted to the various Conference Depositories. This item alone shows, that in sales to these institutions, we have allowed a discount, over and above our regular rates to wholesale dealers, the sum of say $8132 16. This, added to the above, shews the profits of the House to have been say $19,538 58. To this should be added the travelling expenses of the General Superintendents of the Church. Your body, I think, will not fail to see that the business of the House has been sound and prosperous, and promises success in the future.

The trade of the House during the year has been good, and the manufacturing department has been constantly employed. We have made important additions to our machinery, and now think that we will be able to have on hand full supply of our standard works and Sunday-school publications. Hitherto we have been frequently pressed to supply the demand. But few new books have been added to our catalogue, while the demand has been large upon our stereotyped works. Some important publications have, however, swelled our list.

The Depositories working under the law of 1858, have been so far somewhat successful. A few have done well, while others have transacted a very limited amount of business. Those in operation are located at Richmond, Charleston, Mobile, Macon, Vicksburg, Galveston, Louisville, Lexington, and Memphis. The last named has just opened. The aggregate purchases of these nine establishments during the year amounted to $32,528 66, estimating at the rates of charges under the new provisions of the Discipline. This I regard as very small; but it is due to say that some of the Depositories had a pretty good supply on hand twelve months since, while others have not got fairly under way; all, however, thus far, have proved themselves punctual dealers.

Until the present, the Publishing House has not realized any large amount from the Conferences towards raising a free cash capital; we expect the approaching autumn to begin to reap some of the fruit of our labors. You cannot fail to perceive that, unless we get aid from the Conferences, we cannot continue to supply the Depositories at or a little above cost, meet all the expenses of the House, and liquidate its debts. We still insist that each Conference shall take steps to raise its portion of the funds. Our brethren cannot expect the Publishing House to sustain itself, pay all its old liabilities, and sell books without profit. Will your body—if you have not already acted—take measures to carry out the plans and purposes of the General Conference?

TUSCALOOSA CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. EDITOR: I have proposed time and again to drop you a few dots from this venerable old city, but have "been let hitherto." And now I am almost ashamed to do so, considering the neglect of promises made you at Eufaula. However, a few items may interest your readers.

The most pleasing item is, the result of the Bone Camp camp-meeting which closed yesterday morning, having commenced on Friday previous. The meeting was gotten up in a hurry by a few friends in the neighborhood, it having been purposed to omit having one this year.—The Pastor of the (New Prospect) Circuit was attending appointments in other portions of his work, and the very excellent local preacher who had charge of the circuit last year, and who now lives within its bounds, Rev. James Freeman, on account of family afflictions was unable to be present all the time. Hence the brunt of the labor fell on brother Adams of North Port and your correspondent, who are pleased to acknowledge the services of a devoted Baptist minister by the name of Smith, who lives in the neighborhood. The meeting was one of the most satisfactory I have ever attended. Not that converts were numbered by scores, but that a depth and constancy in the feeling of the assembly was manifest. On Monday night the preachers were painfully impressed with the conviction that the Church was not doing its duty to the neighborhood, and each, in a short talk, declared wherein we had been deficient. Then one of them called on each of the male members present by name, and one after another confessed before the whole audience neglect and unfaithfulness, with promises of amendment. All were melted down, and on invitation, nearly all the people came up around and into the altar, and a precious season of tears was had. The next morning we divided those present on the ground into two groups at 8 o'clock, and at different tents held prayer meetings. At eleven the baptism of children, with a discourse on family religion. At the conclusion of this service, a prayer-meeting band was formed of brethren and sisters, who covenanted to unite in a systematic effort to revive religion in the whole country surrounding, by having a prayer-meeting each Wednesday night—going from house to house—until the next camp-meeting. After dinner the horn blew at 2 o'clock, and an opportunity was given to those who wished to join the Church. Several joined. A number promised to attend from week to week the prayer-meetings as seekers of religion. Brother Adams and myself took leave of the brethren, thanking God that we had gone to their aid.

The Methodist Female College here is doing finely. Rev. R. M. Saunders and his excellent lady have charge, with competent assistants. Mrs. Saunders, I am persuaded, has no superior as a manager of young ladies, and is winning golden opinions of every body as a teacher. A sincere Christian, accomplished and experienced, the Trustees have made a fortunate selection in securing her services. Enough for the present, save one little suggestion to brother Summers. When he mentions again in the Quarterly the Colleges under the patronage of our Church, may he not overlook the one here, where he was once stationed, where he is much loved, and where he got his wife.

FOOTPRINTS ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

NUMBER XVIII.

To the Texas Conference—A Dilemma—Friends in Need—An Unpleasant Journey—Arrival at New Orleans—Home at Last—The Lost Found—A Grateful Retrospect—Chills and Remedies—The Close.

From Golind I went to LaGrange, the seat of the Texas Conference. By the kindness of Bro. Fly, who took me in his buggy, I was saved the fatigue and exposure of night travel, and was thus enabled to make the trip. Even thus nature was exhausted and I was confined to the bed for two or three days. The doctors held a consultation over me, and tried to make me believe that I was on the verge of fatal illness; but I resolved to resist the doctors and the disease, and to meet the duties of the Conference. I did so, but it was a costly sacrifice to my poor body. While yet in bed, Mrs. P. arrived, and reported that she had no tidings of the lost trunk. Here was a dilemma—far from home, money well nigh spent, and wife and daughter with "nothing to wear." By the generous kindness of sisters Huyolo, Alexander and others, an outfit or rather a refit was soon forthcoming. Warm hearts and busy fingers in a little time prepared Mrs. P., and the little girl "to go out," and the expenses of "shopping" did not lighten my already attenuated purse. Friends in need are good things—very. Texas is a very good place to find them. My old friend Pitts and wife, who came over with my family, did me no little kindness by carrying me in their carriage to and from the Conference room. The General also promised to look after the trunk and forward it to N. O.

Bro. Ligon with whom we stayed, and to whom and his better-half we were indebted for many comforts, when the time for leaving came, furnished me with a pair of mules, and Bro. Thrall furnished a baroueche, and Bro. Addison, one of the preachers, proposed to be driver, and, thus fitted up, we left for Palestine. After a long, tedious, wearisome journey, we reached our destination. Bro. A. is down in the book of my memory, for he helped me much. I could not have made the trip alone, and with his brotherly, faithful services, barely got through. But the Conference was held, and the hour of adjournment was reached in harmony and love. A furious snow storm came on—the like was never seen before in Texas. The last days of the Conference involved us all in much exposure. I never saw such a spell of weather anywhere. In the midst of it we read out the appointments and bade each other farewell. Taking the afternoon and night to recruit, I made my arrangements to start the next day for home, storm or no storm. Bro. Eiglehart, at whose house we were entertained, urged us to stay and wait for sunlight and a milder temperature. But long absence from the loved ones at home, continued sickness and suffering without any prospect of relief, gave in rest, cessation from labor and mental repose, made me impatient to go, and so "tearing" ourselves away from all the comforts of a noble hospitality, we faced the tempest and set out for Sunshine. Verily we had a bitter ride for several days and nights. But I had braced myself to endure and to conquer. The first night we spent in Rusk, where my sister (Mrs. Wiggins) resides, and then we took the stage for Alexandria. Fortunately we were not crowded, and made ourselves as comfortable as constant motion would allow. The incidents of the journey might be detailed with interest, if time were plenty on my hands; but I have more important business just now, and must come to a close.

We reached New Orleans in due season, found very comfortable quarters with Bro. Stewart, and were detained several days, waiting for our baggage. Mine had been shipped at San Francisco for New York, and ordered by express to this point. Mrs. P.'s, as stated before, if found, was also to come by express, and both should have been here on our arrival. But neither had come, and so we tarried only to be disappointed. We left at last, giving up all as lost. The loss in real value, was considerable to us who never have [illegible] but in those trunks were many curious and gifts designed for the children we had left behind that we were going home, and this was a fact too pleasant to be marred by useless regrets. With cheerful hearts we moved on and grew happier as we lessened the distance between us and our humble residence. At last we arrived. I thought of life's weary journey, its end and of heaven and its welcome. And now I must record my gratitude to God for all his mercies to me and mine. We were preserved from all accidents in a travel of two thousand miles by sea and land, in all sorts of conveyances, through deserts, among savages, by day and night. Bless the Lord, oh, my soul, and all that is within me bless His holy name.

Two months after we reached home, first one, then the other—the lost trunks came to hand. They were battered and worn, but the contents were all safe. The dear things gave no account of themselves or their peregrinations. Where they had been we never shall know, but after much wandering and many delays they reached home. Mine is now about to resume its travels and with my past experience of its tendency to prodigal habits, I shall put it under more careful regimen for the future. Mrs. P.'s, I think, will not be trusted abroad any more, but will take position in the ranks of the local itinerancy.

In winding up these notes of travel, I must go back to San Francisco, and express my obligations to the brethren, Fitzgerald, Spencer and Genella. With the first two, we found a home when we were in the city. I do not mean food and lodging merely, but such real friendship and kindness as robbed absence of its gloom and made a land of strangers a place of enjoyment and repose. Christ promised to the faithful minister who left all to follow Him, houses and land, fathers, mothers, friends. These brethren and their families, as instruments, redeemed that word of promise to me and made me feel as much at home on the Pacific coast as here among my native hills. Peace be upon them, and prosperity within their gates. Bro. Genella is a reproduction of the "well-beloved Gaius," of whom the Apostle Paul writes so lovingly. The friend of the Church and the preachers, he is the courteous servant, the ever-ready, obliging helper of both. His big soul takes in all the interests of our Zion and there are still chambers to let. There is room for every good thing. He never knows when he has done enough. He plans easily, gives liberally, executes promptly. One such man is worth to the Church acres of drones. The Lord make them a thousand fold so many more as they are. I am his debtor in many respects, both for personal favors and relative kindness. My little daughter has made his name a household word. May he live long, live in California, live to see a free Southern Methodist Church in San Francisco, live to count his brethren by the hundred and to enjoy the ministrations of the Word in our own spacious consecrated temple.

I have had a long hard bout with the chills, and if I had time would furnish a catalogue of remedies, all infallible, for the benefit of any who may be similarly afflicted. Desiring to do good in every way, I may hereafter publish a list of recipes, allopathic, homeopathic, scientific and superstitious. It is true, none of them did me any good, but mine was a peculiar, exceptionable case, for I am assured, by reliable doctors and many infallible signs that any one of the remedies, from quinine up to corn-shucking tea will cure the oldest and most stubborn case. But the victims must wait on me a little while. In the meantime I commend them to hope and patience.

In closing this correspondence with your paper, Mr. Editor, allow me to say that I regret the irregularity of my letters, because they would have been more spirited if I could have written while impressions and memories were fresh, and they might have been read with more interest. You have given me room enough for the present, and I hereby resign to my "illustrious" successor.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVCCATE.

NOVEMBER 7, 1860.

WEEKLY SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

By telegraphic dispatches from various parts of the United States, received in this city to-day, we have the following very important intelligence :—

The Presidential Election.—The vote in New York City was: Union ticket, 80,078; Black Republican, 31,800. Nearly all the interior counties of New York are said to have given Black Republican gains, and it is supposed Lincoln has carried the State by about 50,000 majority. In New Jersey, the fusion ticket is supposed to be successful. Lincoln's majority in Pennsylvania is estimated at from 10,000 to 12,000. Vermont, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and the other New England States have given overwhelming majorities for Lincoln. Indiana, Wisconsin, Ohio, Iowa, and Illinois, have all given Black Republican majorities. Returns from Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia and Maryland, indicate those States have gone for Bell. Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, North Carolina, Arkansas, Delaware, and Georgia, according to latest returns, have given majorities for Breckenridge. Douglas, it is presumed, has carried Missouri.

Probable Insurrection in Virginia.—It is stated in a telegram from New York that Gen. Harney has left Washington to assume the command of the department, in consequence of anonymous letters threatening an insurrection in Virginia.—Gov. Letcher has ordered the troops to be ready at a moment's notice.

North Carolina and Georgia Arming.—Telegrams from these States inform us that the Arsenals at Fayetteville (N. C.), and Augusta (Ga.), are being occupied by Federal troops.

LOUISIANA.

SUGAR HOLDING IN TERREBONNE.—Many of the planters have commenced making sugar, but there is universal complaint that a very inferior article is made, and that it does not granulate well. We are informed that the bud of the cane is killed, and that much of the crop is sprouting. The full extent of the damage done the cane crop, by the late storm, cannot yet be ascertained; but it is much more serious than was at first imagined; for in three weeks from now it will be utterly impossible to make anything like sugar of the sprouted canes.—So says the Thomas Ceres.

The Alexandria National Democrat says that in Rapides Parish the cane is small, and only a small yield can be expected. The same paper says that the cotton will in nearly an average.

ALABAMA.

TOWN OF OPELIKA BURNED DOWN.—The flourishing town of Opelika, situated at the junction of the Columbus and West Point Railroad, in east county, Ala., was almost entirely destroyed by fire on the night of the 25th. Ten of the largest houses were wholly consumed, with nearly all their contents. Opelika was the great depot of the Georgia and Alabama railroads, there connecting, and the loss of property must be immense. The fire is thought to be the work of an incendiary.

ABOLITION INCENDIARIES.—The Montgomery Mail, of the 30th ult., says : We yesterday heard of two incendiaries who had been tampering with slaves. One of these was in Marengo county, and the inhabitants were after him; the other had been caught after a chase, and lodged in Russell jail. His name is Tom Copeland, and he brags of what his friends had done with fire and poison in Texas. His efforts to incite insurrection in Russell were hardly disguised and are susceptible of abundant proof.

ANOTHER JOHN BROWNITE CAUGHT.—A man by the name of Seawell, a John Brown emissary, was taken up by the citizens of Limestone, a day or two since, for tampering with slaves. A meeting of the citizens was held, and after a short examination, the proof was overwhelming against him, and he was severely whipped and ordered off. He seemed to be well posted in all John Brown matters, and was endeavoring to incite the slaves to a servile insurrection, etc., telling them that they would all be free after the election ; that Lincoln would be elected, etc.

EXPLOSION OF THE STEAMER BALTIC.—A telegram from Mobile, 3d inst., says : The splendid low-boat Baltic exploded her boilers at an early hour this morning in the bay of Mobile. We learn from persons who have arrived from the scene of the disaster, that seventeen lives were lost, and that some few received severe injuries.

MISSISSIPPI.

ACTION OF GOV. PETTUS OF MISSISSIPPI.—In a speech at Macon, Miss., Friday inst., Gov. Pettus said "that the same wire which conveyed the electric flash that brought the intelligence of Lincoln's election, the next instant should carry back his proclamation convening the Legislature of Mississippi, and he warned them now, if there were any members of the Legislature present, to be prepared to set out for the capital of the State the next minute."

MINUTE MAN.—We learn that a company of "Minute Men," numbering sixty, was formed at Enterprise, Miss., the 31st ult., and offered its services to the State, to go anywhere or do anything, required for the good of the State.

DISTRESS IN MISSISSIPPI.—The Wilkinson Gazette, of the 27th ult., says : "The reports that we hear of the situation of some families in the Northeast portion of our county are truly distressing. Something should be done for their relief immedi-

...ST AND COTTON.—There has been a killing frost over the ...state, and cotton especially is said to be to a great extent injured by it. ... of attempted servile insurrections are rife in different parts of the State.

GEORGIA.

PROPOSED NEW COMMUNICATION WITH HAVANA.—The people of Savannah are moving for a new and more speedy communication with Havana, with which port their business is rapidly on the increase. Of the 451 vessels which entered from or cleared for foreign ports during the last fiscal year, 139, or nearly one-third, were either from or bound to Cuban ports.

A GEORGIA-MADE STEAM FIRE ENGINE.—Mr. G. J. Golden is building a steam fire engine, at the Columbus Iron Works. It will be a great triumph of Southern mechanism and ingenuity, as the entire conception, drawings and work, have all been done in the South.

TENNESSEE.

HEAVY STORM IN TENNESSEE.—The Express courier, from New York the 29th, reports a very heavy and destructive storm in East Tennessee. The bridges and four miles of the track of the Virginia and Tennessee railroad had been washed away, and a large number of mails were there detained.

KENTUCKY.

OIL WELL IN KENTUCKY.—The Owensboro' Democrat learns from a gentleman who resides in Calhoun, McLean county, that oil wells similar to those recently discovered in Pennsylvania have been found in McLean county. A New York company have taken leases upon immense tracts of land over there, and have opened one well upon the plantation of Dr. Mayo, which satisfied those engaged in the oil business that there is an inexhaustible amount of pure oil under the whole range of hills along Long-Falls prairie and Green River. Where the well spoken of is located there is a tar spring, and this fact led to the discovery of the oil. The oil was found beneath a rock 39 feet in thickness, and was forced to the surface by the gas as soon as reached. The company are making preparations and erecting buildings and machinery for the manufacture of oil. We are informed that the oil comes out of the earth perfectly clear of any mixture, and all that is necessary for its use is a clarifying process. It burns well and makes a good light in its crude state.

The tobacco crop in Kentucky has been seriously injured by frosts, and it is estimated that one-eighth of the whole has been ruined.

VIRGINIA.

A FATHER ACCIDENTALLY SHOOTS HIS DAUGHTER DEAD.—A most heart-rending accident occurred at Norfolk, on the 24th ult. It appears that Mr. Jesse T. Newell, a worthy citizen and indulgent parent, went home from business about sunset, and finding his little son playing in the house and yard with a pistol, not supposed to be loaded, took it from him, and while examining it, it was accidentally discharged. Laura, (Mr. Newell's daughter) a beautiful and interesting little girl of nine summers, was seated on the steps getting her lesson when the pistol went off, and instantly jumping up she exclaimed, "Oh, pa, you have killed me!" As she said this, the blood burst from her nose and mouth. She fell forward and instantly expired. The pistol had been charged with two buck-shot, both of which had entered her right breast and perforated her right lung. The great shock, together with the internal hemorrage, produced almost instant death. The unhappy father, almost bereft of reason by the distressing and heart-rending accident, sought in his frenzy to take his own life. He seized a knife and made a desperate effort to cut his throat, but was prevented from sleeping his family in still deeper grief by some of his friends, who happened to rush up in time.

WARLIKE PREPARATIONS IN VIRGINIA.—Virginia appears to be making ready for some overt military demonstration. Not only is her Governor taking steps to arm the militia of the State, but through the proper authorities an order has been given to Col. Rice of Philadelphia, for a quantity of his newly invented explosive bomb-shells, represented as the most destructive agent of its kind known.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE MINUTE MEN'S PLEDGE.—The following is the pledge of the Minute Men organized at Columbia : "We, the undersigned citizens of South Carolina, in view of the impending crisis necessarily incident upon the election of a Black Republican to the Presidency of these United States, and in view of our duties to our section, ourselves and our best interests, which must fall in the event of the triumph of Northern fanaticism, hereby form ourselves into an association, under the name and style of the Minute Men, and do further solemnly pledge our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor, to sustain Southern constitutional equality in the Union, or, failing in that, to establish our independence out of it. The members are required to wear a blue cockade on the left side of the hat, and procure a Colt's revolver, rifle, or other approved firearms."

The two Hitchings, father and son, arrested near Cheraw, on suspicion of being engaged in an insurrectionary plot, have not been hegg, as reported, but sent out of the State.

TEXAS.

CROPS.—Since the late frost (says the Houston Telegraph,) we have sought information from all parts of the interior as to the effect on the crops. So far as we can learn, it has been of positive advantage to the cotton in much of the lower country, checking its further top growth, and causing the bolls to open. The result has been a considerable increase in the amount gathered by many of the planters. In some instances this increase has brought the crop up to very nearly an average, one year with another. The continued fair weather since the frost has also aided in this result, and it is estimated that every week of fair weather at this time, adds 2000 bales to the crop of Texas. A late killing frost, and a pleasant fall, may yet give us a tolerable crop in the aggregate. The sugar cane will not turn out more than half a crop. The time when it should have been ripening was required for its growth. A gentleman who has just returned from a trip to Burnett gives a glowing account of the prospects of a crop in that section of country. He says that he saw lots of wheat up, which was in a healthy condition, that the planters had machinery for reaping wheat and were doing business on a large scale. This is a prairie country, and our informant says that the people were settling in the open prairies, without a stick of timber of any kind near them, for the purpose of raising sheep, that breeds of which were being driven into that and the surrounding counties in large numbers. He says that biscuits and beef are plenty ; that they have no corn bread, and would willingly exchange some of their flour, pound for pound, for corn meal. From this description, it is a thriving as well as a beautiful portion of the State.

The Weatherford White Man reports Indians as depredating in Jack county. The paper calls upon the lower counties to equip companies of young men for the Grand Buffal Hunt.—This hunt is an independent ranging expedition against the Indians. It will be in charge of active and experienced frontiersmen, and will afford those who join it an excellent opportunity to see a little of life beyond the frontier. The White Man says the post oak mast will prove a failure. The crops of wheat, barley and rye are in good condition, and large quantities have been sown ; but the grasshoppers have appeared in hordes.—Stock is in excellent condition and the range very fine.

NEW MEXICO.

INDEPENDENCE, MO., OCT. 30.—The New Mexican mail, with dates to the 15th inst., has arrived. Amherg has succeeded in recovering sixty-three of his mules that were stolen by the Indians, and in all probability that is all he will ever get. Hostile Indians are all around Santa Fe, and the citizens dare not venture any distance out for fear of being murdered. There is no news from the army in the mountains, in pursuit of the Navajo Indians. No hostile Indians were seen on the Plains and the news from there is of no importance.

FOREIGN NEWS.

By the arrival of the steamship Adriatic at New York, on the 5th inst., with advices from Liverpool to the 21th ult, and the arrival of the Persia off Cape Race on the 5th, with four days later advices, we are in possession of the following Important European news, per telegraph :—

It was reported that Austria had proposed mediation to France for a pacific solution of the Italian question.

Hungary.—The Emperor of Austria has introduced the new charter, making numerous concessions to Hungary. He accords a Court of Chancery to Hungary, increases the members of the Reichsrath to 100, re-establishes the Constitutional Institutions, and makes the Hungarian the official language.—The Hungarian Diet is to be convoked and the Emperor crowned King of Hungary. Similar concessions will be granted to Transylvania.

The following we gather from our "exchanges" received during the past week:—

There are also in the same metropolis no less than 60,000 Germans, 30,000 French, 6000 Italians; a very large number of Asiatics, from all parts of the East, and many who still worship their idols.

The greatest bore of any artesian well in the world, is that just completed in Birmingham, England. The diameter fixed was the unprecedented one of twenty-six inches, and was accomplished by new and improved machinery.

The London Commercial Record states that the Great Eastern is not shaken up and weakened, that she is no longer seaworthy.

There was great rejoicing at Liverpool at the opening of the splendid free library presented by Wm. Brown.

FRANCE.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH TARIFF.—It is stated from Paris that the French and English Plenipotentiaries would, on the 12th, sign a convention containing a new series of articles inserted in the French tariff. Refined sugar will be taxed 40 francs per 100 kilogrammes. The import duties on machines, instruments, &c., will be reduced.

FRENCH NATIONAL DEFENSE.—The Paris correspondent of the London Times publishes a direct communication by a submarine telegraph. Measures are likewise being adopted to establish a communication between Brest and Cherbourg.

RAILWAYS IN FRANCE.—There are 6769 miles of railroad in operation in France, and 3450 more in process of construction. The total sum expended and to be expended in their construction is $1,456,000,000, of which $718,000,000 had been expended up to December of last year. The French railways cost, on an average, about $100,000 a mile.

Count de Persigny has gone to Paris, summoned by the Emperor. It was reported that he would take the place of M. Thouvenel in the Foreign office.

The fortifications of Cherbourg and Algiers are to be strength ened.

A number of steel-cased frigates will be built for the French government. Orders have been given for the relatorement of the garrison at Marseilles.

A telegram from Madrid says that an insane man failed in an attempt to shoot the Queen of Spain.

ITALY.

ADVICES PER THE EUROPA TO THE 21ST ULT.—La Patrie says as soon as the annexation of Naples and Sicily to Sardinia is proclaimed, Garibaldi will resign his political authority and assume the functions of commander-in-chief of the land and sea forces of Southern Italy. He will exclusively occupy himself in preparing for war next spring, and was to make an appeal to all Europe to volunteer. Advices from Naples confirm the statement that the French merchantman which landed with stores for Gaeta, had been captured by Garibaldi's ships of war. It is stated by what is called good authority, that 14,000 Piedmontese troops had already reached Naples by sea to march to Caserta for the purpose of joining those who were entering the Roman frontier. The departure of the Russian embassy from Turin is officially announced. It is reported via Berlin, that the Sardinian ambassador at St. Petersburg had received his passports. The Turin Gazette says that Prussia has simply made some remarks against the entry of Sardinian troops into the Neapolitan territory. The same paper adds that Prussia had made no communication in regard to this matter. Garibaldi's ministry and Pro-Dictator at Naples have resigned. The French mail steamer Protis was seized at Naples. The departure of additional French troops from Toulon and Marseilles for Rome has for the present been suspended. The French fleet is to be recalled from Naples. The Paris correspondent of the London Times says the departure of the Pope's Nuncio from Paris was considered the forerunner of the Pope's quitting Rome.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE POPE.—The Giornale di Roma states that the sum contributed by the faithful to the Holy See was $1,600,000, and that it had all been expended.

A PRIESTLY ARMY.—A battalion of seven hundred priests has been formed in Naples, to fight on the side of civil liberty and Garibaldi. This is the most huge full sign of advancing civilization that has yet risen to the surface in Italy, for it is utilizing the most useless and troublesome element of Italian society, and bringing it under the strong arm of military law, whence, in time, it may be merged into the working classes.

THE EAST.

Official accounts from Constantinople acquaint us that Fuad Pasha has rated the indemnity to be paid to the Syrian sufferers for their losses in the recent troubles at 29,000,000 piastres, 25,000,000 of which have been assessed on the Mussulmon population of the whole of Syria, and 4,000,000 on the Jews; these last, it appears, having acted in a manner to justify peculiary castigation to that amount.

Advices from Syria say the French have established a provisional municipality at Deirial Kammer, and reinstated the Christians.

Telegrams from Constanthople announce the destruction of twenty-two ships by fire.

CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA.

NICARAGUA.—From Nicaragua we learn that the news of General Walker's capture caused much rejoicing among the inhabitants of that republic. Martinez is again at the head of the affairs of the republic. Minister Dimitry has been unsuccessfully using his exertions to press the Government for a convention to settle the American claims. Martinez was, however, to call a congress together on the 15th of September, that the ratifications of the Lamar treaty might be effected within the time specified. Commodore Vanderbilt made the Government an offer of transit, but it was not accepted.

PERU.—The American Government's ultimatum has been rejected by the Peruvian Government as to Lizzie Thompson, Georgiana and Saratoga's claims. This refusal, it was conceded, would compel Mr. Clay, the American Minister, to demand his passports. The ship Lucy Ann Hale was partially destroyed by fire on the 5th of October, at Callao. On the 10th, while the Peruvian frigate Callao was being docked at San Lorenzo, the staunchions of the dock gave way, pitching her over and causing the water to fill her rapidly. At the time of the disaster the Callao had on board her crew. About 150 souls perished, and as many were wounded.

ECUADOR.—Guayaquil advices say that Flores was disbanding his forces, but that President Costella still maintained a hostile attitude, and was seeking permission from his Government to declare war again against Ecuador.

BOLIVIA.—The revolution in Bolivia has been suppressed, and several officers have been shot.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

METHODIST.

Our Home Work.—We compile the following interesting revival news from our correspondents throughout the Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi Conferences :—

EVERGREEN CIRCUIT, ALABAMA CONFERENCE.—Rev. H. L. Selman writes : I have been laboring for some time, day and night, in protracted meetings. The Lord has done great things for us. A few days ago I closed a meeting at Concord; 17 joined the Church; I baptized 15. I closed a meeting at Evergreen, Oct. 4th, at which 3 joined the church, and I baptized. I have taken into the church about 10 members within a short time.—This is a new circuit, made last Conference, and not very large. The church is gaining ground in this section. The Sabbath-schools and prayer-meetings are doing well. The people are taking interest in the church; repairing and building up new churches, etc. The prospect is good for better times in this country. Rev. T. M. Lynch came down to Evergreen on the fifth Sabbath, and preached with power and the Holy Ghost.

EUFAULAW CAMP-MEETING.—A Georgia correspondent, who had been travelling in Alabama, gives a glowing description of this camp-meeting, which was held in Tallapoosa county, Ala. It was a time of great grace and salvation.

BLOUNT SPRINGS MISSION, ALA. CONF.—Rev. A. Dowling writes : The Lord has blessed us with some gracious revivals of religion. We commenced a meeting at Pleasant Grove church which continued six days, and resulted in 7 or 8 conversions and 6 accessions. The membership was powerfully blessed. At Horse Creek we had a protracted meeting of five days, which resulted in 12 conversions and 3 accessions. The church was wonderfully blessed. Saturday before the fourth Sabbath in September, we commenced a meeting at Mt. Zion, which continued six days, and resulted in 11 conversions and 16 accessions. The church was blessed with an encouraging outpouring of the Holy Spirit. We have also had good meetings at other places. In all we have received over 40 on probation during our revivals.

GADSDEN CIRCUIT, ALA. CONF.—Rev. U. L. Thompson writes : The Lord is still doing great things for us here. Since the 17th of August (at which time I informed you of my first revival meeting), we have had about 200 conversions, and 150 have joined the Church, making in all over 250 conversions and over 225 who have joined, and the work is still going on. May God, of his infinite mercy, send out his light and his truth to the ends of the earth.

KEMPER CIRCUIT, ALA. CONF.—Rev. S. H. Cox writes (from Kemper Co., Miss.; we think it is called Kemper circuit, but cannot tell), as follows : Good times on this circuit at most of the appointments. I think near 300 have been added on probation—white and colored. But my missionary assessment, $700, and more, and my conference collection, $180, and over. Short crops of corn and long missionary subscriptions up here in the sand-hills of Kemper. It will be a burning shame on the Church to fall off in our collections. Let us bring our tithes into God's store-house, and prove him therewith, and see if he will not pour us out abundant blessings, temporal and spiritual.

CHUNNENUGGEE, ALA. CONF.—Rev. O. B. Stanley writes : About the first of August I commenced holding a series of two days' meetings, and protracting them whenever circumstances would warrant, being assisted by the local preachers, to whom we are much indebted. The Lord was pleased to own and bless the efforts, and every church on the circuit (except one) has been blessed with the outpouring of the Spirit of God. Up to this time there have been 217 added to the Church.

CRAWFORDSVILLE CIRCUIT, ALA. CONF.—Rev. J. A. Peebles writes : Our Fourth Quarterly Meeting has just closed. Crawfordsville Circuit is prosperous. We have had 10 or 50 accessions to the Church (whites) during the year, and between 40 and 50 colored. Two of our brethren were licensed to preach at our last quarterly meeting,—two good men. Both are men of means and promise. I like the way Methodists have of raising up preachers from their midst to preach the everlasting Gospel. We have a very good parsonage which will be ready for the next preacher.

EUFAULA, ALA. CONF.—Rev. A. S. Andrews writes : We have just closed a very interesting meeting; about thirty were converted. Quite an addition has been made to the Church, and the congregation generally have been moved and revived. The prospects of Methodism here seem to be brightening, and the whole christian community appear to be encouraged and refreshed.

SUMMERVILLE CIRCUIT, ALA. CONF.—Rev. J. W. Ellis writes: The Spring Hill, Centre, and Macedonia churches have enjoyed gracious and prosperous times. Between thirty-five and forty, according to the best estimate we could make, professed religion at the two last mentioned, and 28 were added to the Church. At Spring Hill some 10 or 12 joined the Church. The meetings were marked with ... a protracted meeting for the blacks, at Pleasant Springs Church, which was attended with much good. Upwards of twenty blacks have joined the Church at this place, and many soundly converted. It was a novel and interesting scene to see our servants taking their dinners and going up to the house of God, to spend the day in worship, in week-time. Nor did they only attend; but their masters also were there with them in good numbers. I mention this meeting particularly, in the hope that the example may be of some service to our dear brethren who are laboring for the building up of the kingdom of righteousness. About 60 have been added to the Church during the year.

GROVE HILL CIRCUIT, ALA. CONF.—Rev. J. R. Jones writes: —We have closed all our protracted meetings but one. Converting and converting power has been with us at most points. About 100 whites and 20 colored have been added to the Church, most of whom professed to know God in pardoned sins. I will mention only two places. We held a meeting embracing the 5th Sunday in July, at Good Springs, a place of which none seemed to have any hope. The Holy Ghost came down as in days of yore, and they spake with new tongues.—23 joined the Church. We closed with 50 or 60 mourners; in fact, every person under the arbor requested the prayers of the Church. The work is still going on. Parents and children now go to the Sabbath School on Sunday morning, and in the evening they go from house to house holding religious meetings and telling what great things God has done for them. We closed another meeting at Jackson on the 15th ult. The Good Spirit fell upon Baptist and Methodist, and they were constrained to say, surely, God is in this place. Jackson was an icy place before. This is a new era in her history. 22 souls were converted, and 26 joined the Church. We left them in a new atmosphere, praising and giving God the glory.

CAMDEN CIRCUIT, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.—Rev. L. Encanbrack writes : We have held several interesting meetings on this circuit lately, and though we have not seen such displays of power and saving grace, as I learn from our Church papers they are having in some places, yet we have had refreshing times; backsliders have been reclaimed, lake-warm professors have been revived, and the Church generally a good deal quickened. About 20 have been converted, and about 30 added to the Church. Six at one meeting professed sanctification, and at one time, same meeting, every sinner in the house was at the altar, and nearly every professor happy. It was a time never to be forgotten. Camden circuit is a pleasant work.

ADAMS CAMP-MEETING, MISS. CONF.—Rev. Thos. Price, P.E., writes : I have just returned home from the Adams camp-meeting, on the Amite circuit, and although the camp-meeting as such closed on Wednesday the 24th, yet some of the tenters were desirous of staying, and religious services were continued. The meeting, from the commencement, was one of great interest, and increased in usefulness. Many were converted—some in the woods' prayer-meeting. Many were reclaimed, and to professors generally it was a season of great joy. I am not able to give the numbers of those who professed or joined the Church. One beautiful feature in the meeting is, that, notwithstanding the drought, the meeting was as well if not better supported than ever before.

GEORGETOWN, MISS. CONF.—Rev. A. J. Wheat wrote the following some time since, but it has been overlooked : I wish you to notice the results of a meeting which has just closed.—The meeting lasted 12 days; accessions 24; conversions 25; 30 blacks joined, 15 converted. The meeting was held at Georgetown church, on Georgetown circuit.

ST. HELENA CIRCUIT, MISS. CONF.—Rev. H. D. Berry writes: I have just concluded a meeting at Day's church, which resulted in 77 accessions to the Church, and about 25 conversions among the whites, besides a large number among the blacks. The meeting continued from Saturday until Thursday night without any apparent abatement of interest. The revival fire kindled at the Greensberg camp-meeting was still alive in the hearts of the people, and only awaited such an opportunity to burst forth in all its original warmth and power. There have been about 40 conversions of the whites on this circuit within the last month, and 100 accessions.

WILKINSON COLORED MISSION, MISS. CONF.—Rev. R. S. Pitts writes : I have been laboring on the Wilkinson colored mission since July, 1859. I have been assisted since February last by brother S. H. Hide, a local preacher employed by bro. Watkins, our P. E. Thereare 22 appointments on the mission, which we fill every three weeks, by preaching three and four times a day on every Sabbath. We spend a portion of the time in catechising the children. Those members who have been catechised from their childhood are more intelligent, less superstitious, and much more consistent as members of the Church than those who have not had those advantages. We have taken in, since July, 1859, 135 probationers. The mission is growing in extent and usefulness, and the people seem to be waking up to their responsibilities in regard to their slaves. On some of the places the whites and servants meet and worship together, which is encouraging both to missionary and servants. At one place the master's youngest son (about 14) came up with the servants and joined the Church. His father owns slaves by the hundred, yet this good boy is found in the "Quarter" on Sabbath among his father's slaves, reading to them the word of God, catechising the children, singing hymns, and leading them in prayer. We could wish that the sons of some of the other rich planters would go and do likewise. On some of the places we have nice chapels in the grove, and there the servants seem to enjoy themselves much better and pride their privilege more highly, because it is to be used for no other purpose. There is as much work as two men can do, and we expect the mission will be divided next year.

Rev. W. D. Stayton writes: We held a two days meeting at Lackashe, which resulted in four conversions and the membership greatly revived. Our fourth quarterly meeting at Sugar Town resulted in seven conversions, and eight accessions to the Church. Four of the converts were Sabbath School scholars; the membership were powerfully revived and built up. We were compelled to close on account of the scarcity of provisions, their crops having failed almost entirely. We are trying to collect missionary money, and have succeeded tolerably well so far; we will do better than we did last year.

CENTENARY COLLEGE.—Rev. James Stratton, D. D., Pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Jackson, La., writes : "Centenary College is progressing, and the students are under the care of laborious and excellent men. It deserves 300 students, and the patronage and respect of the Church."

PRESBYTERIAN.

The election of a successor to the post vacated by the decease of Dr. Van Rensselaer, has excited unusual interest. At a large meeting of the Board of Education, held on the 5th ult., the question was decided by the unanimous election of the Rev. P. D. Gurley, D.D. of Washington City. A salary of $2000 was voted. It is not yet accepted.

Dr. Adger, in the Old School General Assembly, said that the Presbyterian Church should not congratulate herself on the amount given to domestic missions, ($118,904.21) when probably the children of the church spend that much for candy!

BAPTIST.

BAPTISTS IN WISCONSIN.—The Board of the State Convention report that of the two hundred Baptist Churches in Wisconsin more than fifty are languishing and pressingly need pecuniary aid; and of the one hundred and forty ministers, more than half do not receive an adequate support, and are obliged to pursue some secular calling to make up the deficiency. Eight missionaries were employed during the year for whom $936.26 were collected.

MISSISSIPPI COLLEGE.—The Fall session of this College opened with unusually flattering prospects. Up to the close of the second day, one hundred and fifty students had been entered; some thirty more than at the corresponding date last year.

SOUTHERN BAPTIST S. S. UNION.—The next Anniversary of the Southern Baptist S. S. Union, will be held in the city of Louisville, Kentucky, during the last week in November.

The General Association of North Mississippi will convene in Grenada, on Friday before the first Lord's day in November.

EPISCOPAL.

THE ISLES OF THE SEA.—A new Episcopalian Bishopric has been formed among the islands of the Pacific. The bishop will exercise ecclesiastical supervision over 70 or 80 islands not under the Government of Great Britain. The Rev. J. C. Patterson, M. A., has been nominated for the office. He has qualified himself for the position by his general knowledge of the natives, and his labors with them for the past five years, as also by his acquaintance with six or seven of their principal spoken tongues.

Lately, the Duke of Northumberland has donated the sum of £30,000 for the endowment of new churches and parsonages in the parish of Tynemouth, of which he is lay rector.

CITY NEWS.

THE CITY RAILROAD.—The contractors are now engaged in laying the double track along the central ground on Canal-street. The rails are laid on wooden "sleepers." This part of the work will progress speedily in comparison with constructing the track along the square blocked streets.

DEDICATION OF THE FOURTH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—Last Sunday this new edifice was dedicated to the service of God. The sermon was preached by the pastor—Rev. G. L. Moore. The church will seat about 800 persons, and cost a little less than $30,000. It is situated on Murals street, and is quite a handsome building.

HUMBOLDT SOCIETY OF NATURAL SCIENCES.—The second semi-annual exhibition of the above society took place last Friday at the Boys High School, Camp street.

EXPLOSION OF THE STEAMBOAT R. R. W. HILL.—FORTY LIVES LOST.—This terrible disaster occured last Wednesday night, at a point about fifty miles above this city, as the Hill was on her way from Memphis to New Orleans.—The number of persons ascertained and supposed to have come to their death by the sad occurrence on board this boat is forty. Twenty-two have been wounded. The Coroner held inquests on thirty-five bodies, and will no doubt make the fullest investigation into the probable cause of the explosion.

ALL SAINTS' DAY.—Last Thursday, according to a custom among Roman Catholics, the cemeteries in and about our city were thronged with visitors, of both sexes and all ages, attending the tombs of ... departed.

The Election in this city yesterday passed off without the slightest disturbance. The result stands thus : Bell, 5,215 ; Douglas, 2,097, Breckenridge, 2,645.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

On the evening of the 30th Sept., in the Methodist Church at Spring Hill, Marengo county, Ala., by Rev. Joseph H. Cottrell, of Tuscaloosa, Rev. HUGH B. COTTRELL to Miss L. ANNIE BLUNT.

MONDAY EVENING, November 5, 1860.

The general market has exhibited rather more animation during the past week. A fair amount of business has been done in our leading staple without any important change in prices. Operations in Sugar and Molasses have been on a still more liberal scale, but at prices showing a continued downward tendency, caused by more ample supplies. The Western Produce market has exhibited more activity, partly owing to the renewal of the demand for consumption at the commencement of the month, and partly to less stringency in the pretensions of both holders and shipmasters, enabling buyers for shipment to come forward with some English orders.

TOM'S TRIAL.

A GOOD STORY FOR BOYS.

It was a pleasant day in that particularly pleasant part of Summer-time, which the boys call "vacation," when Tiger and Tom walked slowly down the street together. You may think it strange that I mention Tiger first, but I assure you Tom would not have been in the least offended by the preference. Indeed, he would have assured you that Tiger was a most wonderful dog, and knew as much as any two boys, though this might be called rather extravagant.

Nearly a year ago, Tom's birthday, Tiger arrived as a present from Tom's uncle, and as he leaped with a dignified bound from the wagon in which he made his journey, Tom looked for a moment into his great, wise eyes, and impulsively threw his arms around his shaggy neck. Tiger, on his part, was pleased with Tom's bright face, and most affectionately licked his smooth cheeks. So the league of friendship was complete from that hour.

Tom soon gave his school-fellows to understand that Tiger was a dog of superior talents, and told them that he meant to give him a liberal education. So when Tom studied his lessons, Tiger too, was furnished with a book, and, sitting by Tom's side, he would pore over the pages with an air of great profundity, occasionally gravely turning a leaf with his paw. Then Tiger was taught to go to the Post Office, and bring home the daily paper. He could also carry a basket to the baker's for crackers and cake, and putting his money on the counter with his mouth, he would wait patiently till the basket was filled, and then trot faithfully home. Added to all these graces of mind, Tiger had shown himself possessed of a large heart, for he had plunged into the lake one raw Spring morning, and saved a little child from drowning. So the next Saturday, Tom called a full meeting of his schoolmates, and after numerous grand speeches to the effect that Tiger was a hero, as well as a "gentleman and scholar," an enormous brass medal was fastened around his neck, and he was made to acknowledge the honor by standing on his hind legs, and barking vociferously. Old Major White had offered Tom ten dollars for Tiger, but Tom quickly informed him he "wouldn't take a hundred."

But I am telling you too much about Tiger, and must now say a few words about his master, who is really the subject of my story. As I have already told you, Tom had a pleasant, round face, and you might live with him a week, and think him one of the noblest, most generous boys you ever knew. But some day you would probably discover that he had a most violent temper. You would be frightened to see his face crimson with rage, as he stamped his feet, shook his little sister, spoke improperly to his mother, and above all, sorely displeased his great Father in heaven.

To be sure, Tom was soon over his passion, and was very repentant, but then he did not remember to be watchful and struggle against the great enemy, and the next time he was attacked, he was very easily overcome, and had many sorrowful hours in consequence. Now I am going to tell you of one great trial on this account, which Tom never forgot to the end of his life. As I was saying a little while ago, Tiger and Tom were walking down the street together when they met Dick Casey, a school-fellow of Tom's.

"Oh Dick!" cried Tom, "I'm going to father's grain store a little while. Let's go up in the loft and play."

Dick had just finished his work in his mother's garden, and was all ready for a little amusement. So the two went up together and enjoyed themselves highly for a long time. But at last arose one of those trifling disputes, in which little boys are apt to indulge. Pretty soon there were angry words, then (Oh, how sorry I am to say it!) Tom's wicked passion got the mastery of him, and he beat little Dick severely. Tiger, who must have been ashamed of his master, pulled hard at his coat, and whined piteously, but all in vain. At last Tom stopped, from mere exhaustion.

"There now!" he cried, "which is right, you or I"

"I am," sobbed Dick, "and you tell a lie."

Tom's face flushed crimson, and darting upon Dick, he gave him a sudden push. Alas! he was too near the open door. Dick screamed, threw up his arms, and in a moment was gone! Tom's heart stood still, and an icy chill crept over him from head to foot. At first he could not stir; then—he never knew how he got there, but he found himself standing beside his little friend. Some men were raising him carefully from the hard side-walk.

"Is he dead?" almost screamed Tom.

"No, replied one, "we hope not. How did he fall out?"

"He didn't fall," groaned Tom, who never could be so mean as to tell a lie, "I pushed him out."

"You pushed him, you wicked boy, cried a rough voice. "We know you ought to be sent to jail, and if he dies, you will be hung."

Tom grew as white as death, —— the store, and he heard all that passed as if in a dream into

"Is he badly hurt?" cried some one.

"Only his hands," was the answer. The rope saved him. He caught hold of the rope, and slipped down; but his hands are dreadfully torn; he has fainted from pain."

Just then Tom's father came in, and soon understood the case. The look he gave his unhappy, son so full of sorrow, not unmingled with pity, was too much for Tom, and he stole out, followed by the faithful Tiger. He wandered to the woods and threw himself upon the ground. One hour ago he was a happy boy, and now what a terrible change! What had made the difference? Nothing, but the indulgence of this wicked, violent temper. His mother had often warned him of the fearful consequences. She had told him that little boys who would not learn to govern themselves, grew up to be very wicked men, and often became murderers in some moment of passion. And now, Tom shuddered to think, he was also a murderer! Nothing but God's great mercy in putting that rope in Dick's way, had saved him from carrying the load of sorrow and guilt all the rest of his life. But poor Dick he might die yet—how pale he looked—how strange! Tom fell upon his knees, and prayed God to "spare Dick's life, and from that time forth, with God's help, he promised that he would strive to conquer this wicked passion."

Then as he could no longer bear his terrible suspense, he started for widow Casey's cottage. As he appeared at the humble door, Mrs. Casey angrily ordered him away, saying: "You have made a poor woman trouble enough for one day." But Dick's feeble voice entreated: "Oh, mother, let him come in, I was just as bad as he."

Tom gave a cry of joy at hearing those welcome tones, and sprang hastily in. There sat poor Dick with his hands bound up, looking very pale, but Tom thanked God that he was alive.

"I should like to know how I am to live now," sighed Mrs. Casey. "Who will weed the garden, and carry my vegetables to market? I am afraid we shall suffer for bread before the summer is over," and she put her apron on her eyes.

"Mrs. Casey," cried Tom, eagerly, "I will do every thing that Dick did. I will sell the potatoes and beans, and will even drive Mr. Brown's cows to pasture."

Mrs. Casey shook her head incredulously, but Tom bravely kept his word. For the next few weeks Tom was at his post bright and early, and the garden was never kept in better order. And every morning Tiger and Tom stood faithfully in the market place with their baskets, and never gave up, no matter how warm the day, till the last vegetable was sold, and the money placed faithfully in Mrs. Casey's hand.

Tom's father often passed through the market, and gave his little son an encouraging smile, but he did not offer to help him out of his difficulty, for he knew if Tom struggled on alone, it would be a lesson he would never forget. Already he was becoming so gentle and patient, that every one noticed the change, and his mother rejoiced over the sweet fruits of his repentance and self-sacrifice.

After a few weeks the bandages were removed from Dick's hands, but they had been unskillfully treated, and were drawn up in every shape. Mrs. Casey would not conceal her grief. "He will never be the help he was before," she said to Tom, "he will never be like other boys, and he wrote such a fine hand, now he can no more make a letter than that little chicken in the garden."

"If he only had a great city doctor," said a neighbor, "he might have been all right. Even new his fingers might be helped if you took him to New York."

"Oh, I am too poor, too poor," said she, and Dick burst into tears.

Tom could not bear it, and again rushed to the woods to think what could be done, for he had already given them all his quarter's allowance. All at once a thought flashed into his head, and he started as if he had been shot. Then he cried in great distress.

"No, no, anything but that, I can't do that!"

Tiger gently licked his hands, and watched him with great concern. Now came a great struggle, Tom rocked backwards and forwards, although he was a proud boy, he sobbed aloud. Tiger whined, and licked his face, rushed off in dark corners, and barked savagely at some imaginary enemy, and then came back, and putting his paws on Tom's knees, wagged his tail, in anxious sympathy. At last Tom took his hands from his pale, tear-stained face, and looking into the dog's great honest eyes, he cried with a queer shake in his voice:

"Tiger, old fellow I dear old dog, could you ever forgive me if I sold you?"

Then came another burst of sorrow, and Tom rose hastily, as if afraid to trust himself, and almost ran out of the woods. Over the fields he raced, with Tiger close to his heels, nor vested a moment till he stood at Major White's door nearly a mile away.

"Do you still want Tiger, sir?"

"Why yes," said the old man in great surprise, "but do you want to sell him?"

"Yes, please," gasped Tom, not daring to look at his old companion. The exchange was quickly made, and the ten dollars in Tom's hand. Tiger was legalled into a barn, and the door hastily shut, and Tom was hurrying off, when he turned and cried in a choking voice—

"You will be kind to him, Major White, won't you? Don't whip him, I never did, and he's the best dog."—

"No, no, child," said Major White kindly, want to buy him back, you shall have him."

Tom managed to falter "thank you," and almost flew out of hearing of Tiger's eager scratching on the barn door.

I am making my story too long, and can only tell you in a few words that Tom's sacrifice was accepted. A friend took little Dick to the city free of expense, and Tom's money paid for the necessary operation. The poor crooked fingers were very much improved, and were almost as good as ever. And the whole village loved Tom for his brave, self sacrificing spirit and the noble amendment he had made for his moment of passion.

A few days after Dick's return came Tom's birthday, but he did not feel in his usual spirits. In spite of his great delight in Dick's great recovery, he had so mourned over the matter, and had taken Tiger's loss so much to heart, that he had grown quite pale and thin. So as he was permitted to spend the day as he pleased, he took his book, and went to his favorite haunt in the woods.

"How differently from my last birthday," thought Tom. "Then Tiger had just come, and I was so happy, though I did'nt like him half as well as I do now."

Tom sighed heavily, then added more cheerfully—"Well, I hope some things are better than they were last year. I hope I have begun to conquer myself, and with God's help I shall never give up trying while I live. Now if I could only earn money enough to buy back dear old Tiger."

But while Tom was thinking, and gazing up into the blue sky through the delicate green leaves, he heard a hasty, familiar trot,—there was a crashing amongst the bushes, and with a quick bark of joy, Tiger himself, the brave old dog, sprang into Tom's arms.

"Tiger, old fellow," cried Tom, trying to look fierce, though he could scarcely keep down the tears, "how came you to run away sir?"

Tiger responded by picking up a letter he had dropped in his first joy, and laying it in Tom's hand.

Tom opened it and read in Major White's trembling hand:

"MY DEAR CHILD: Tiger is pining and I must give him change of air. I wish him to have a good master, and knowing that the best ones are those who have learned to govern themselves, I send him to you. Will you take care of him and greatly oblige,

Your old friend, MAJOR WHITE."

And then Tom read through a mist of tears—

"P. S. I know the whole story. Dear little friend, 'be not weary in well doing.'"
